The Monroe Doctrine Affirmed

The Venezuela controversy has emphasized more than ever our standing on the Monroe Doctrine, and we shall probably never hear the principle involved seriously questioned again. Not so long ago some of our own statesmen were inclined to scoff at it, especially when we acquired new territory in the Orient. They asserted that by doing so we were supplying the nations of Europe with an argument against the soundness of our position on the Monroe Doctrine, but two of the most powerful of those countries have by their assent to our suggestions in the Venezuela controversy signified their acquiescence in that rule of conduct as a guarantee of the safety of the nations in this hemisphere. In the last days of the session of the House of Commons Lord Beresford inquired whether the United States had consented to the blockade, thereby indicating his understanding to be that England was committed to the Monroe Doctrine, and the Westminster Gazette has gone so far as to advocate an international agreement by which the United States shall be made a party to any intervention on England's part involving the use of force in a South American state. "That country alone," says the Gazette, "can apply the ultimate remedy, which is the seizure and occupation of territory, and to act without her consent is to commit ourselves to proceedings which, if our opponent holds out, will either be without effect or threaten a quarrel with the United States. We should bring the United States into the affair before, and not after we are committed. There is no halfway house in this matter. We are either Monroeists or we are not." From this it is evident that there is a strong sentiment in England against anything which might savor of a repudiation of the Monroe Doctrine.

Morgan Against the Art Tariff

It was stated in the despatches some days ago that J. Pierpont Morgan purposed making a test of the Dingley Act so far as it related to the tariff on works of art. The millionaire was of the opinion that he could bring his Duchess of Devonshire painting into this country free of duty. Mr. Morgan's influence is such that he will probably succeed in having a new construction placed on the clause that imposes a tariff on art, and it is to be hoped that he will. This is the only country in the world that discourages the entry of educational and civilizing influences. The tariff on art is stupid and absurd. It subserves no purpose. It is imposed neither for revenue nor protection, and those are the only legitimate objects of taxation. That the government is not in need of revenue from such a source is evident from the fact that we have a surplus in the Treasury, and it cannot be defended as a protective tariff because our artists do not need protection. On the contrary, many of them have petitioned Congress for the abolition of the duty. Works of art are therefor taxed as though the production of them were a questionable pursuit. Perhaps some meddling old ladies of Boston convinced the politicians in Washington that all art is demoralizing, because it has been said that with the development of art begins the decay of the people. Italy seeks by legislation to prevent the exportation of the famous works of art, but we have a tariff which almost prohibits the importation of great masterpieces. The tax on a masterpiece worth half a million is one hundred thousand dollars. The author of the act probably proceeded on the theory that works of art are luxuries and that if the rich desired to enjoy them they should pay for the pleasure. But art is one of the most important possessions of a country and it is one of its most civilizing influences. Moreover the good taste of a people has commercial value, and as a business proposition the importation of art should be encouraged. We spend millions of dollars every year for objects of foreign manufacture that cannot be produced in this country on account of our lack of knowledge and talent to design. It is a notable fact that the American mechanic is ingenious but not artistic. He excels in inventive faculty but is lacking in artistic training. It is high time for this country to recognize the fact that art has a direct influence on the industrial wealth of a country. Artistic quality enhances the value of a work, and all crude materials used in the arts are made more valuable by artistic manipulation. It is as important to introduce works of art into this country as it is to found schools. It is surprising that the art tariff was not abolished long ago, for there are no powerful influences interested in having it maintained. On the contrary the plutocrats of the country have suffered financially from its enforcement. Morgan is one of the few whose protest against it cannot be challenged by the demagogues, for he has done more than any other individual to enrich public art galleries.

Uncle Sam Discouraging Matrimony

The Postmaster General recently issued a decree that hereafter husbands and wives are not to be employed in his department of the public service, and as a matter of course, he is being arraigned for his discouragement of matrimony. It seems to be taken for granted by a certain class of shriekers that the mere ceremony of marriage, mouthed over before a man and woman, under any circumstances and conditions, is something so sacred that in order to promote "matrimony" every other consideration of life must go by the board. There have been wails enough on the abstract question of the married woman turned out of her place simply because she was not single. Here is a concrete example given publicity in order to show how the government is aiding and abetting the disruption of families. A woman who has been in receipt of a yearly salary of fourteen hundred dollars is married to a man whose salary is eighteen hundred dollars. She has always spent the whole of her salary upon herself. They live in a boarding house, and save nothing whatever. Now, complains the wife, neither is willing to spend less. She will not consent to support her husband out of her fourteen hundred dollars, nor will he cut down his expenses in order to maintain her out of his eighteen hundred dollars, "so there is no other course open to us but a divorce." It may seem at first sight, that the Government is blameworthy in causing the separation of two loving hearts. Apparently this pair, for couple they are not, have not an idea in common beyond making the biggest show they can on their income. Self-sacrifice, forbearance, mutual concession, apparently have never occurred to either of them. There are no children and luckily there are not, for to whom would they look for support? Surely not to the mother, who needs all of her income for herself, nor to the father, who can spare nothing from his own indulgence, and when parents have a joint income of three thousand dollars their offspring can hardly be justly regarded as wards of the public. That is the financial standpoint merely. In a union, if one may call it such, founded on mutual selfishness, there is no reason to believe that where money, usually the least regarded in the bringing up of children, is so openly worshiped, time or attention would be apt to be wasted on them. It is a beautiful picture to contemplate, especially in a day when the average earnings of women workers come to less than five dollars a week. This is the ideal state which is prayed for by reformers of the Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Charlotte Perkins Stetson brand; the financial independence of women, the glorious day when there shall be no longer a family purse and a necessity for giving up, each to the other and both for the sake of the family. Glorious day, when to be out of employment will be valid cause for divorce. This is on a level with another divorce asked for in Washington city, and with just as good cause. The lady in the case was ambitious to obtain an appointment in some official capacity, at the last Paris Exposition. She was told, or otherwise led to believe, that a relative of one of the government officials could obtain it for her, and she forthwith met and married him. When the appointments were made she did not receive recognition, and she sued for divorce on the ground that her marriage was the outcome of fraud and misrepresentation. In plain English, her husband's "pull" was not so strong as she imagined, and she was aggrieved. Incidentally, it is worth while to remark that these postoffice employes seeking divorce in order to save their salaries are a part of the grand army who are clamoring for Civil Service pensions, chiefly on the ground that they want more money. The seamstresses, laundry workers, sales girls and others, whose average yearly income is a little more than twice what the government employe receives monthly for less arduous work, and without deduction for necessary absence, is to be taxed to support in idleness the women who will not forego luxuries that they may provide for their own futures. When women were taken into the government service, during and after the war, it was with a view to providing maintenance for a few, at least, of those who were left dependent and destitute by their natural providers who had given their lives to their country. There was a sentiment which surrounded the soldier's widow and orphans, and it was deemed a nobler duty to provide them with employment which would render them independent than to dole out charity to them. It was never intended that adventuresses, and the favorites of politicians, should crowd out young men who ought to become the heads of families, nor that encouragement should be given to such pseudo-marriages, imitation homes and mockeries of families as have resulted from the system. A marriage that can be broken up because two people cannot live on one hundred and fifty dollars a month is no marriage at all. The government stamp which covers it was obtained by fraud and the parties to the deception deserve a term in the government prison.

A Cleric Behind the Bar

For many years the saloon business has been recruited from the pugilistic profession, but it has lately been demonstrated that the bartender's occupation is a congenial one to gentlemen of the cloth. A saloon owned and personally conducted by a clergyman is the latest novelty in the Bronx. The Rev. George K. MacDonald, formerly the pastor of the East avenue Baptist church in Long Island City, has given up his active connection with the ministry and is now engaged in handing out liquid joy to the good and bad alike of his rapidly growing congregation. He ascribes his sudden and strange change of profession to a feeling that in his former vocation he could not reach the masses. He says that he sees no harm in a man drinking moderately, and he thinks that he can do more good as a saloon-keeper than he did in the pulpit. "This bartender's white jacket and apron," said he to a Sun reporter, "are of infinitely more avail as a card of admission to a stranger's confidence, than the high collar and black clothes of the clergyman." Perhaps other ministers will follow the Rev. MacDonald's example. Ministers are broadening their views these days. Having denounced the saloon for years as a den of infamy without diminishing the number, it would not be surprising if some of them undertook to elevate the business by going into it, just as society women have sought to do with the stage. Though the recruits from society have had the contrary effect there is no reason to apprehend such a calamity in the event of the ministry deciding to be of service to the saloon business. The gentlemen of the cloth might at least improve the quality of the wet goods.

Teaching Literature

"The humors, conscious and unconscious, of an examination, are best enjoyed by those who correct the hundreds of papers which result," says a contributor to Lippincott's in introduction to a lengthy article made up chiefly of a selection of blunders. And they would be humorous enough if they were not so sad. The pupils, who range in years from twelve to sixteen, appear to have been compelled to take in the whole range of English literature, from Chaucer to Kipling, and to have read and formed opinions, or at least, to have assimilated the opinions of others, ready to give them out on demand as a faucet delivers water when tapped. When one considers that the unfortunate infants have also been steeped in grammar, geography, history, mathematics and natural sciences, and that in all probability the majority of them have been struggling with some musical instrument and perhaps a foreign tongue, besides other social accomplishments, the wonder is not that they have blundered, but that they have had sense enough left to blunder with. What have children from twelve to sixteen to do with the matrimonial alliances of Shakespeare's characters, and why, when modern orthography is evidently too much for them, should they be set to pick their devious way through the "Canterbury Tales"? Why should they be expected to "give a one-line sketch" of "The Light that Failed"? Could the idiotic examiner who set the task have succeeded much better than the victim who answered: "A blind man who went to war and was killed"? Children who should be barely emancipated from fairy tales, and still most vitally concerned with the fortunes of "Little Women" and "The Boys of '76" have been expected to make comparisons between Burns and Whittier, to dig out the esoteric significance of "The Vision of Sir Launfal," to "characterize" Bryant and Longfellow, to be glib in discussing Irving's works and ready with opinions of "Evangeline" and "Cotter's Saturday Night," and have Franklin's Autobiography at their finger ends, and be able to quote from Gray's "Elegy." Ruskin and Lowell, and Emerson and Holmes also appear amidst the chaos of the examination questions. It is evident that the misguided children have conscientiously done their best and tried to please their teachers, for their efforts to be "literary" and grandiloquent plainly show that they have kept their eyes on the final test and tried to absorb words big enough to express the ideas they were expected to have formed. What possible advantage is gained by "teaching literature" after this fashion? What are the children gaining now, and what use will it be to them later on? There is quite as much common sense displayed in this matter as there was in expecting the pupils of a native school in Calcutta to explain the meaning of the Tennysonian line, "Was proxy-wedded to a bootless calf." The idiocy was not on the part of the pupils, who gave up the riddle, but on the part of the examiners who proposed it. The best solution to the problem of why worthless fiction forms the bulk of popular reading lies in the teaching of literature in school. It is enough to beget a loathing of the best, even of what is fairly good, to be crammed with it. It is not uncommon for a class to be furnished, at the beginning of the year, with a list of a hundred or more books, comprising history, biography, poetry, criticism and fiction, all of which they are expected to read, learn, mark and inwardly digest, in addition to their other school tasks. It would be an undertaking for a mature mind, not to mention the disheartenment of having so much piled up before one, like all the dinners for a week displayed in one heap with orders to eat, and be about it betimes. It does not seem to occur to the modern educator that children have all their lives before them, and that there is no necessity for them to read everything within the brief space of their school life. It is worse than absurd to demand so much, and the failure which children make is the best proof of it. Let children of twelve years confine themselves to juveniles. Put better books within their reach, and as fast as they outgrow their childish favorites they will take up the others of their own accord. Let them express their own opinions about the things they can understand, but let us have an end to the utter imbecility of demanding estimates of Chaucer and Spencer, and Shakespeare and Bacon from infants who, in their secret hearts, prefer "The Sleeping Beauty" and "Jack the Giant Killer," to "Othello" and "Romeo and Juliet."

Converts Made by Hypnotism

The cat is out of the bag at last. At a Methodist Preachers' Meeting in New York the other day, Professor John Duncan Quackenbos lectured to the members on the value of hypnotic suggestion in the ministry. He said that it had a great value, and that the pastor could accomplish much that would otherwise be impossible in his flock, by employing hypnotism. The Rev. W. H. Lawrence said that Methodists have not been unaware that many of the so-called revivalists possess powers of hypnotism, and that as a result their converts have been able to speak better and truer than under ordinary circumstances. To hypnotism, then, may be ascribed the phenomena that one witnesses at those so-called revivalist meetings. People have been known to act on such occasions as though they were "possessed." If we are to believe the statements of Professor Quackenbos and Rev. W. H. Lawrence, it is not unlikely that the converts were under an hypnotic spell. If they were, it is unreasonable to assume that they were able "to speak better and truer than under ordinary circumstances," as Rev. Dr. Lawrence asserts. When a person speaks under hypnotic suggestion his utterances are controlled by the one exerting the hypnotic influence. Perhaps that is why people who proclaim themselves converts at revival meetings, and tell how good they intend to be thenceforth, go forth and sin more than ever. We believe that it was ex-Attorney-General W. H. H. Hart who created a great sensation at a meeting held by B. Fay Mills at the Mechanic's Pavilion some years ago by announcing that the germ of religion had entered his breast. People who knew Mr. Hart thought that he either had paresis or was "boosting" the Mills meeting. Who knows but that Mills hypnotized him?

The Saunterer

Mills Withdrew

Mr. William H. Mills, I have been reliably informed, has relieved Governor Gage of embarrassment. When Mr. Mills learned that the Governor had involved himself in complications by asking him to become a Regent of the State University he sent word to Mr. Gage to the effect that he did not desire the appointment, and that he hoped it would not be made. The Governor felt greatly relieved when he received the message, for the situation was an embarrassing one. Mr. Mills had never sought the appointment, and his availability was a matter of the Governor's own suggestion.

His Pet Pose

Governor Gage has always prided himself on his devotion to his friends. It has been urged in extenuation of many of the questionable acts of his Administration that he was prompted by loyalty to his friends, a very fine trait with which to cover a multitude of political blunders and sins against the commonwealth. It was the misfortune of Gage, perhaps, that he had friends to whom he could not vouchsafe the sort of loyalty they expected without being untrue to himself and the people whose interests he was sworn to protect. One of his latest manifestations of loyalty was in tendering a Supreme Court justiceship to his private secretary, Mr. Foley. This Mr. Foley was formerly the law partner in Los Angeles of Mr. Gage. His practice was not so large as to occasion grief on his part when he quit it to accept the secretaryship. Nobody ever suspected him of being qualified for a high judicial position. However, here was an opportunity for Mr. Gage to be good to himself as well as to his friend. As Mr. Gage is soon to resume the practice of law it would boom his business considerably if his ex-secretary were on the Supreme Bench, for that would be prima facie evidence that he was in touch with the court. At this writing Mr. Foley has about decided not to accept. Evidently he is not loyal to Gage.

The Return of Phelan

Back to town the other day came ex-Mayor James D. Phelan, whose official policy was antithetic to that of Henry T. Gage. Rather than pose as a loyal friend he preferred to make a record as the servant of the dear people. He headed one of those sporadic reform movements which are among the interesting phenomena of modern politics and which are always evanescent. He accomplished much good, but the results were not all that were hoped for. He contemplated many reforms and improvements that were never achieved, probably because the people began to mistrust the holier-than-thou reformers by whom he surrounded himself, and decided to have a change. A community will not sustain a government superior to the average probity of its active constituents, and the Phelan Administration gave promise of becoming too good. Morover, the people grew suspicious of the manner in which civil service was handled, and that their suspicions were well founded is evident from the fact that it is a farce today. Mr. Phelan was not satisfied with ordinary citizens for office. He went into the high-toned clubs and picked out smug and polished aristocrats to sustain him in running the government, and the experiment was a failure. Some of the men he boosted into office proved ingrates of the blackest hue, and, wearied of his efforts to reform the community, he went off to Europe to forget his failure in travel. On his return, after an absence of eleven months, the morning dailies took occasion to emphasize the unimportance of the man who a few years ago was exalted above all his fellow citizens, by scarcely mentioning his arrival. However, the ex-Mayor is far from being a has-been. His bank account would insure him against obscurity even though he possessed nothing else to keep him in touch with affairs.

When Roosevelt Comes

And by the way, he is destined to figure prominently in the functions incident to the reception to President Roosevelt in the spring. It was Mr. Phelan who issued the invitation as head of a Citizens' Committee, to the President to visit San Francisco, and the President's letter of acceptance addressed to the ex-Mayor was published a few weeks ago in all the leading Eastern papers. No doubt Mayor Schmitz will seek to do the honors on the arrival of the President, and perhaps there will be some lively tilts over questions of precedence.

The Career of Babcock

Madison Babcock, vice-principal of the Crocker school, has been charged with incompetency. Nothing strange in that. Mere incompetency is not sufficient ground upon which to remove a teacher of the San Francisco School Department. Many of them were incompetent when admitted. Mr. Babcock was imported from Sacramento about twelve years ago to act as chief deputy under Superintendent Anderson. After filling the position two terms he was elected Superintendent of Schools. At the expiration of his term he was placed in charge of a night school, but the duties were too severe for a man who had been filling an easy political berth at the City Hall. So he was shifted to the vice-principalship of the Fairmount Grammar School. The principal, Miss Johnston, soon discovered that he was not equal to the exigencies of the position. She so reported and thereupon Mr. Babcock's pull landed him in one of the finest positions of the department—the vice-principalship of the Crocker. I am curious to know what will happen now in view of the latest charges.

Ruef is So Busy

While on the subject of the School Department I am reminded that Miss McFarland has not yet won her fight for a principalship. However, I have learned that Mr. Ruef has about completed a deal by which his sister will be promoted without affecting the prospects of Miss McFarland. Perhaps Mr. Ruef has no time to give to school department affairs these days for he has been very busy negotiating a deal involving the Police Commissionership. It is regarded as the fattest plum in the gift of his Honor the Mayor, and no doubt it is not to be lightly considered. Honors of that sort are not thrown away

Ruef Losing His Grip

Apropos the appointments soon to be announced by the Mayor it is interesting to note indications that the hypnotic influence of Mr. Ruef is on the wane. I understand that Mayor Schmitz is to appoint that eminent young attorney, John J. Barrett, a Fire Commissioner to succeed John H. Grady. Barrett is of that element in the legal profession which does not approve of Ruef methods. His appointment will reflect credit on the Administration, and may be accepted as an indication of a desire on the part of the Mayor to correct certain irregularities in the Fire Department. Almost as soon as the job-chasing Grady was appointed, one of his relatives was made the purchasing agent of the department, and it is now said that all the merchants who have been furnishing supplies to the department petitioned the Mayor to retain Grady as Fire Commissioner. I have also heard that as a consequence of the manipulations of the clique in control of the commission, Chief Sullivan has complained that the department was threatened with demoralization and I've also heard that the Chief was thinking of resigning in disgust. And yet all this time the department was under the control of those high-toned gentlemen, Mike Hecht and Rolla V. Watt, who were appointed by Mayor Phelan. Mr. Hecht is one of the eminent merchants who have been making Mr. Grady's fight.

Significance of the Appointment

The appointment of Barrett, by the way, will greatly shock Mr. McNab and the Monticello Club. Barrett has never been identified with the McNab push. On the contrary he has been associated with Governor Budd and James H. O'Brien in the movement to crush the McNab faction. In complying with the law which provides for non-partisan commissions Mayor Schmitz was required to appoint a Democrat to succeed Grady, and in selecting Barrett he intimates that he believes the McNab organization to be defunct.

The Fraternal Pull

Fire Commissioner John H. Grady, who is a persistent, professional job chaser, had hoped to be reappointed on the earnest recommendation of his confreres of the N. S. G. W.. If the fraternal pull is worth anything I should suggest that Jim Denman enlist the support of the Masons or any other fraternal society to which he belongs in his behalf. Mr. Denman has been a tax-eater all his life, and he is now doing his second term on earth but he is still quite willing to feed at the public crib. And there is Martin Fleming of the Y. M. I. who wants to succeed Denman. Why shouldn't the Y. M. I. come to the front for Fleming who is also an experienced tax-eater? Mr. Fleming is the gentleman who was always threatening to bolt the Democratic convention if it didn't nominate his friend Haley for County Clerk so that he (Fleming) could be retained as Chief Deputy. He is now posing as a representative Democrat and he wants to be a School Director. If Grady has the support of the N. S. G. W. why shouldn't the Y. M. I. come to the front for Fleming, and the A. P. A. join hands for F. A. Hyde? Grady, by the way, has a record as Tax Collector, which has never been satisfactorily cleared up. He was very lucky at one time to escape indictment but he appears to be as active as ever in chasing jobs.

Big Money for the Toga

The tip is being industriously circulated among the members of the Legislature that a "dark horse" is being groomed for the toga, and that Colonel Burns and Martin Kelly have been authorized to spend one hundred thousand dollars for the prize. Those on the inside who are engaged in trying to persuade legislators to keep out of the caucus declare that Irving M. Scott is not the angel. They say that Scott was quite willing to make a fight against Perkins, but that he appraised the toga at too small a figure. The opposition is said to be behind a man who has enlisted the support of certain powerful influences, and the representatives of the Burns-Kelly combination promise to open the biggest barrel that was ever tapped at Sacramento. Indeed, there is already to be heard the tintinnabulation that so metallically wells from the coins that have been sent into circulation by way of evidence of the affluence of the opposition. And now it really looks as though the fight against Perkins is to be conducted on something more substantial than "jawbone."

Might Have Been Worse

From the Examiner's account of the Bohemian Club's jinks it is to be inferred that the affair was somewhat sacrilegious. From what I have heard of certain features that were programmed but not executed, I am quite certain that the entertainment was not half so bad as it might have been. Gelett Burgess is a gay rogue, but his humor is so broad that it should be carefully edited even when intended for a low jinks. I do not know whether a certain pictured fence bearing a vulgar inscription was the product of his genius, but he was the sire of the low jinks, and it was a committee that decided that the fence should be barred.

A Matinee Idol's Fall

A brief despatch from Greenwich, Connecticut, last Monday told of the marriage there of William Faversham, the renowned Frohman matinee idol and Julie Opp, the actress who is also under the same distinguished management. I recall that a few months ago Mr. Faversham's wife, who was not an actress, obtained a divorce from him. His friends and admirers accused her of unfounded jealousy and credited him with heroic self-sacrifice in making no defense. He went so far as to offer to furnish his wife with a co-respondent, though he disclaimed his guilt. In the financial settlement he was very generous. The magnetic William had bought a seventy-five thousand dollar residence with money made in Wall street, and he turned the property over to his wife. Throughout the controversy he sighed like an injured innocent, and vowed that never again would he permit himself to be influenced by lovely woman. Miss Opp was his leading lady at the time of the divorce. She was Maritana to his Don Cæsare de Bazan in a most comic opera like production of "A Royal Rival," in which our own Edwin Stevens played the villain. One hears a good deal about Miss Opp's talent but she is an unattractive woman, though there is about six feet of her, and she is far from being a histrionic artist. Judicious advertising has helped her wonderfully. And by the way she was recently divorced from her husband.

Gallant Admiral Wildes

Rear Admiral Frank D. Wildes, second in command to Robley D. Evans of the Asiatic naval station, is on his way to this city, having been "condemned" by a medical board and ordered home. Admiral Wildes is spoken of in the navy as the man who followed the advice of Lawrence by saying, "I won't give up my ship." Two months before the war with Spain he was ordered detached from the cruiser Boston, then at Hong Kong, and directed to return home, his tour of sea duty having expired. Captain Benjamin P. Lamberton was ordered to the Asiatic station to relieve him. Lamberton arrived just as war was about to be declared and Wildes refused to give up his ship. He was so anxious to get into the fight that he was willing to risk the consequences of refusing to obey the Navy Department's order. Lamberton was quite as anxious to get the ship as Wildes was to retain it. After a somewhat bitter controversy Admiral Dewey with his usual tact effected a compromise. He appointed Lamberton his chief of staff and permitted Wildes to keep the Boston. When the battle of Manila Bay was fought Wildes commanded his ship and Lamberton stood on the bridge of the Olympia with Dewey. For his services Wildes was advanced five points. He was promoted to the grade of Rear Admiral on October 10, 1901.

Calve was Jilted

When Madame Calve was in this city she confided to a friend that though many men had loved her she had loved but one and that one was Henri Cain, the painter and librettist. She even confessed that it was to excite his jealousy that she had once pretended a mad passion for another, but they had at last come to an understanding and were to be married on her return to Europe. That friend received a letter from Madame Calve some months ago informing her that the ceremony would soon take place, but last week, according to the despatches, Henri Cain was married to a soprano, but not however to the popular soprano of the Grau company. The bride was formerly Mademoisell Guirandou of the Opera Comique. So the probability is that the great Carmen was jilted.

A Local Composer Offended

Emile Bruguiere announced the other day that he intended to give Allan Wallace a dinner before the latter abandoned bachelorhood. "And," said he, "all the music on that occasion will be of my own composition." Fred Hotaling suggested that the function would be more enjoyable if the works of other composers were called into requisition. And now Hotaling and Bruguiere do not speak as they pass by.

Pursued by Her Admirer

About a year ago, when Lurline Spreckels was in Paris, the news came to me that she had captivated a representative of the French nobility, and that a match was very likely to be made. I published the story and it caused a sensation in social circles. Though it has never been confirmed, it is undoubtedly true that a Frenchman with a title was captivated by the charming Californienne. But the captivation was not mutual. The latest report is that the titled Frenchman does not consider his passion hopeless, notwithstanding the fact that he was not encouraged. I hear that he has come all the way to California to renew his suit, and that he has been prosecuting it with phenomenal persistency. The fact is that French titles are no longer of any value. The Republican Government of France has decided to abolish titles, and reduce the nobility to the level of ordinary citizenship. A French count has no longer anything to offer but his heart and hand. So an American heiress has now no occasion to be flattered by the wooing of one of the defunct nobility.

A Game of Hearts

As the story goes, it was not the ciphers in Miss Lurline's dot that lured the Frenchman from over the seas, but her own fascinating personality. He caught a glimpse of la belle Californienne at a Paris theatre, lost his heart to the fair vision, begged an introduction, and haunted the Gus Spreckels home ever after. Though Lurline would not smile on her titled adorer's suit, her mamma, it is said, was not so much averse to having a nobleman for a son-in-law. The Frenchman, by the way, is a great art lover. Perhaps if Miss Lurline still refuses to look seriously upon his suit, some other San Francisco girl may succeed in catching the heart and title in the rebound. A mutual taste for art could help the affair along.

Lurline Not the Only One

Miss Spreckels, en passant, is not the only girl in local society whom a foreign nobleman has "chased." There was Anna Voorhies, who was pursued to the very altar where she stood with Tom Bishop, by an Austrian with titles galore. The Austrian fell in love with the San Francisco girl when she was traveling on the continent. And until his rival's ring closed around the third finger of that fair left hand he would not believe his suit was unavailing. Mrs. Bishop, by the way, has recovered from her late illness, having successfully passed through an operation for appendicitis.

A Mine of Good Stories Gone

I suppose that nearly every newspaperman that ever did the "Police detail" tried at one time or another to get the late ex-Chief of Police Lees to give up his invaluable detective reminiscences. But he never would. "Billy" Hart came the nearest to getting them, and "Billy," who was closer to him than any man of the craft, was staved off with the indefinite "some day." Now, poor "Billy" and the chief are both gone across the line and no one will ever read those reminiscences. The other day a newspaperman related the following yarn to illustrate the reason why Chief Lees declined to make public his detective experiences: In the early days of his life on the force he arrested a strapping young fellow. Lees was taking him to the station when the prisoner suddenly drew a revolver and placing it against his captor's stomach, fired six shots in rapid succession. Lees fell back at the shock, fully believing he was mortally wounded, and the prisoner made his escape. Later on he reached the station and asked to be examined. It was then discovered that the prisoner must have held the revolver at an angle, for six big welts on the flesh was all that showed under a silk handkerchief that Lees happened to be wearing next his skin. In after years, according to Lees, he ran across his assailant in California street; the man was then a wealthy merchant and high in the social standing of the community. Lees always told some anecdote of this kind to show that he would not be acting right in giving names and details connected with his recollections as a detective.

The Philanderer's Friend

The report from the Probate Court that the estate of the veteran detective is worth less than three hundred thousand dollars will no doubt surprise many people who believed years ago that he had amassed a fortune of over a million. During his career as chief of detectives he had many opportunities to render valuable service to rich people, and it was generally understood that he was paid liberally. Lees was more familiar with the family skeletons that rattled their bones in the mansions on Nob Hill than any other individual, and many a secret was interred with him. He was always quick to respond whenever the love affair of a prominent citizen threatened to create scandal, and he negotiated scores of deals by which persistent females were induced to cease their importunities. From the days of Charley Crocker down to that memorable occasion when Dick McDonald's wife Clara Belle eloped with Seneca Swalm, Captain Lees rescued many a lustful millionaire from the direful consequences of his amorous escapades.

He Espoused Sharon's Cause

Captain Lees did good work for Senator Sharon during the stormy period when Sarah Althea Hill and her band of conspirators were trying to annex a large slice of the fortune of that antique flirt. Lees was most bitterly denounced for his activity in the interest of Sharon. I recall a meeting called by William M. Nielson in B'nai B'rith hall for the purpose of telling people what he knew about Lees. The detective was paid liberally for his work, but at the close of the case he demanded more and there was a very lively dispute over his claim. The same sort of dispute ensued at the close of the Fair case in which Lees was also active. There is no doubt that Lees was one of the most accomplished detectives that this country ever produced. Bill Pinkerton, the Chicago hawkshaw, told me a year ago that the police all over the country regarded Lees as America's premier detective.

A Champion of Penuriousness

The Chaperon has been at it again. She has been praising Glayds Merrill for being content with a simple seal ring as an engagement band, and condemning the scion of a wealthy family, presumably Jack Spreckels, for being so extravagant as to pay one thousand dollars for the little token of his engagement to the girl who is now his wife. Pray, why should our rich and fashionable youth economize in such matters? There has been too much hoarding of wealth in our smart set. Stinginess is its chief characteristic. Instead of censuring a young man with millions to get for "loosening up" to the extent of a thousand dollars to purchase a ring for his sweetheart, the Chaperon should praise him for his generosity. That is a rare enough trait nowadays, and let us not discourage those who are inclined to give it rein. Too many of the sons of our skin-flint millionaires are like their fathers. Many of those that acquired a fortune without a struggle are clutching it so tightly that one might suspect them of being afflicted with incessant visions of the Alms House. They are too penurious to indulge in foreign travel, a diversion, by the way, calculated to broaden the mind and induce the habit of enjoying one's income.

The Emerald Did the Trick

And by the way, it sometimes behooves the young man in quest of a wife to seal the compact with the finest and prettiest ring he is able to purchase. The gentle sex is partial to costly jewelry, and women have been known to hesitate up to the very moment the ring was produced. I have heard that Mrs. Walter Martin did not give a decided answer the night of the Lester ball, but that nevertheless Walter, who is no laggard in love, sent the ring the next day. It was a magnificent emerald that would enthuse almost any girl. Mary Scott, that was, wore the ring over to the Hopkins house that day, and the girls raved over it so that perhaps they influenced her in deciding to have it "for keeps."

A craze for old-fashioned jewelry has developed in the smart set, and those of our belles whose mothers possessed none in their youth are raiding the second-hand shops in search of articles that may be worn as heirlooms.

Dr. Flint's Fiancee

Miss Apperson, Mrs. Hearst's niece, whose engagement with Dr. Flint of the University of California Medical College was recently announced, is a girl of rarely delicate beauty. She has never elected to take part in the gayeties of our smart set, preferring the more serious and intellectual cult fostered by Mrs. Hearst. Miss Apperson has never been Sunday-supped as a beauty, but she has far greater physical attractions than most of the paper-made beauties of the ton. Dr. Flint came to California at the solicitation of Mrs. Hearst to accept a position on the staff of the medical college, and her niece's choice of him as a future husband is very gratifying to the university's Lady Bountiful.

The Hartopp Case

Aileen Woods, the San Francisco song bird who is having her voice trilled by the London masters, writes me that the Hartopp divorce case is still the principal topic of conversation. The jury took the view that there was nothing to choose between the couple; that it was a case of the pot calling the kettle black. Miss Woods says that the people in the courtroom seemed to regard it as delicious as an epigrammatic problem. When Lady Hartopp was ordered to pay Mrs. Sands, whom she had named as corespondent, costs amounting to four thousand five hundred dollars, Lady Hartopp's relatives, the Wilsons and their allies, groaned, and made caustic remarks that every one could hear. Altogether, the costs of the suit are one hundred thousand dollars, of which Lord Hartopp must pay about sixty thousand dollars. Miss Woods writes that as the nobleman has only about three thousand dollars a year at present, his sympathizers started a private subscription to help him out, the Grand Duke Michael and the Duke of Devonshire heading the list.

Back to the Old Home

What a lot of old Californians are coming back to us. Some of them had shaken the dust of San Francisco from their feet for good and all, and their return goes to prove what a cinch the State has on those who have ever lived within its limits. In the first place there is Joe Redding, who will be with us again by and by, "to end his days in California," as he is reported to have said, much to the delight of his friends in general and the members of the Bohemian Club in particular. But when Joe went to New York he said he only did so to "make money to live in San Francisco." C. P. Huntington kindly died and enabled him to achieve riches. John Hays Hammond is also to become a resident again of the Golden State. Early in the spring Mrs. Henry Schmiedell will return. With her son-in-law and daughter, the George H. Howards, she has spent the last year or two in Europe.

Have Many Friends Here

In the event of General Leonard Wood coming to California as Commanding General of this department, he will find a large family connection ready at hand. Mrs. Wood's father, Mr. Condit-Smith of Washington, married as his second wife Sally Swearingen of California and she has been more of a sister to her husband's grown daughters than a stepmother. Mrs. Smith's mother, Mrs. Swearingen, kept an old-fashioned Southern boarding house here in San Francisco away back in the fifty decade. Among her boarders were Judge Stephen C. Field, who married the eldest daughter Susan; George Whitney, who became the husband of Molly, the second daughter, and Andrew McCreery, who wedded the youngest daughter, Belle. Sally Swearingen, the third in line, was woed and won by Mr. Smith while she was visiting Mrs. Field. Mrs. Whitney, who has always resided in Oakland, has a large family of daughters, most of whom are married. So Mrs. Wood, if she comes, will not be a stranger in a strange land.

He Is a Genius

It may be of interest to the friends of Mr. Gelett Burgess to know that he really is a genius. He may not be entitled to rank as a literary genius, but as a cook he has Mr. Raphael Weill, as Billy Baxter would say, "lashed to the mast." There is not a chef in San Francisco so skilled in the art of cooking a duck. So hereafter the friends of the author of the "Purple Cow" should pardon his eccentricities, for those who have sampled his cooking have no hesitation in declaring that he is a genius. And for eccentricity he is without a peer. It is by his eccentric works that he is best known, and it is owing to the infrequency of his lucid intervals that he has achieved a reputation for individuality. For instance, at dinners, he never cuts a cake in the usual way. He prefers square pieces of abnormal size. At intervals he arises and requests every fourth person to change places, and then everybody who considers it an honor to know an author says, "Isn't he original?" He never thanks his hostess for entertaining him, and he usually turns his back to people to whom he has just been introduced. On such occasions it is to be presumed that he is in deep thought. However, Mr. Burgess has done some very clever and weird things. One of the queerest things he ever wrote was a song entitled, "My Mamma's at the Morgue," which he sang at one of the Bohemian Club jinks. I have heard that when he was in London he was greatly admired by Lady Colin Campbell, the sister-in-law of the Duke of Argyle. She is the lady whose husband sued her for a divorce, mentioning half a dozen co-respondents.

A Journalistic Star

Mrs. Mary Davison Chambers, better known in New York as Kate Carew, started her journalistic career in this city a few years ago. She used to draw beautiful pictures of women for the Examiner. She was a very pretty young widow when here, but now she is the wife of "Harrie" Chambers who was also on the Examiner. He is a brother of Haddon Chambers, the well-known playwright. Since leaving San Francisco "Kate Carew" has interviewed everybody of importance on both sides of the ocean. She always illustrates her own interviews. From a mutual friend I learned that she has one of the cosiest homes in New York, and that she is recognized as one of the great successes of New York journalism. Her salary on the World is one hundred dollars a week.

Our Literary Set

Mr. Wallace Irwin of "Omar Jr." fame and author of "The Love Sonnets of a Hoodlum" has retired from his journalistic position and taken to writing on his own account. He made over two thousand dollars out of his jingle and is now at work on a comic opera. He also has an order from Fischer's for a burlesque. Mrs. Irwin is writing a novel. The Irwins belong to what is known as the Russian Hill literary set. The Will Irwins live up there too, as also do the Shepards of Elder & Shepard, Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson, Howard Holmes the architect and the Rev. Mr. Wooster. The Frank Deerings expect to be located there in February, and Gelett Burgess lives not far away. The Moores have built a very handsome residence on the northern slope of the hill and will soon occupy it.

Anna Stronsky, who wrote "The Love Letters of Professor Wace" in collaboration with Jack London, has gone East. She intends entering upon a literary career in New York. After attending to the publication of her book she will make a trip to her home in Russia. Miss Stronsky is a Jewess, and her brothers are bright business men in this city.

Her Quaint Apparel

Miss Ethyl Hager's street costumes are as original in design as those by which she startles people at fancy dress balls. I saw her recently under a curious hat worn with a blue walking suit. It was a blue felt and looked like a garden hat. There were streamers attached fully a foot long, hanging down her back. She also carried a brown fox muff and wore a boa of the same.

The Sacred Slate of Berkeley

President Wheeler of Berkeley has on more than one occasion urged the students to cultivate the acquaintance of the professors. He thinks that the spirit of bonhomie should be fostered in the institution, and it certainly should. No man is a successful educator who holds himself aloof from his pupils. No system of education is complete that does not include character-building as one of its features, and unless the educator mingles with the students beyond the confines of the lecture-room he cannot achieve satisfactory results. However the views of all the members of the Berkeley faculty are not in accord with those of President Wheeler. There is Professor Slate for instance, who evidently believes that he is paid by the State merely to impart instruction during certain hours. During all other times students must keep at a distance from his sacred person. They should never seek to intrude. When a student visited him one day and started to address him this highly important pedagogue pointed to the door and vouchsafed the information that it was the door. Another student who called on Slate at the suggestion of another professor to get his consent to a certain proposition of considerable importance, was curtly told that he would have to defer his business. He declined even to hear what the young man had to say. I am of the opinion that Professor Slate is not in sympathy with the aspirations of the students at Berkeley. He is evidently engrossed with other things. He should be permitted to go to some nice, quiet spot where there is no danger of his meditations being interrupted.

The Pilgrim Mothers Shocked

The Pilgrim Mothers invited Josephine Dodge Daskam to address them the other day under the auspices of the New York Legislative League. She was expected to talk about woman suffrage and she did, but not in a way to please the Pilgrim Mothers. On the contrary Josie shocked them. During her talk the atmosphere must have felt as though it were congealed. The good Pilgrim ladies who want to vote were no doubt astounded to hear Miss Daskam say that her advice to a young girl in doubt was to "hang on to her privileges and let her rights go." They should have called a halt then but they didn't, and continuing Josephine said:

"If you cannot in this generation get your vote, you always can get your voter. Women have always influenced men, and I don't see but what that's just as good. . . . I think there's a great deal of unnecessary twaddle these days about the increasing strenuousness of the young girl . . . A woman to be successful must be good and she must be charming. You may think of her charm as her parliamentary ability, her oratorical power or her excellent canning of peaches, but she has got to have it. And if she is not good the world can't progress. There may be something interesting in the bad woman, but she can't perpetuate nations, and after all that was the main purpose of our creation, I think. If a woman is good and nothing else, she will be as dull as anything the world ever made."

Of course in the opinion of the Pilgrim Mothers, Miss Daskam is an unregenerate young thing who should not be permitted to associate with intelligent women. But Miss Daskam must have enjoyed the consternation she created.

The Zionist Movement

There is considerable agitation in the Eastern States over Zionism or the movement for the revival of the original spirit of Judaism. It has given rise to a controversy between Jewish factions which is almost as bitter as the disputes between some of the jarring Christian sects. The number of American Jews identified with the Zionistic movement is comparatively small. Out of nearly a million and a half Jews in the United States, the Federation of American Zionists has a membership of only seven or eight thousand. The opposition to the movement is strong. Rabbi Silverman of the Temple Emanu-el in New York has been protesting against it most assiduously. He argues that its tendency is to accentuate race barriers, and he argues that they should be torn down. In a recent address he urged the Jews of the New York Ghetto to "tear down from their shops their polyglot signs and root out of their hearts this love of the deformed and teach their children the language and manners of their associates * * throw aside the vain customs of the olden time and take on those of the young nation with which they have cast their lot." He ridiculed the argument that the Yiddish jargon used in the Ghetto is necessary for the preservation of the race. Max Nordau contends that the Jewish people can be freed from poverty only by leading a normal existence on their own soil, but Rabbi Silverman asserts that Nordau is all wrong, and that the Zionist program is an impossible dream. Nevertheless the movement is making progress.

Not Such a Glorious Victory

Though the local dailies have said that James J. Hill and his allies in Seattle failed in their effort to wrest control of the Government transport business from this city, that is not the view of the matter held by financiers and people familiar with the projects and enterprises of the great railroad magnate of the Northwest. They credit him with having scored a big victory, and such appears to be the case though our merchants seem to be laboring under the delusion that the situation has taken on a roseate hue. Secretary Root decided that for the time being the Government service should be operated from San Francisco. Nevertheless a contract was awarded to the Boston Steamship Company, which has close connections with Hill's interests, whereby troops and supplies may be transported from Seattle. The quantity to be sent over the Northern route is left entirely to the discretion of the Secretary of War. The Seattle interests in making the bid stipulated that at least seventy-five per cent of the Government's Philippine business should go through Seattle, but Secretary Root declared that to be an impossible condition, and it was withdrawn. From a Washington correspondent I learn that Mr. Harriman was opposed to the granting of the contract to the Seattle company even without the condition named, but failed to influence Secretary Root. So unquestionably Mr. Hill scored a victory. His main purpose was to break into the Government's business, and he was quite gleeful over having inserted the entering wedge. He informed some friends in Washington that the great struggle for control of the commerce of the Pacific had commenced, and that he was confident that Secretary Root would make an equitable division of the Government business, because in the fight between Seattle and San Francisco the War Department purposed maintaining a neutral attitude.

The Result of Rivalry

However, San Francisco will have no occasion to regret the titanic struggle between the great captains of finance and industry. On the contrary it should lead to rejoicing over improved railroad facilities, for Hill has aroused the ire of Harriman, and H. E. Huntington, who recently doubled his fortune by sagacious investments, has joined hands with the Southern Pacific president, and together they should be able to give Mr. Hill the fight of his life. It is by reason of the existing rivalry that Harriman has projected the great improvements by which he expects to reduce the time between San Francisco and New York to three and one-half days. When he was in Washington he dined with the President and informed him that his corporation was expending ten millions of dollars in the reconstruction of the Union Pacific, straightening curves, reducing grades, putting in steel and stone culverts and laying the heaviest steel rails. Plans are being perfected for a tunnel under the Sierra Nevada range near Truckee, and he expects to complete all improvements within three years, and have as perfect a system as that of the Pennsylvania Railroad. And perhaps in the meanwhile he will shake up that moribund combination of the Pacific Mail, Occidental and Oriental and Toyo, Kisen, Kaisha lines, which is managed in a way calculated to drive traffic to Hill's steamship company. Mr. Harriman has been quoted as saying that there is great room for improvement in the steamship business on this coast.

Coming War Among the Druggists

The most strenuous battle for business supremacy in local commercialdom is going to take place in the drug field. The outcome is likely to be the same as in the sugar, coal and meat melees and I doubt very much whether the public will reap any benefit out of the scrap. The present contest, however, differs in one particular from these others: it is a combination to hammer the middleman. Once he is effectually squelched I suppose the delighted squeezers will turn to the usual and more profitable occupation of mulcting the public.

Chance for the Great Unbleached

From a very reliable source I have it that about seventy-five percent of the retail druggists of this city have signed themselves into a cast iron organization to do away with the jobbers. They have subscribed a handsome cash capital to buy drugs, wholesale and in car lots: hence they have no use for middlemen. The drugs will be warehoused and drawn on by the different subscribers according to the needs of each. The cost of stock will therefore be reduced for them to the net wholesale rate plus the cost of handling which has been reduced to a minimum. The big cut-rate drug stores about town are not in this new combine. For a long time they have been buying their goods in this wholesale manner and there is no inducement for them to join the new combination. The new combination, however, has planned to scale down prices in the hope that the cut-rate shops will be glad to come to them and agree on a uniform rate to be charged throughout the city on all drugs and druggists' materials. While the new combine is lowering prices to frighten the cut-rate shops into the "trust" fold there may possibly be a chance to raid the drug stores and drag away armfuls of lotions, potions, powders, creams and cerates at reduced rates. So let loose the pomatumed and beperfumed dogs of war.

His Opinion of California Women

Dr. Lorenz, the Vienna physician who has attained celebrity through his treatment of crippled children, was here long enough to form an opinion of California women. In a recent letter to a physician here who has been in correspondence with him since his flying visit, he says: "The American woman is the superior of her European sisters, for she combines superiority in three characteristics—the esthetic, the physical and the intellectual. My experience with California women outside of nurses has not been very extensive, but I have seen enough of them to form an exalted opinion. It is this rare combination of beauty, health and intellect that impresses me most. The outdoor exercises she takes make her a fine specimen physically; her carriage is excellent, her cheeks glow with health. It is this fine athletic training that makes her a superior part of the race. She is the best-fitted woman to become the mother of fine children."

The Faded Lily

Mrs. Lily Langtry is once more in this country, and the dailies have published the rumor that an English Earl with an historic name is in her train. Our immigration laws should be amended to bar celebrities of the Langtry type, for they are as great a menace to the morals of the country as the problem plays from Paris and London. The morals of the Jersey Lily may not be so loose as they have been represented, but she has thrived on her reputation for unconventionality, and it appears to be taken for granted that she is no better than the stories that have been printed about her indicate. Sarah Bernhardt is popularly known as a woman with a contempt for virtue, but her genius has in a measure sheltered her shortcomings. The Jersey Lily has nothing to commend her to popular attention except faded beauty, a speckled past and a capacity for augmenting a record for amorous dalliance. Of course she may not be to blame for the presence of the Earl but it is not conducive to public morals to put into circulation the story that she has another love affair on hand. Lily Langtry is once more a married woman, and though she may regard a husband as a mere trifle, under the circumstances the pursuing Earl should not be paraded even for advertising purposes. It is not the first time that the actress has been accompanied by a lover in cognito. Freddy Gebhard was "under cover" when he came to this city with her on her first visit. She was then the wife of Mr. Langtry.

Just Before the Prayer

Down at Stanford they are laughing over an incident that occurred at the recent laying of the corner stone of the university's million dollar gymnasium. This dedication, although quietly observed on a stormy day, was really a great event in the history of the university. Speeches were made by Dr. Jordan, the Rev. Heber Newton, the New York clergyman who has been brought to fill the pulpit of the Stanford Memorial Chapel, and by many of the faculty. The corner-stone was then lowered into place, and declared "duly and truly" laid. This done the university chaplain advanced to the front of the platform to pronounce the benediction, and all heads were bared. One of two workmen standing by the stone at once doffed his cap, but the other showed no signs of doing likewise. Turning to his companion, the first, cap in hand, said in a hoarse whisper, that could be distinctly heard by the throng, "Take off your hat, dammit, can't you see he's going to pray?"

Zelie the Much Admired

Zelie de Lussan announced her engagement this week, and she says she intends to retire from the stage and lead a quiet, bourgeois existence hereafter. The beautiful Zelie is considered by some critics to be the greatest Carmen of the operatic stage. That she is fascinating, I am sure, for did she not inspire one of our local versesmiths to apostrophize her in an ode on one occasion? Zelie's admirers are from all classes and professions. One was a San Francisco factory hand, and the witching Carmen always preserved the letter he wrote in which he said, "There is a don't-care about your movements, and you are yet so graceful that one must needs be reminded of a purring pussy cat."

The Examiner's Chief Editor

Mr. Dent Robert, managing editor of the Examiner, is making his annual visit to the home of his parents in St. Louis. Mr. Robert began his newspaper career in St. Louis, and it was his reputation established in that city that won for him the position he now occupies. He is now regarded as one of the most able men on Mr. Hearst's long salary-roll. He is a thorough newspaperman, and a cultured gentleman. He possesses exceptional executive ability, a fact attested by the perfect harmony which has prevailed in the Examiner office ever since he assumed the managing editorship.

Our Inhuman Shopkeepers

Now that our holiday shopping season is over I should like to call the attention of the proper authorities to the methods of some of our storekeepers. Not only should an effort be made to force them to comply with the sanitary regulations, but they should also be required to work their clerks in shifts. It is inhuman to compel men and women to work fourteen and fifteen consecutive hours, and it is outrageous to keep them during that period in a basement, the atmosphere of which is foul. And by the way, I understand that the female clerks in some of the stores are prohibited from sitting down when there are no customers in sight. Some years ago there was considerable agitation over the cruelty of employers, and shopkeepers were compelled to put in stools for the accommodation of the women. The stools have not been removed but they are merely ornamental. As the shopkeepers reap a great harvest during the holiday season they could afford to be generous but they are not. One of the largest retail firms which advertised for college students to work as extra clerks during the holiday season paid as high as one dollar a day to the young men who worked from eight-thirty a. m. until ten p. m.

In cases where teeth are filled with anything but gold or platinum, it should not be used. As a cleanser of sores and wounds it is the best microbe destroyer known. Its action in cases of throat trouble is wonderfully prompt and effective, while for skin diseases it acts like magic. The fact that it is absolutely harmless makes it a safe family remedy. Out of Mourning—Presto!

Lady Bache-Cunard has been arousing the comment of New York's society knockers because she recently attended the opera, in white satin and jewels, when she should still have been mourning for her step-papa, "Jim" Tichenor. Lady Cunard, who was Maud Bourke of Oakland, ward of Horace Carpentier and jilted of Prince Poniatowski, came over from England lately to see her step-papa before he died. But he had passed away before the liner made New York.

Culture in Oakland

The editor of a "literary department" across the bay regrets that the works of great writers, enumerating under this head in the following order, Lew Wallace, George Cable, Hall Caine and Thomas Hardy, were neglected, while those of mediocre talent, Barrie, Maclaren, Weyman and Kipling commanded readers. Oakland always was a cultured city, but I never knew the reason why. Now I can understand. It derives its culture from literary departments conducted by editors who class Hall Caine and Lew Wallace as great writers. But why was Carrie Morelli left out? I have been under the impression that that dear old girl was the author of "best sellers" in Oakland. And why hark back to Hardy when Carrie Morelli is still on deck?

Mrs. Castle in Canada

Mrs. Neville Castle, who, as Mary Scott, was quite popular in local society some years ago, and whose stage debut occasioned the usual flattering comment, has been heard from. She is now touring Canada under the management of George Brennan, the New York manager who bought out Kathryn Kidder last year. She has met with success in the role of Polly in "Caste." The company is headed this way.

Will Hardly Find Rest There

Marie Voorhies is going to Washington in a few days with view to a "rest" after an arduous round of gayety here, which often necessitated taking in four functions in a single day. But it is not likely that Miss Voorhies will find repose in the nation's capital, which is not at its gayest. She will visit her sister Kate, Mrs. Malcolm Henry, who is in the thick of the Washington swim. The Scott connections, too, will entertain Miss Voorhies, whose youngest sister married Guy Scott, son of the West Virginian Senator.

Gayety at Del Monte

They are having a gay winter season at Del Monte. On Christmas Eve the guests of the hotel and the officers of the Fifteenth Infantry and the Ninth Cavalry had a very pleasant dance, and there was another on New Year's eve. The special railroad service to Del Monte has been greatly improved. There is a train that leaves this city at three p. m. which makes the trip in three hours and forty-five minutes, and it leaves Del Monte at eight-thirty a. m., making the same time to this city.

Society Danseuses

Another society girl is going to follow the example of Ysodora Duncan and Jean Logan, and become a professional danseuse. This is Ynez Dibblee, of the most exclusive circles of Southern California. The dramatic recruit from society promises to be quite eclipsed by the society girl who can dance. There are at least a dozen San Francisco girls of the inner circle who can do a pas seul almost as well as a professional skirt-shaker. When a society girl has the dancing temperament there's no mechanical one-two-three about it. It's soul and skirts and sparkling shoes.

Right on Top in London

The Bonynges gave a dinner in London during Christmas week at which the guest of honor was the Princess of Schlesswig-Holstein. Nothing perhaps shows more clearly how old traditions have been cast aside, in London society, for new and liberal ideas. Old San Franciscans will remember Mr. Bonynge, who worked in a livery stable here years and years ago. He was a pleasant chap and made friends among the stable's patrons, and they gave him tips on mining stocks. Through his tips he made money, and later in Virginia City during boom times as a curbstone broker he added to his store. Returning to San Francisco he married and then took his bride to London. Their daughter married Lord Deerhurst, who is so popular down Blingum way, and whose cousin the Earl of Craven married Miss Bradley-Martin.

The Innes-Robinson Wedding

What a sensible wedding that was of Miss Ida Robinson, daughter of C. P. Robinson, and Mr. Innes, which was solemnized a day or two before Christmas. A few telephone messages to intimate friends and relatives to be on hand the next afternoon, no fuss, flurry, hurry or worry, but the knot was tied and they were both just as happy as if the wedding had been less informal.

Theosophists Watching Mrs. Tingley

This highly interesting game of casting out bad spirits and juggling with good ones has been going on for æons and æons, but it never got down to modern business methods till the Fox sisters cracked their toe joints and got into communication with the next world at so much per seance. Mrs. Tingley is having her try at it: she has her own individual methods but she is finding out that the trip to Nirvana is not all it is advertised to be. She is working the field of theosophy, just over the border line of spiritualism, but like all such schemes of work, whenever money is involved, it has ended in a competent court of jurisdiction. I am told that a large number of theosophical societies contributed largely to her Point Loma scheme at San Diego. To her likewise was entrusted the carrying out of certain details. They were so managed that after a time Mrs. Tingley had practically everything in her pocket. These societies are now closely watching the trial of the libel suit going on at San Diego and if it is discovered that Mrs. Tingley has been working for Mrs. T. there is likely to follow some lively inquiries not set down in theosophical lore.

More Claims of Spiritualists

Mr. Peebles, the eighty year old apostle of the Spiritist cult, who circles the globe stirring up the cause, unfolded to me, the other day, the spiritualist claims regarding Stanford University. "In their trying affliction over the death of their only son, Leland," he explained, "the Governor and Mrs. Stanford could find no consolation in church dogmas so they consulted trance and clairvoyant sensitives. At the time they were considering the plan of constructing a magnificent mausoleum to his memory. At one of the seances the son suggested to them that the most satisfactory monument to him would be the erection of an unsectarian educational institution. And Stanford University was built. It is the purpose, so I am creditably informed, when the landed estates are sold and the income put into the institution, to abolish tuitional charge to students." Mr. Peebles also informed me that Thomas W. Stanford, a brother of Governor Stanford, is also a great believer in consulting spirits. "I visited him," he said, "in his magnificent home in Australia just before I sailed for this country. He is enormously wealthy and owns real estate all over the country. He has already made several big contributions to the university and I don't doubt would eventually do much greater things were it not for the claims of his large family."

Ed Marchand's Experience

Any sect or cult might make these same claims regarding notable people, but you and I know countless others who were not so smart in consulting the "unknowns." For instance there was poor Ed. Marchand, who was having the dickens's own time, domestically, till he forsook the spirit's advice, took his mother's, and skipped to Japan. In those old, depressing days of bills, bills, everlasting bills, he fell into the habit of dropping into an up-town "spirit parlors," where they cable good advice from the other side at twenty-five cents a message. Messages came to him that the wife's habit of running up bills would soon stop, but it didn't, and then Ed consulted his mother. The two women didn't get along very well together and the mother's message was short and to the point. Ed was given enough money to get out of the way till the worst was over. Charge was at once brought against him that he had hidden all his money and was trying to protect it by flight. But Ed's claim that he could not pay the bills of his wife because he was practically drawing only a salary was perfectly true. He never possessed a big interest in the well-known restaurant as so many people believe. His mother and her husband, Pierre Priet, own almost all of it.

Madame Holds the Purse Strings

Marchand pere started the business way back in pioneer days. I believe his was the first French restaurant in San Francisco. Priet was the chief cook in those salad and canned goods days. Marchand pere passed away when Ed his son was a toddling infant and Priet succeeded to the widow and the business. He has been its mainstay and has made the place what it is today. Young Marchand apprenticed himself to life by working around town. I remember him quite well serving as clerk in a big Kearny street dry goods establishment. Later, as much on account of his name as anything, he was employed in the restaurant. When the place was altered to its present style he was given a small share in the business, but it was a share that only yielded him a good salary. His mother holds the purse strings and they are ample and promising enough to make him mindful that it will pay big to maintain his position in her good graces. She is shrewd, wilful and autocratic, so the chances are that he will obey the injunction she imposed upon him when she paid his way and sent him to China: "Remain abroad till the divorce is settled."

The San Rafael Mystery

Mr. Giulio Minetti, the distinguished leader of the Minetti Quartet, and one of the most enthusiastic of our musical exponents, has been unjustly humiliated by the stories published in the dailies concerning an alleged escapade in San Rafael. Minetti was accused of having contributed to the mysterious disappearance of a blonde woman who was believed to be Mrs. A. Lloyd Smith, the soprano. The handsome young musician does not relish being posed as a gay lothario. The fact is that he was essaying the role of a chivalrous protector of a defenseless woman. Mrs. Smith came to this city a few years ago and met Mr. Minetti in his professional capacity. She is an accomplished soprano who has had considerable experience on the operatic stage. She has studied under Marchesi, and was at one time with the Emma Abbott company. A few weeks ago she was wanted as a witness in the Moxey case, which has supplied a great deal of material for the press. Wishing to avoid being involved in a scandal she consulted an attorney, who advised her to sequester herself for awhile. She then asked Mr. Minetti if he knew of some quiet retreat where she could spend a few weeks. He advised her to go to the Jordan Villa in San Rafael and she did so. Thence, a few days later, she telephoned that she feared detection because of the presence of some newspaper people in the neighborhood. She asked Minetti to come over to assist her in finding a furnished house. He gallantly consented and the next day she moved into a house near the Jordan Villa with her maid and secretary. Scarcely had the maid and secretary arrived when Mr. Minetti discovered that they had been followed by detectives. Then he undertook to throw the sleuths off the scent, and at dusk he escorted Mrs. Smith over to this city, after eluding the hawkshaws. Aud such were the incidents that have given rise to the story of the mysterious disappearance.

Great Scandal Upsets German

Arthur Bolles, who is here on his annual circle of the globe for the Winchesters, tells me that the "Krupp scandal" is creating a greater stir throughout Germany than anything that ever happened at the "greatest gun works in the world." He saw a number of the alleged photographs of Krupp taken amid the much discussed Capri orgies and he declares they surpass anything ever conceived in the wildest fancies of lewd French art. With the champions of Krupp, headed by Emperor William, he thinks that the photographs of the "cannon King" taken in the various positions are undoubtedly forged—made from photographs of his heads which are easily obtainable. At present the situation in Europe has developed into a great and bitter controversy between the socialists and anti-socialists. The anti-socialists, headed by Emperor William and his subsidized papers, claim that the socialists were vindictively antagonized against Herr Krupp because he and his father introduced and successfully carried out plans for ameliorating the conditions of the one hundred thousand people living about their gigantic cannon works at Essen, all of which plans were aimed against the influences of socialism. The socialist leaders scout such charges.

Where Tiberius Held His Orgies

At any rate, for years past Herr Krupp has been in the habit of spending several months of each summer on the island of Capri, the spot selected by Tiberius for his most notorious iniquities. He was forty-nine years of age, had a wife and two daughters, was a typical German, and, his friends say, spent his evenings at the hotel on the island, singing and drinking as temperately as did the compatriots who joined him. During the time of these jovial gatherings a socialist paper of Naples came out with serious allegations against him. Other Italian socialist papers followed up the charges; then the barefaced photographs appeared, and finally the unscrupulous blackmailers, demanding their thousands. Herr Krupp defied the first and treated the others with contempt. He had hardly returned home, however, when the most powerful socialist paper in Germany picked up the matter and published what purported to be an exposure of an uncompromisingly sensational kind. Herr Krupp was never the same man from the day of that publication and his death followed almost on its heels.

To the Third Generation

Then it was that Emperor William, who had frequently been a guest at Krupp's palatial home, Villa Hugel, jumped into the fight and declared defiantly that he "would hold the shield of the German Emperor over the family and the memory of the dead." According to Arthur Bolles, Germany is now raging in a newspaper war over the case. Very quietly the family, assisted by the German Emperor, is doing everything to clear the good name of Herr Frederick Krupp. The great name of Krupp passes with him, for he was an only son and leaves no male heir. His immense estate, by far the largest private fortune in Germany, will go in trust to his widow and two daughters. The big cannon works are to be conducted by a board of directors. Thus passes the most famous business house in Germany, after the proverbial three generations. The grandfather started its fortunes as a poor blacksmith before the forge. The rise of Prussia as a war power, and her consequent demand for guns and cannon, gave those fortunes a phenomenal impulse. The first Krupp lived in a modest cottage, the second dwelt in a palace, famous throughout imperial Europe for its magnificence.

A New Lease of Life

This winter the buds of the season are not having it all their own way to the exclusion of the veterans. There was not one of them in the first set at the last Friday Fortnightly cotillion which was made up mostly of belles of several years standing, with the addition of a couple of young matrons, so the aforesaid "backnumbers," as the debutantes have been calling them, have taken fresh heart and do not feel so forlorn as they have hitherto. The "old girl" is having her innings. While the buds are getting engaged and the roses of last season's growth are getting married, Big Sister is dancing and flirting and having the best time of her life. The other night I went home in a Hyde street car which held the remains of a theatre-party. It was somewhere around half-past midnight, and the party had evidently just supped at the Grill, for they were all in a jovial mood. I could not help remarking the seniority of the feminine members of the giddy party. The disparity in ages was so pronounced that I found myself wondering whether the precocious youths were enjoying feminine chaparonage.

At the Fortnightly

The success of the Christmas Fortnightly was assured at the very outset of the evening and the fever of merry Yule-tide glowed in every face. The leaders of the cotillion were old-timers at the game and the figures were executed with brilliancy and verve. Several of the costumes were strikingly beautiful. Miss de Young wore a marvelous confection in silver and white, which I am sure must have been imported from Paris, as I have never seen anything resembling it among the creations of San Francisco's modistes. Miss Genevieve King in black jet never looked better. Black becomes the Titian type. Mrs. Bent, all in white, looked regal even to the crown of holly interwoven with silver which adorned her head. And what a merry, light-hearted young matron Mrs. Bent is. Her bright face and witty sayings always ensure a goodly following whenever she makes her appearance at tea, dinner, or dance, as the sparkling fun she irradiates makes every one feel happy.

Though Edward MacDowell is coming out here for rest, he will not get it if he attends all the functions that are being arranged in his honor. He is to be lionized, if he will permit it, by professors across the bay and at Palo Alto, and by Emil Bruguiere and others in town.

Dear Mr. Jones,

How sweet of you to send me those lovely roses. There is nothing I love so much as flowers. It was an evidence of your refined taste and kind thought that you should choose pale pink roses, too—my favorite flower.

Sincerely yours, May Smith.

What She Really Wrote.

How utterly stingy of you, Mr. Jones, to send me roses when at the very least I expected a diamond sunburst. Here have I been wasting my new frocks, my time and my brilliant conversation, not to mention an occasional kiss upon you, for three long months. You need not call any more—or if you do I'll not be at home.

Sincerely, May Smith.

What He Thought He Wrote.

My dear Miss Smith,

I thank you more than mere words can express for the lovely shaving mug you sent me. To a man who makes but few friends, you can conceive what a boon your friendship is. Every time I look at your beautiful gift, I say to myself, "Thank God for my good friend."

Very truly yours, Richard Jones.

What He Really Wrote.

Dear Miss Smith,

Why didn't you consult me before investing in that mug—such an ugly mug, too! Why, I have as many shaving mugs now as a popular clubman has loving cups. I could cover one side of my bedroom wall with them. And—I don't shave. I always get shaved at the Swell shop, the barber having all my utensils there. I consider it an evidence of great materialism on your part, anyway, to send me a shaving mug. I had thought you a woman of refined sensibilities. Well, perhaps it is as well to find out one's mistake before—yes, I had thought of proposing, but all is over now. Truly yours, R. Jones.

Told by the Flowers

Death. Silence. A rosewood casket, a white face visible under a pall of flowers. The tender curve of the mouth is no longer there. The lips are drawn and blue. The sightless eyes are veiled by sunken lids.

Hush! What is that? Only a lily detached from its stem, rustling to the floor, to be hushed in the velvet pile; a motion in the scented stillness like the beat of angels' wings, deepening into a sound of an idle wind in the deep forest. It is the voice of flowers.

In the midst of the pallid mass of bloom rests a lei of crimson carnations, after the custom of far-away Hawaii—a gory splotch on the sea of snow.

A cluster of waxen lilies with golden throats, breathing the magnetism of the hand that laid them reverently near the quiet face, murmured: "Dead; dead. And he loved life so well. He was my friend. His weaknesses were many and great, but God knows and understands. He made love to me and I forbade it. I would not allow our goodfellowship to be turned into a farce. In his loves he was weak; in his friendships, strong. Best and truest of friends, sleep well."

A knot of dainty violets shivered slightly; a crystal tear drop that had lodged among the petals splashed on the glossy surface of the casket, and the questioning whisper came: "Made love to you? You must be mad. 'Twas I he loved. It was the rose time just one year ago he brought heaven down to earth by telling me the old sweet story. I was his all. He told me there was none other beside me, and I believed him. He was mine, all mine. He gave a thought to no one but me. He said that ours was a love re-born; that he had loved me since Time was new, and would love me when Time had ceased to be."

"Nay, little one" (it was the lei that spoke), "it was to me he came from your arms. It was on my breast he laid his head. my soul he tasted through his kisses, and when he begged me to fly with him I drew him close and stifled his pleadings in my dusky hair. He called me his 'Heart's Blood,' and that is why I choose now to lie so near his heart. I would warm it into life if I could. He loved life so well, and now the stirring, passionate current is frozen in its course. Ah, the pity of it! A year ago this rose time you say he told you the sweet old story. It was then we were counting time by heart throbs; those summer nights when the sky was strewn with handfuls of jewels, and the great golden bubble threw a glamour over all; when the magnolia at the corner of the tower caught the night bird in its intoxicating aura—ah, God! We lived, we two, and all the beautiful, eternal Now was ours. It was madness, and the dream soon ended. It snapped asunder like a 'cello string drawn too taut. We were both weary of the play. We rang down the curtain, washed the paint from our faces, and I told him to go back to you and to be true to you."

A languid orchid took interest: "Ah, it was you? I never knew. I see now—it comes to me like a dim remembered dream —his flights northward, the flowers, the books—yes, and so you are she. He was to me—but no, I will not speak. I will not desecrate his memory by flaunting that which is sacred. It will be locked in my breast as securely as it is bound in this lump of passionless clay. We dreamed our dream"; the last with a shuddering sigh.

The cluster of pale roses murmured: "They never knew him as he really was. That delight was reserved for me. For long years he defied the laws of man, forswore hope of heaven and risked the tortures of hell for me. Gods! The deliciousness of defying the world for each other. Fate drifted us asunder, but the invisible golden links still bind our hearts together as in the rare old days. Ours was a love that time nor space nor death can change. I mourn him alone."

Here the shapely branch of lilacs quivered: "We lived our world together, he and I. We played a furious game, and passion burned itself out, but his heart called for me over land and sea. The wife was the barrier. He said they were not mated, and that in me he found his heart's desire."

A door opened softly and a little woman, garbed in deepest black, entered leaning on the arm of a tall, boyish figure. Her blue eyes were blurred with weeping, and her yellow hair in disarray. "See, my son," she said with forced composure, "the tributes from those who knew his worth. May you be like your father, my boy, strong and true and faithful." Then sinking on her knees she cried, "He loved me, he loved me as woman was never loved on this earth. I alone understood him. That is my great comfort. O, God! how can I give him up!"

And Passion was dumb in the presence of Love and Grief.

Mme. Idaline and Her Work

The subject of our frontispiece is a fair portrait of Mme. Idaline, the originator of the Mme. Idaline Face Cream. In the short space of four years, Mme. Idaline has built up the largest business of its kind west of Chicago, and one of the largest in the United States. She has shown great business ability in organizing a large company composed of some of the most prominent business men in our State. The system of demonstrating which this company employs in placing its goods upon the market has proved very successful. This unique system consists of a corps of thoroughly trained ladies who demonstrate and sell the goods from artistic booths which are placed in every large department and drug store throughout the United States. Mme. Idaline is a woman of culture, having been educated abroad in the science of chemistry, and now gives to the public the result of years of study and experiments. The Idaline Face Cream is a cream and powder combined and lends beauty to the fairest skin, without any danger of injury. It is far better than a powder, and does away with all use of the latter. Most face creams promote a growth of hair upon the skin, but the Idaline does not. It imparts to the skin a babylike, peachy softness that no other toilet preparation gives.

The Abstracted Kiss

An Incident of the New Year.

The gay New Year's Eve carnival was under way. The celebration is peculiar to San Francisco, I believe, in no other city in the world being observed in exactly the same way. It is like the New Orleans Mardi Gras, without the confetti, the Roman carnival without the beauties posing in the balconies. It is just a procession, as it were, of frolicking men and women, children in their momentary forgetfulness of dull care. Horns tooting, bells ringing, the New Year is ushered in with noise and jollity.

The merriment was at its height. Up and down Market street passed a stream of paraders, some in grotesque costumes. The restaurants and cafes were packed to the doors. Everybody exchanged greetings:

"A happy New Year!"

"Many to you!"

"Por el amor de Dios!"

"Good luck!"

"Wie geht's alter Haus?"

"Vive la joie!"

"Happy New Year!"

With a group of friends I was among the revelers, but a looker-on rather than a participant. I had not drunk sufficient wine to give me that feeling of elation that seemed to possess the others. As yet, indeed, I was not waked up to the spirit around me.

* * * * * * * * *

The merriment began to grow less pronounced. The tooters of horns were growing tired. The bell-ringers were weary. The restaurants began to disgorge their occupants, and lights became less numerous. My friends and I walked westward along Market, toward the City Hall. A gay party was just emerging from the underground cafe at the intersection. They paused as they reached the corner, evidently undetermined what to do next.

"I must go home at once," said a tall girl, apparently beautiful, though as she had a veil closely drawn over her face, ending at the tip of what I felt sure was a perfect nose, only two adorable red lips could be seen.

"No, don't go yet," returned a plump little creature, garbed in green cloth trimmed with rich fur, "I intend to see the show out."

"But I really should go home, you know," the other insisted, "you see, dear, you have no one waiting for you."

"Yes, I have," laughed the small woman, "here's Tom waiting now to find what we will do next."

There were three men with them, who puffed quietly at their cigars while waiting for their companions to outline a further itinerary.

"Vive la—vive la—vive l'amour," hummed one beneath his breath.

His eyes turned toward the tall girl with the veil.

"No, I must go," she was saying. "Here, hail a cab for me, some one, please."

Any number of cabs were rolling by, many of them empty. But it was not so easy to hail one, they passed so swiftly. And the crowd in the street was still large, a rougher element having succeeded the higher class of revelers.

"I'll call one myself," cried the veiled lady, stepping forward toward the curbstone, and raising her arm to draw a cabby's attention, "if I don't go at once there'll be a terrible denouement at home, I know."

But the last words were breathed into other ears than those for whom they were intended. The rough crowd had intervened, when she took that fatal step forward, to separate her from her companions. Darkness, broken only by an occasional dim incandescent light, had settled upon the streets. It was that mystic hour when deep black enshrouds everything, just before the pink-tipped gray of dawn.

I was close to the veiled lady's side. Her companions were now invisible. A rude hand seized the tall girl's arm, dusky fingers imprinting spots upon its white coat-sleeve.

"Oh, dear, oh dear!" she wailed, in fright and wild distress.

"Cabby!" she cried, and a cab answered her hail, stopping by the curb.

She looked about her for some one's aid, the rude arm still being perilously near, though I had thrust the fellow back but a moment before. My friends, too, were lost in the crowd and the darkness. I sprang to her side. She looked at me with eyes still distended, as far as the veil revealed in the light from the cab-lamp, with fright. Then something in my manner seemed to reassure her.

"Don't leave me yet," she said, one foot on the cab-step, "look about, please, and see if the others are not near. Carrie! Carrie!" she called in a sweet but penetrating voice.

But Carrie, who I surmised was the plump little woman in green cloth and furs, had been swept far away by the turbulent tide of passers.

"Jump in, quick!" cried the cabman, "I can't wait all night!"

Nervously, she stepped into the vehicle. She still held my coat-sleeve in a close grasp, and on an impulse I jumped into the cab with her.

"Where to?" called the driver.

"Oh, anywhere," I said, "I'll tell you when we get out of this crowd."

He drove off, and I found myself in a most awkward situation. I was wondering what would be the outcome, when a merry laugh interupted my thoughts.

"This is a lark, Mr. Smith, isn't it?" said a voice from the opposite cushions.

"Mr. Smith?" I asked, internally.

"Won't they be surprised when they find us both gone? And isn't it nice," the voice went on, "to think we weren't all lost? I was so afraid."

A gloved hand reached over and seized mine.

"Papa will be so glad to think it was you, and not the others, whom he rather objects to, you know, that took such good care of me. You see he did not want me to go. Poor dear! he was feeling too ill to go out himself, and only consented to let me go when Carrie told him you would be our escort."

She laughed gaily.

I resolved to take the goods the gods provided. Tomorrow, or rather today later on, I would be speeding Eastward.

My companion evidently noticed nothing unusual in my purposely monosyllabic replies, which the cab's jolts prevented being distinctly audible. However, her own voice went on in constant chatter.

"Where to, sir?"

It was cabby's voice, through his window in the roof.

"Oh, didn't you tell him?" she asked reproachfully.

Then she breathed her address to the driver. She spoke so low it was lost to all ears but cabby's.

"How could you forget?" she said to me, then. "Here we have been going haphazard when I might have been at home long ago."

"'Tis far too short," I said, reaching for her little hand and pressing it softly.

She did not take it away.

* * * * * * * * *

"L'amour—vive l'amour," she whispered, "I heard you humming it, Mr. Smith, when you were lighting your cigar."

"Mr. Smith—" I said chidingly.

"Oh, well, Jack, if you like, then."

I feel sure she blushed.

* * * * * * * * *

The cab stopped with a bang. Cabby was descending from his perch. There was no time to be lost. I felt sure that if I did not snatch one kiss from that adorable mouth, that I remembered smiling so winningly at "Carrie," my dreams that night would not be painless.

"I must—forgive me," I said, and my lips sought hers in the darkness.

I was prepared for resistance, or for passive acquiescence, but not for the passionate surrender, the exquisite sensuousness of that response.

"It took you a long time to muster up courage," she said with a merry laugh. "If you weren't so slow we might have become very much better acquainted."

Just then the cabby opened the door. Out she darted and up the stairs, leaving me crestfallen in the cab.

I gave my address to the man and was driven to my hotel.

Not until my grip and I were deposited in the Pullman, and the train was speeding northward, did it occur to me that I had no knowledge of that cabman's number, and my chance of ever tracing her was therefore gone forever. —The Tourist.

TRIUMPH OF THE OLD YEAR will be marvel of the new

The Alexandra Manufactured Diamond is certainly one of the most wonderful attainments of the ingenuity of man. We invite the most rigid inspection and comparison of our Alexandra Manufactured Diamond with the real stone. Veteran diamond experts tell us it's a mighty hard task to detect the Alexandra from the genuine — they find the only point of difference same as you will — that is, the cost.

ANOTHER POINT

is important, too. All our manufactured stones are set in solid gold mountings, enhancing their magnificence and further defying the possible chance of detection.

"AREN'T THOSE BEAUTIES!,"

is what a customer exclaimed the other day when seeing for the first time our wonderful silver and fish skin pearls. They certainly are just as good as the precious stones which come to us from the tropical pearl fisheries and are conceded to be the cleverest effort of our manufactured luxuries.

OUR STORE

STAGE

The Stage Bounder

How easy it is to destroy those pleasing illusions for which we are indebted to the stage! Unconsciously we identify an actor with some role in which he has appeared, and attribute to him the virtues which we have seen exhibited by the character he has portrayed. Too often the illusion is destroyed by personal contact. Too often the actor who plays the gentleman successfully is incapable of simulating that role when out of the atmosphere of the play. He proves himself a bounder without even an incentive. He needs no provocation. Just give him the opportunity to talk about himself and he will do the rest. Of course there are exceptions, but they are rare enough to prove the rule. The breeding of envy, jealousy and conceit is not confined to the theatrical profession, but in no other are they so disgustingly manifest. Perhaps it is because the men of the stage have not had the training that is required for success in other professions. A man may be an usher today and a star tomorrow. He does not enjoy the refining influence of education, and even though he does acquire polish during his evolution into a star, the constant struggle for precedence, for supremacy, for applause, for admiration and approval, has a demoralizing effect. It promotes selfishness and atrophies the higher emotions. How often of late have our illusions been destroyed by reading Ashton Stevens's interviews with the stars of the theatrical profession. Mr. Stevens knows the weakness of the mummers, and he is never so happy as when naively eliciting from them for publication testimony of their own conceit. It is his pleasure to induce an actor of the Ernest Hastings type, for instance, to utter platitudes in stained glass attitudes. And the funny part of it is that none of his victims ever realizes that he has been dexterously held up to ridicule. Mr. Stevens's interviews remind me of an attorney's cross-examination of a physician. The average medical gentleman is a damphool when he gets on the witness stand and undertakes to tell how much he knows, and lawyers love to corner medical experts and amuse a jury by showing how little the scientific gentleman knows about his own business. That is not what Mr. Stevens does to the actor-gentleman, but the expose is equally amusing. Mr. Warfield, who was interviewed last Sunday, managed to make a very fair showing until questioned on the subject of other Jewish dialect comedians. Then he proceeded to denounce them as "my imitators." He said they walked on their heels, which no Ghetto Jew ever did, and that they pulled their hats down over their ears. Evidently Mr. Warfield is jealous of Barney Bernard, though he has no occasion to be. If Mr. Bernard walks on his heels and Mr. Warfield does not, then surely Mr. Bernard is not guilty of an imitation. The fact is that Bernard portrays a type, just as Warfield does. Frank Bush, who appeared here twenty years ago, has just as much right to accuse Warfield of being an imitator as Warfield has to make the accusation against Bernard.

Nance O'Neil's Best Offering

Nance O'Neil reserved for the fourth week of her engagement the greatest of her impersonations. It is not easy to banish the impression made by her great acting and declamation in the curse scene of "The Jewess." Here the great young tragedienne's full power shines forth. It is not too much to say that in this churchyard scene Nance O'Neil's work is worthy to stand side by side with Bernhardt's declamation in the battle-vision scene in "L'Aiglon." Nance O'Neil is indeed the American Bernhardt, and the Sardou dramas should be hers. What a Tosca, what a Theodora she would make! Hers is the temperament to interpret, also, the tragedies in which Rachel shone, the works of Racine and Corneille, and of Fechter, if those tragedies could attract an audience today. There is no reason why they should not, when revivals of "Leah the Forsaken" are so well received. The audience at the Grand on Monday night alternately wept and applauded, and after the third act the curtain had to be raised again and again. It was almost like a Grau grand opera ovation with the floral tributes omitted. The company is seen to better advantage in "The Jewess" than in any play yet presented under the McKee Rankin management. Mr. Ratcliff and Mr. Byers are especially effective. The comedy bits in the scene in the village square that prefaces the wedding of Joseph and Lena are admirably done. Charles A. Millward, the Alcazar's late leading man, has the part of Nathan, the apostate Jew, in the play.

The next symphony concert in the Zech series at Fischer's will be given on the afternoon of January fifteenth.

Some Vaudeville Stars

An exceptionally fine entertainment, even for the Orpheum, has been given by the road company. It is seldom that two such great acts as those of Wills the tramp and McIntyre and Heath are included in one bill, and when a stage is crowded with barnyard fowl one never knows when an extra stunt will be thrown in for good measure, as was done Sunday night. McIntyre and Heath are to continue in next week's bill, and Thomas Nawn, the inimitable Irish comedian, who is probably one of the greatest of Orpheum favorites, will also appear with his company in Edmund Day's comedietta, "Pat and Child." Nawn returned the other day from Australia and this will be his first appearance in two years in this country. Among others to be in the bill is Edith Helena, a sensational singer who is said to be able not only to outgo Ellen Beach Yaw in range, but for whose voice quality is claimed.

At the California

A stranger in a strange land was Harry Beresford when he made his bow in Broadhurst's farce, "The Wrong Mr. Wright." After he had been on the stage ten minutes his audience felt as well acquainted with him as if he were Ferris Hartman or H. Corson Clarke. "The Wrong Mr. Wright" is about an average farce-comedy, with the old plot of a man masquerading as somebody else. In this farce, his niece also masquerades as her maid, but this latter mix-up does not affect the play's organism to any degree. It is Seymour Sites, the San Francisco millionaire out on a little lark at Old Point Comfort, who is the show. He is Mr. Wright, and he is never wrong even when designing women and detectives buzz about him threatening his peace of mind and pocket. Beresford is a quiet farce-artist. His fun is never too large for the real article. He makes his points unobtrusively, aided by his gift of versatile facial expression. Some of his business is very amusing, for instance where he makes use of the "unappreciated angel's" curl as a telephone. Of the company Alfred Rumble, a Sol-Smith-Russell comedian, is especially good as Clingstone, Miss Bishop as Arabella reminds one of Annie Yeamans, and Arthur Jarrett is a fine, manly young lover. Miss Leonard, the female detective, has a stunning figure and wears her equally stunning gowns with elan. Miss Emma Dunn as the maid shows considerable talent of a soubrette order, and her laughing song is cleverly done.

The Burton Holmes Lectures

Burton Holmes, the famous traveler and lecturer whose entertainments met with such success during the Henry Miller season at the Columbia two years ago, will this year deliver a series of illustrated lectures at Steinway hall. At the Columbia theatre the lectures were delivered by his fellow traveler and business associate, Louis Francis Browne, who is here arranging the season, but this time Mr. Holmes will deliver the lectures in person. The subjects are interesting and the moving pictures will introduce some novel effects. The course will consist of six lectures and the subjects will be The Grand Canon of Arizona, Portugal, Sweden, Denmark, Norway I and Norway II.

For many years past, there has been a growing tendency on the part of educators to make the process of acquiring knowledge as agreeable and inviting as possible, but it has remained for Dr. Alex. J. McIvor-Tyndall, the famous psychologist, to amuse, excite and fascinate while he expounds his theories and makes experiments in the abstruse, unfathomable problems of mental and psychic phenomena. McIvor-Tyndall has been entertaining large

On Saturday afternoon, half after two o'clock, there will be a souvenir matinee. Dr. McIvor-Tyndall has announced his intention of devoting himself exclusively to the lecture field after these entertainments, and will give no more public demonstrations here. This will afford the last opportunity, therefore, of seeing a man whose extraordinary psychic powers have made him the talk of two continents.

Zech's Second Series

The second series of the Zech symphony concerts opened at Fischer's last Tuesday, and was attended by a large and appreciative audience. To hear the fine orchestra interpret Wagner is a rare treat for the musical soul. The numbers were given with all the brilliant shading necessary to accentuate the various emotions expressed in the master's works. Under the magic baton of Mr. Zech the orchestra plays with fire and tremendous power, but always with a magnetism sweeping the heartstrings of the listeners. The prelude to Lohengrin had to be repeated to satisfy the enthusiastic audience, and never have I heard, not even under Damrosch's baton, the overture to "Tannhauser" given so spiritedly. In the fire scenes from "Die Walkure" it does not require an active imagination to interpret abstract thought with these skillful musicians playing and feeling the superb composition.

Features of Next Week's Bills

The production of "The Christian" at the Alcazar has been postponed, and on Monday night that delightful comedy by Henry Arthur Jones, "The Case of Rebellious Susan," will be produced. This was the comedy whose problem gave such opportunity for discussion when it had its premier. Juliet Crosby will have the role of the rebellious wife.

Fischer's will have the funniest travesty it has yet produced, next week, when "Barbara Fidgetty" goes on. The piece is called a "laughing satire" on Clyde Fitch's drama, which the Neills produced at the California, "Barbara Freitchie." It is in three acts and follows the action of the drama in an extravagant and humorous fashion. The authors, Edgar and Harry B. Smith, have changed the development of the plot from the War of the Rebellion to an election at Fredericksburg. Among the musical introductions will be "A Private in the Ranks," "The Blue and the Gray," the "Moonlight Serenade," "Strolling in the Cemetery," a parody on "Dixie," by Kolb and Dill, "My Dixie Queen," and "Keep Away from Emeline." Maud Amber will sing Stromberg's "Come down, my Evening Star," and with Winfield Blake, the latest New York duet, "We Are Engaged." The dances will include everything from an old-fashioned essence to the cake-walk of today. Albert Verrick, George Best, Charles Bates and Bernard Wynn are new members of the company.

Frank Daniels is coming to the Columbia next week with "Miss Simplicity," a musical comedy in which he toured the East last season. Gracie Orr, the talented daughter of Annie Meyers, is the prima donna of the company. Daniels has always been a favorite in this city, and it is said that he is as funny as ever in this new skit. There are nearly one hundred people in the company, and the piece is sumptuously staged.

The ever popular Swedish-American comedy, "Yon Yonson," comes to the California tomorrow night, with a real Swedish comedian, Nelse Ericksen, in the title role. He is said to be by far the best "Yon" that has ever played the part. Both the company and the entire scenic production are better this season than ever before. "The Telephone Girl," a companion to "The Belle of New York," follows.

The great military farce, "Our Regiment," will be the Republic's next offering with the entire company in the cast. Clarke, Breese, Keane, DeLong and Miss MacGregor all have good parts and a big hit will undoubtedly be scored.

The public likes "Jack and the Beanstalk," which is turning away people nightly. A revival of "The Mikado" on a grand scale will follow.

Next Thursday afternoon the Tivoli will be given over to the classic music lovers, when Director Steindorff's first "novelty" concert is to be pulled off. The orchestra is in splendid trim for work and as MacDowell will appear and play his second concerto for piano and orchestra there will likely be a big audience present. MacDowell's Indian suite will be given by the orchestra.

Nance O'Neil has retained Nancy Sykes in her repertory and will be seen in this, which is one of her best roles, next week. When she appeared in "Oliver Twist" during her California theatre engagement, she played to standing room only. Her business as Nancy is different from that of any other actress. With McKee Rankin as Bill Sykes and L. R. Stockwell as the Artful Dodger this will be a great "Oliver Twist" indeed at the Grand.

The Chutes will have Bryan and Nadine, high class comedy acrobats, Louis A. Hanvey and Lenora Doane in a dainty sketch, the "electric" Clark sisters, Jessie Dale, the California girl baritone, just returned from her Eastern tour, Minona the danseuse, the Brittons and the animatoscope with new pictures.

Espee Stock in High Favor

The popularity of Southern Pacific stock to which I referred last week continues, and my New York correspondent has furnished me with some interesting facts relative to Wall street dealings in this security: The strength and activity in Southern Pacific are still the feature of the market and the situation in this stock is attracting a great deal of attention, not merely because it is one of the most active issues on the market at all times, but because it has been the center of a great many rumors of late. There is a very powerful pool in this stock, the holdings of which are variously estimated at from 100,000 to 500,000 shares. The pool was formed last spring with the object of making a market for the stock included in it. It is about this pool and its doings that the interest centers. The head of the pool is J. R. Keene and it will be remembered that upon his return from Europe last summer the stock advanced rapidly to $81, at which point a most stubborn resistance was encountered. The advance was accompanied by definite statements that a dividend would shortly be declared on the stock, and that $100,000,000 of bonds would be authorized by the company to capitalize improvements made during the past few years, and release surplus earnings for the benefit of stockholders. When the stock reached $81, the advance was stopped, it is now believed, by E. H. Harriman, president of the road. Mr. Harriman not only stated that no dividend would be declared on Southern Pacific for at least a year, but he further declared that no bonds would be authorized for that space of time, thereby making it certain that earnings would be devoted to the property, and that the stockholders would receive no disbursements of any kind. The advance was checked immediately. It is believed that a great deal of the pool stock was thrown overboard. Southern Pacific reacted 30 points. It was one of the most conspicuously weak stocks on the list during the decline. While it was down Mr. Harriman took the opportunity to add to the Union Pacific holdings of the stock sufficiently to secure absolute control. The reason Harriman stopped the advance and entailed heavy loss and much inconvenience on the pool was that he feared to leave the majority control of the stock afloat on the market. The purchase of Louisville in the open market by Mr. Gates demonstrated that there were men abroad able and willing to pick up roads as great as the Southern Pacific before he wanted heavy speculation in it. The floating supplay of Southern Pacific is now naturally much reduced. The past week brokers have been engaged in cleaning up the London market as far as this stock is concerned. The New York market is undergoing the same process, and it is believed in Wall street that the pool is again preparing the market for an advance in Southern Pacific. With the majority control safe in the vaults of the Union Pacific, Harriman is not likely to object to pool operations in the stock. It is said in quarters usually well informed that Keene and Harriman are much more thoroughly in accord than they ever were before, and that the operations of the former are not likely again to be interfered with by the latter.

Listless Trading on 'Change

As is always expected at this time of the year, the holiday season has brought about a period of quietness in the business of the Stock and Bond Exchange. There has been no material depression in values, but the investing public, in common with the people generally, has been devoting itself to the holiday and gift making, and consequently there has been a shortage in both buying and selling orders. Meanwhile, however, prices have held up remarkably well, and with the beginning of the new year it is confidently expected business will become as active as it was a few weeks ago. In consequence of the dullness there is but little in the way of news pertaining to the local industrials, and outside of the moderate sales there is but little worthy of special comment. There has been some little business in progress all the while, however, and while the transactions have nearly always been in small parcels, there has been a good, strong undertone noticeable at all times. Sugar shares, which figured so prominently in the transactions during the early part of December, have been quiet, but the steadiness of the prices at which the few sales have been made, shows the substantial character of this class of security. Considering the fact that there were numerous purchases of sugar stocks at lower prices than have prevailed during the last two weeks, the moderate offers to sell indicates that the buyers have a strong confidence in the future enhancement of values and did not secure their holdings with a view to selling out at a small advance, and thus making a profit on the purchase. Indications now are that the contemplated coalition with the Equitable Gas Company for the purpose of mutually raising rates in those sections of the city where both companies are furnishing service, will not be consummated. A few days ago sellers were firm in demanding $42 a share, and now they have dropped to $41.25 with very few buyers in sight at the reduced figure. As a matter of fact a few shares have changed hands at $42.12 1-2, and that appears to be about a maximum figure. The shares of the Equitable Gas Company have likewise dropped in values, and while $3.50 is the asking figure, $3.25 is the best bid for small parcels. Oakland Gas Light and Heat shares are in demand at $68 a share with no sellers. The same may be said of Pacific Gas Improvement and Pacific Lighting shares, for which $35.37 1-2 and $53 respectively are bid with no offers to sell. Giant Powder stock has been sparingly dealt in and is rather easy in price, the best bid being $73, while holders are seeking to obtain $75. Alaska Packers' Association, while one of the firmest stocks on the list, has eased off a trifle, with $159.50 bid and $160.25 asked. A few sales of this stock were recorded at $159.75 and $160. California Wine Association shares are closely held; while $100.50 is bid, it is doubtful if any can be had at less than $101, and probably not much at that. There has been some little trading in Spring Valley shares, but they have weakened in values during the last few days. Marin County Water is in demand at $61, with no sellers at that figure. Contra Costa Water is being offered at $69, but no one appears willing to pay more than $67.50, with $67.75 as an extreme outside price.

—The Financier

The New Year's number of the Pacific States Investor indicates a very evident determination on the part of the publishers to maintain a high standard. The Investor has now entered on its second year, and has gained a large addition to its subscription list without any resort to premiums or gift enterprises. One feature of the January issue is the reproduction, by a group of handsome half-tone cuts, of the suite of offices in which the various departments of its business are conducted. The editorials on the Isthmian Canal Question, the Pacific Cables, the Venezuelan imbroglio and other live international topics are broadly and intelligently written, and the financial and investment matter is presented with gratifying terseness.

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

The Messiah

One hundred and eleven years ago, the Cecilia Society of London, England, instituted an annual performance of Handel's "Messiah" on Christmas day. Other cities in time adopted the custom, among them New York, Boston and St. Louis. San Francisco has now fallen into line with the holiday producers of the Handel oratorio. The Trinity church choir, re-enforced by other singers, all under the direction of Professor Louis H. Eaton, sang part of the oratorio the other night, to the great pleasure of a large and cultured audience. The "Messiah" in its entirety is now only a tradition. Audiences will not listen to the whole of it and consequently the musical directors everywhere choose only those numbers that are able to hold interest. It is well, for are not the grand operas "edited" nowadays before production? One can get even too much of a good thing. Great care has been taken by "editors" of the old oratorios, however, to preserve the general organism of the works. It is not always professional singers who render oratorio music the best. For instance, Carrie Bridewell of the Grau grand opera company sang the contralto role in a recent production of the "Messiah" in St. Louis and she rendered the music with no spirit whatever. She was, as one critic observed, "a lamentable failure." The Trinity singers, on the contrary, none of whom has ever attained grand opera eminence, did most admirable solo and concerted work. We have some excellent singers of oratorio among us. I could pick out a dozen without swinging a quarter around the circle.

MR. BURTON HOLMES
The Famous Traveler and Lecturer. Steinway Hall.

Eisteddfod in Oakland

On New Year's Day, a novel festival was held in Oakland, an "Eisteddfod" or competitive musical festival by the Welsh residents of the city of churches. Of this festival Alex T. Stewart recently wrote: "The origin and early history of this ancient and instructive institution are not very definitely known. From 1819 to the present, national Eisteddfodeau have been held annually excepting in a few instances. The interest in this institution among the Welsh is universal. Months before the event takes place, the Eisteddfod fever becomes prevalent. What Olympia is to the Greeks, the Amphitheatre to the Romans, bull-fighting to the Spaniards, and the Derby to the English, the Eisteddfod is to the Welsh; with this difference, that none of these national institutions can compare for a moment with the Eisteddfod as a means to amuse, instruct and elevate. While these gatherings, ancient and modern, pander largely to the baser instincts, the Eisteddfod aims at the intellectual and moral culture of its patrons. The Eisteddfod has no party politics to contend about, and no religious differences to deplore. The main use and object is to consider, in cordial union, how we can best serve the progress of our nation. 'When the temple of Minerva is opened, the temple of Janus must be closed.' This institution founds its claim for the sympathy of all men upon its usefulness; upon its service to art, to music, to literature, and above all, to popular education."

Made Her Debut at Philomath

Many talented San Francisco girls who have later become famed outside of their own city made their first appearances at meetings of women's clubs here. And in exploiting young talent no club has been more successful than the Philomath, which is composed of the elite of Jewish society. The other day at Philomath's open meeting, a very fine musical program was presented. Two of Mrs. Marriner-Campbell's advanced pupils, Mrs. Emanuel and Mrs. Farrell, sang duets and Mrs. Leon Lewin sang, while an orchestra under Fred Eppstein's direction rendered some charming music. But the surprise of the afternoon was little Flora Stern, who played Mendelssohn's "Rondo Capriccioso" and Liszt's "Spring Song" in a manner that would have done credit to an artist of much greater experience. The little girl, who is only twelve years of age, could easily be starred as a phenomenon, but her family does not crave such distinction for her. She is to go on with her studies, and will be permitted to appear occasionally on semi-public occasions such as the Philomath affair. When older, her people expect her to do good work and win a place in the music world on her merit. But there is no doubt that she is a genius. Her relatives, by the way, are all well known here.

The program for the Monday night concert will be entirely different. Mrs. M. E. Blanchard will sing groups of the composer's songs, and he will play the accompaniments. It is not often that an opportunity occurs to hear a great composer interpret his own works and musical San Francisco should take advantage of it. The sale of seats will open at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s next Wednesday morning at nine a. m. and the scale of prices is seventy-five cents, one dollar and one dollar and a half.

The Italian Band

Rivela is still the idol of the populace. He is making a name here for his band that will never be forgotten, even when the Italians themselves have bade farewell to us. Every night a large audience gathers in the Pavilion to hear the band and promenade between numbers. The Pavilion has been heated and is quite a cheery place now to spend an evening. Los Angeles is awaiting Colonel Ellery's players, the southern musical enthusiasts having been aroused to eager expectancy over the San Francisco reports of Rivela's men that have been wafted to the land of sun and oranges.

A Story Sousa Told

When the March King was in England he told several good stories and an English paper recently printed this one, which he called "The Wicked Flowers," and which, it is said, will appear in his contemplated volume of "Pipetown Stories." As Sousa related it, it went like this: "It was Monday morning in the library of the minister of a tiny village. The minister, who would have thought it an offence against heaven to save a drowning dog on the Sabbath, was interrupted in his spiritual compositions by the arrival of a little girl, who went up to his table and presented him with a bunch of wild flowers. The minister gravely accepted them, but asked her, suspiciously:

"'Did you gather these on the Sabbath, my child?'

"'No, minister,' replied the little girl, 'I picked them early this morning.'

"'I am glad to hear it,' said the good man.

"And the little girl went towards the door. Presently she returned to his side and admitted, blushingly, 'But please, minister, they were growing on the Sabbath!'"

Miss Clara Alexander, the dramatic reader who makes darky dialect her specialty, is managing a concert company which is to tour the State, taking in Bakersfield, Hanford, Visalia, Fresno and Stockton. In the company are Miss Margaret Davis, pianiste, Miss Georgie Cope, contralto, Miss Virginia White, violiniste, and Miss Alexander. The first concert will be given in Bakersfield on January twelfth. Miss Alexander is to recite at the meeting of the Colonial Dames at Mrs. Voorhies's home next Tuesday, and on January twenty-fifth for the Century Club.

Walter Damrosch, who is now at the head of the Philharmonic Society, intends to take the orchestra on a tour to this city. A large guarantee fund is soon to be placed at his disposal. Andrew Carnegie is to be one of the trustees who will look after the distribution of the fund.

Memory's Momentary Lapse

He looked terribly dejected. I felt a quick impulse of sympathy for the man, as he stood lost in thought in the midst of the gay New Year's throng rushing toward the theatres.

His brow was furrowed in deep thought. His eyes, sad and sunken, seemed to be figuratively turned inward in the search for some mental object. In him I saw the theme of a poem. I imagined him, on this day of the happy New Year, lost in thoughts of the decades passed. Perhaps, I thought, memory brings to his mind a loved wife, tender little ones now laid 'neath the sod.

Moved by an irresistible feeling of compassion, man to man, I approached the gloomy-faced one.

"I feel for you," I said, putting my hand in his in a firm clasp.

An irradiating smile o'erspread his melancholic features. Thus, I thought, does the sympathy of one human for another illuminate the dark soul-places.

But listen. Still smiling, the stranger spoke:

"It's a queer world," he said, "and a brandy jag's the queerest thing in it. Last night I went to the theatre with my wife. After the second act I left her, and went into the lobby. I met a friend—and after that all is a blank to me. All I remember is having a b. & s. and then another, and then two others, to ring in the glad New Year. The problem that is worrying me, now that I have emerged from the hammam is: How did my wife get home without carfare?" —The Josher.

LETTERS

Some Pertinent Questions

One of the curiosities of dialect literature is the use of the apostrophe. In our early infancy, before we knew the significance of the words, it was impressed upon us that "The apostrophe indicates possession or omission." In the course of time we made painful acquaintance with its latter usage in our endeavors to supply the omitted letters, and so gain some remote idea of what word was supposed to be represented by two consonants and three apostrophes. Practice makes perfect in all arts, and we finally mastered the art of making a guess, or shutting our eyes and turning the pages quickly in order to escape from the temptation to waste time in profitless experiment. All that may be legitimate, if dialect stories, which depend on phonetic spelling and apostrophes have any legitimate excuse for existence. But here is a point which needs elucidation from the masters who concoct them. Admitting the mispronunciations of the illiterate and the accent or brogue of foreigners in speaking English, when it becomes necessary or expedient for characters to take up pen, why do they write dialect, and if they are so illiterate as to be barely able to make marks which pass for words, how does it come to pass that they are so painfully accurate in placing the apostrophes which mark the omission of letters? Also, where do they imbibe a knowledge of the use of quotation marks, not to mention the simpler points? In a word, if they know so much, how is it they do not know more?

Books About Children

Amongst the books listed as especially for boys and girls I find both Eleanor M. Gates's "Biography of a Prairie Girl" and George Madden Martin's "Emmy Lou." With the former I have no fault to find. On the contrary, I am glad to see it placed "where it will do the most good," for it is the only book since "Little Women" that seems likely to prove a permanent rival to that classic. But "Emmy Lou," though she is one of the dearest and most delightful little girls in bookland, is not for children, who cannot appreciate the series of stories. Emmy, it is true, is not likely to prove harmful, for neither she nor her little companions were "bratty" in the least. They were wholesome, well-brought-up little people, and their pranks and adventures were not of the defiant and law-ignoring order, but though one can cheerfully acquit Mrs. Martin of any desire or intention to pose her little heroine as a martyr, none the less, schools and school methods are on trial throughout the book, and children are entirely too much given to criticism in these days to need even so mild a stimulus. Let the mothers and aunties keep "Emmy Lou" for their own enjoyment, but by all means, give the girls the "Prairie Girl" and let them make her acquaintance as soon as they can read.

One cannot say enough in praise of the Book Lover. Each succeeding number is an improvement on the last, and as to special articles or particular topics in connection with books, it is literally a case of "All things come round to him who will but wait," for no matter what the special bit of information wanted, sooner or later, and usually sooner, it is sure to appear in the Book-Lover. One unique feature introduced recently is that of reviews of new books by their authors, and one is bound to acknowledge that besides the novelty, the books are fairly handled and without any attempt at log-rolling.

An Instructive Narrative

"Death Valley," with a sub-title, "Swamper Ike's Traditional Lore, Why, When, How?" is a sample of what D. A. Hufford of Los Angeles is doing. A "swamper," be it known, is a teamster's assistant, and this particular "swamper" under whose guidance we make a trip through Death Valley, proves competent not only to take his party through the hardships of the desert, but to relate the tradition and legends of the Indians concerning its origin, to point out its riches in mineral wealth and to give hints and advice which, though there is little likelihood that one will penetrate into that particular fastness, are none the less sure to prove valuable when traveling in arid regions. Apart from the narrative, and considered from the mechanical side, this is a neat little specimen of book-making. It is well printed, copiously illustrated and nicely bound in five different styles, according to taste and the size of one's pocket book. It is one of several similar volumes brought out by the same firm.

His First Novel

"The Ragged Edge," the first novel of John T. McIntyre, which is making a small stir in the literary world, had a somewhat eventful career in manuscript. It represented some six years' work by the young author, who wrote it at odd times and on whatever material came to hand, while employed in a Philadelphia bookstore. The completed work was sent to a publisher, but by ill fortune it took passage on a train that was held up and the manuscript disappeared with the other contents of the express box. There were no copies of several of the chapters, and Mr. McIntyre pulled himself together, after the first disappointment, and rewrote the whole book. No sooner had he completed the task when he was notified by the express company that the original had been recovered. One may imagine the state of the author's feelings when the announcement reached him.

"An Unshared Secret" is the title of one of the late bits of fiction. It would have answered just as well to have called it "A Secret," for had it been shared the secrecy would have been at an end.

A Short Story

Dorothy Richardson contributed a short story on an entirely novel subject to the December Lippincott. It related the efforts of a wealthy widow to please her husband's spirit by doing for it all she was unwilling to do for the living man. She kept a well-furnished apartment, arranged according to his ideas, and even provided a high-salaried housekeeper of the style and appearance which appealed to the gentleman in the flesh. Miss Richardson says the idea was evolved from an incident of her childhood. When six or seven years old she had a playhouse in a corner of the garden, which was shared with two little companions, a boy and girl. The dove of peace did not hover over the menage, and it was a daily occurrence for the two little women to banish the little man, who invariably departed in tears to his mother, with vows never to come back any more. One day he kept his promise, for he was seized with malignant diphtheria and died within a few hours. Then remorse took possession of the miniature feminine tyrants, and without suggesting or prompting, they set about doing for the dead child what they had refused the living. They re-named their dolls, rearranged their small possessions and remodeled their little household, in reverent deference to the spirit of their dead playmate.

The "unit system" of book publishing, which has proved such a success in England, is about to be transferred to America. The plan is to publish classics, short essays, and other standard works which are wanted in handy form, in neat paper editions, uniform in type and general appearance. The cost is regulated by the number of pages in print, with a few cents additional for cover, etc. Ten pages are to constitute a "unit." This is a better idea than the suggestion of Charles Howard Shinn, that magazine editors should arrange their more important articles in "forms," beginning at the top of a right hand page, and ending, as nearly as possible, with a full page, so that those who do not care to preserve the magazine entire can remove what they want for separate binding, either with kindred subjects or as a separate pamphlet.

A Celtic Colloquialism

Munsey's literary critic queries whether "The back of beyond" is an Irish or an Indian expression, the query being the result of having found the title of Jane Barlow's book in "Kim." "Here is food for discussion. Did Miss Barlow quote Kipling? Did Kipling quote Miss Barlow? Or are they the same—and if so, which one is the one? Or are the Hindus and the Irish mere branches of one race with common expressions?" The critic has read his Kipling to small purpose if this is the first time he has noted the expression, and he has paid still less attention to the speech of his Irish acquaintances if he has never discovered how common it is for them to locate out-of-the-way sections by the description, "at the back of beyond," or "at the back of God speed." Kipling uses it in precisely the same way, but the impetuous locator of imitations might have noted that Kipling never puts it into the mouth of one of his natives. Now, isn't it just barely possible that some of Mulvaney's numerous countrymen who make up a goodly part of the army in India may have given Kipling the expression, and isn't it quite likely that it is utterly and entirely Irish, unless when taken over by some "foreigner" who is struck with its appropriateness? In both forms, "at the back of beyond" and "at the back of God speed," I can remember having heard it used by Irish acquaintances long before Kipling was born, much less before "Kim" introduced it to the notice of the Munsey critic.

The Bookman warns its readers that unless something happens to relieve the situation the January issue is apt to be behind time, for the office force is too deep in the discussion of what Sherlock Holmes gave Watson for a wedding present to have time for minor considerations. The question is an interesting one, and has quite as much bearing upon life and literature as a good many others which are debated in all seriousness. It is as important as the morals of Rosalie in Gilbert Parker's "The Right of Way," and worth losing as much sleep over as the essential gentlemanliness of David Copperfield. Moreover, it has a better chance of solution than the Bacon-Shakespeare discussion or Stockton's problem of "The Lady or the Tiger?"

AN IDEAL TYPE.

One of the handsomest calendars issued this year is that sent with the compliments of Rainier Beer. The subject of the calendar, a beautiful American girl, illustrates an ideal type taken from the life. It is said that with the utmost difficulty could the beauty's consent be obtained to pose before a New York photographer. Her face is produced in lithograph, several stones by the most famous lithographers being required to complete the calendar.

Other Peoples' Ideaa

From "The Battle with the Slums," by Jacob I. Riis:

"'Causes that operate sociologically' are the opportunity of the political and every other kind of scamp who trades upon the depravity and helplessness of the slum, and the refuge of the pessimist who is useless in the fight against them."

"Arbitration is good, but there are times when it becomes necessary to knock a man down and arbitrate sitting on him."

"No doubt soap may be dear and salvation cheap, but on the other hand, cleanliness does, and ever must begin godliness when fighting the slum."

"Doubtless ignorance is a peril, but the selfishness that trades on ignorance is a greater."

"When last I was in Denmark, my native land, I noticed they have a way of flying the flag on Sunday—whether in honor of the day, or because they loved it, or because they felt the need of flying it in the face of their big and greedy German neighbor, I shall not say. But it was all right. Why can we not do the same? It would not hurt the flag and it would not hurt the day. They would both be better for it—we would all be."

"It seemed to me sometimes, when watching the process of cramming the school course with the sum of human knowledge and conceit, as if it all meant that we distrusted Nature's way of growing a man from a boy, and had set out to show her a shorter cut. . . . There was no moral sense to be got out of the thing, for there was little sense of any kind in it."

"There is a time in every young man's life when he knows more than his father. It is like the measles or the mumps, and he gets over it with a little judicious firmness in the hand that guides. It is the misfortune of the slum boy of today that it really is so, and that he knows it."

"You do not want to reform men by main strength, drag them into righteousness by the hair of the head, as it were."

"It is not so long since the notion yet prevailed that the schools were principally to lock children up in for the convenience of their parents."

"Teaching the boy municipal politics and a thousand other things to make a good citizen of him, instead of so filling him with the love of his country and pride in traditions that he is bound to take the right stand when the time comes, is as though one were to attempt to put all the law of the State into its constitution to make it more binding. The result would be hopeless congestion and general uselessness."

"When I pick up a report of one (social) settlement and another, and find them filled with little essays on the people and their ways and manners, as if the settlement were some kind of a laboratory where they prepare human specimens for inspection and classification—stick them on pins like bugs and hold them up and twirl them so as to let us have a good look—then I know that somebody has wandered away off, and that he knows he has, for all he is making a brave show of trying to persuade himself and us that it was worth the money."

"The old love of fair play has been whittled down by the jack-knife of all-pervading expediency to an anæmic desire to 'hold the scales even,' which is a favorite modern device of the devil for paralyzing action in men. You cannot hold the scales even in a moral issue. It inevitably results in the triumph of evil, which asks nothing better than the even chance to which it is not entitled."

"There has been a good deal of talk in our day about the saloon as a social necessity. About all there is to that is that the saloon is there, and the necessity, too. Man is a social animal, whether he lives in a tenement or a palace. But the palace has resources; the tenement has not. It is a good place to get away from at all times. The saloon is cheery and bright and never far away. The man craving human companionship finds it there. He finds, too, in the saloon-keeper one who understands his wants much better than the reformer who talks civil service in the meetings."

"There is as much work for reform at the top as at the bottom. The man in the slum votes according to his light, and the boss holds the candle."

"I have no quarrel with the man who would do things by system and in order; but the man who would reduce men and women and children to mere items in his infallible system and classify and sub-classify them until they are as dried up as his theories, that man I will fight till I die. One throb of a human heart is worth a whole book of his stuff."

"Out of the public school comes, must come if we are to last, the real democracy that has our hope in keeping. I wish it were in my power to compel every father to send his boy to the public school; I would do it, and so perchance bring the school up to the top notch where it was lacking."

"When a boy has had his head swelled by his importance as a member of a Junior Street-cleaning Board to the point of reproving his mother for throwing a banana peel in the street, the thing to be done is take him out and spank him, if it is reverting to 'the savagery of the street.' Better a savage than a cad. The boys have the making of both in them. Their vanity furnishes abundant material for the cad, but only when unduly pampered."

Bold Bribers at Work

The battle for the United States Senatorship which has engaged the attention of politicians in this State for several weeks is remarkable for the boldness of the operations of certain freebooters of the political high seas. Not the slightest effort was made to conceal the fact that it was the purpose of certain degraded politicians to purchase votes for the toga. The report was openly bruited that a large sum of money had been raised to bribe members of the legislature in the interest of a certain candidate for the Senatorship. It was not deemed necessary to reveal his identity. Votes were solicited for him not on account of any claims he might have to political preferment, but simply because he had the price, and was willing to put it up. Members of the legislature publicly announced that they had been approached and offered money, and yet the constituted authorities made not the slightest effort to secure the arrest and conviction of the offenders. Assemblymen Mott, Walsh and Bliss of Alameda county stated, at a meeting across the bay, that attempts had been made to bribe them. Their statements were published, but the Grand Jury failed to summon them to question them concerning the corrupt influences that were at work. The same indifference was shown in the case of Walker of Los Gatos. Have we become so degenerate that we deem it not worth our while to take cognizance of the demoralizing influences that are operating in our midst? A short time ago, when it was discovered that a police officer in this city had accepted a bribe from a fallen woman, the daily papers were plunged into an hysterical condition that lasted for several days. They ranted about corruption in the police department as though our old friend, "the palladium of our liberties," was in jeopardy. Yet police officers are so notoriously fond of tips that a farce-comedy cannot be a success unless it has a cop with a long reach as one of its characters. The bribing of a member of the legislature is a much more serious offense than the corrupting of a police officer, and it is indeed a significant commentary on the looseness of our morals that three Assemblymen can publicly proclaim that money was offered them for their votes, without stimulating injuiry, either on the part of the authorities or the press. Even the pulpit, which is ever ready to assert itself for advertising purposes, appears to regard the disgraceful proceedings of the past few months as legitimate. If all that has been said in connection with this Senatorial battle, about Colonel Dan Burns and Martin Kelly, is true, then those two active politicians should be wearing stripes in the penitentiary. But nobody conceives it to be his duty to lure them into the meshes of the law. What a splendid opportunity there is for a Grand Jury to make a fine record!

London's Smart Set Scored

Even the slow and sedate papers of London were impelled to criticism of the British smart set, by the revelations of the Hartopp divorce case. And they have attacked it in language almost as bitter as that used by Mr. Watterson in his strictures on the social element in this country which has the smart set of London for a prototype. According to the London Standard, "the thoughts and the purposes of a civilized and cultured age appear to be nonexistent for this pleasure-loving group," and "it never seems to occur to any of its members that they have any vocation but of enjoyment and excitement." The Standard concludes that "a society so constituted cannot be expected to exhibit a high level of refinement," and as a matter of fact, the letters, the telegrams and the conversations introduced during the Hartopp trial were "largely composed of vulgar slang," and were "flippant and foolish." The whole body of evidence suggested that English society had "dispensed with most of the restrictions of etiquette and it would seem even of ordinary politeness and good breeding." The society of fashion is the same in London as it is here. Its only purpose is amusement and excitement. It feels no responsibility to anybody outside of its circle. It has the leisure for frolic and the money to pay for its diversions. Why should it bother itself about the conventions and the rules of etiquette? It is remarkable that in its excesses it does not go to greater extremes. The vogue of adultery and the promiscuity of affections are the natural results of indifference to public opinion. There is nothing the smart set does which should cause astonishment.

The Jewish Problem

The good Dr. Silverman, of the Temple Emanu-el in Fifth avenue, New York, has undertaken a strenuous task, that of persuading the Jews of the Gotham Ghetto to become assimilated with their neighbors. He went into the very heart of the Ghetto last week to oppose the Zionite movement and to appeal to the denizens of that quarter to abandon their Yiddish jargon and pull down the bars of exclusiveness. He was hissed for his pains, and a somewhat violent demonstration was made against the learned and distinguished rabbi. It is apparent that there has arisen a new Jewish problem in New York—that there is a wide gulf of separation between the Jews who have immigrated hither during the last twenty years from Russia, Roumania and Austria, and those who represent the spirit of the old settlers. Fifty years ago the Jews of this country did not number more than fifty thousand. Cordial relations existed between them and the Christians. There were many instances of intermarriage. Jewish blood was infused into the best New England families. Jews were prominent in the Southern aristocracy. The most distinguished intellect in the Confederate Government was Judah P. Benjamin. A Jew was one of the founders of the New York Stock Exchange. Jews have always been among the most distinguished citizens on this coast. But the Jewish population of the country has increased to the extent of over a million and a quarter, and a large element among the newcomers has refused to affiliate with the rest of the people. The Ghetto of New York is more densely populated than Chinatown in this city and it is as distinct from other sections of the metropolis as is the Mongolian quarter of San Francisco. Its denizens are intensely orthodox and are far removed in spirit from the Jews of the older settlement. They speak the Yiddish jargon, the signs on their stores are as mysterious as those of Chinatown, they read Yiddish papers and magazines sold on book stands that deal exclusively in them, and there are six Yiddish theatres which they patronize exclusively. It was to these people that Dr. Silverman appealed, and when he told them that their jargon was "not a civilized language" and advised them to become American citizens, to keep their race distinction out of politics and be Jews in religion only, they expressed their intense antipathy for his sentiments with the violence of resentful disorder. The Jews of the Ghetto may become assimilated with their neighbors in time, but no rabbi from Fifth avenue will ever be able to persuade them to give up their jargon by denouncing it as "uncivilized."

The Age of Skepticism

A prominent European writer recently remarked. "There are no heroes any more," and the editor of that brilliant weekly, the St. Louis Mirror, adds, "Verily, we are living in an age of knockers, iconoclasts, critics and cynics. Everybody seems to be engaged in finding fault, in criticising and 'roasting.' No wonder that the hero species is close to extinction!" All of which bespeaks a broader intelligence than the world has heretofore enjoyed. Education is a prophylactic against gullibility. Gold bricks are not disposed of so easily today as they were twenty years ago. For the same reason we are less inclined to accept men and women at their own valuation. This is an age of skepticism. We are given to inquiry. We are competent to appraise merit, and therefore we demand that we be permitted to judge of it. We have seen so many idols shattered that we hesitate to worship at a new shrine. The claims of each new idol must be well authenticated. We are told that Mr. So and So is a great orator, and when we hear him orate we find that he is merely an elocutionist who declaims ponderous platitudes with the pompous assurance of an oracle. The eminent statesman turns out to be a talented demagogue, the brilliant litterateur is merely a well-boomed charlatan, and the matinee hero is an actor with a limited repertoire and padded shoulders. However there is real greatness in the world, and when its possessor demonstrates his capability we are quick to applaud. When Marconi first proclaimed the practicability of wireless telegraphy he was looked upon with suspicion. We knew of several other scientists who had promised great achievements, and who had received a lot of free advertising without accomplishing anything. Consequently we were skeptical of the genius of Marconi, but he has "made good" and he is now the lion of the hour. We are even prepared to believe him sincere if he should express the opinion that communication with Mars is not impossible. But we scoff at Mr. Tesla, the electrician, who has said a great deal about what he purposed doing but who has not done anything to win our confidence. Our enthusiasm for the heroes of the Spanish war has not diminished, though some of them have made themselves ridiculous since the days when they covered themselves with glory. The fact is that we are as eager for ideals as ever, even though we are pleased to view the "Fathers" of our country in the light of "subsequent events" and conclude that they were "great old fakers." Skepticism is not to be discouraged, for it protects the world from chicanery, but let us frown upon Envy, that vicious-tongued monster that is ever quick to sneer at success and disparage merit.

Hale's Absurd Views

In opposing, the other day, a bill to add four new fighting ships to the navy, Senator Hale remarked that if we should ever go to war with a foreign country "our enemy must come to us," and that "our tremendous coast lines on the Atlantic and Pacific are our best protection." Evidently Mr. Hale has forgotten that we have acquired the Philippines. His argument would be sound enough if we had no possessions in the Orient, but since the Spanish War the situation has changed. As soon as war with Spain was declared Dewey's fleet started for Manila, and if we have trouble with a European country one of its first acts will be the launching of a fleet against our island possessions. The Venezuelan episode converted members of Congress to the wisdom of quickly adding strength to the navy. At a time when the Monroe Doctrine was being discussed in every capital in Europe, and foreign statesmen were hoping that its vitality would be impaired, it was wise to assert our unswerving devotion to the policy which it enunciates by giving evidence of our intention to defend it. And that was the purpose of the measure for an appropriation for the construction of four more fighting ships. The moral effect was achieved, but Senator Hale did not like to let such a splendid opportunity for the preaching of economy to slip. He says that he does not think it wise to have a great navy. He is of the opinion that it is a guarantee of peace. The experience of England does not bear out the views of Mr. Hale. Though England has been involved in one or two unimportant complications with European countries it has never had to test the strength of its modern navy. Respect for that navy has deterred more than one nation of Europe from becoming involved and provoking trouble. Though Senator Hale thinks we should go slow in building up our navy, there are other and wiser statesmen who are of the opinion that we should make haste in order to anticipate aggressive action on the part of Germany. Though it has become apparent that England believes it to be to her interest and to the interest of Canada to stand by the United States in all matters affecting the Monroe Doctrine, it is certain that Germany is eager for us to abandon that policy. So great is England's interest in the matter that the statesmen of that country are eager for an alliance with America, and mainly for the purpose of intimidating Germany. British statesmen believe that Germany has been formulating its naval program with the purpose in view of disputing the validity of the Monroe Doctrine. Emperor William affects great friendship for us, but the German press has been talking lately of blowing our foreign policy sky high, and in recent speeches the Kaiser has expressed apprehension of danger from our commercial and political expansion. Moreover he is in sympathy with a movement on the part of German manufacturers who have organized for the express purpose of driving back the American invasion of the German markets. True, the Berlin foreign office has given our Government assurances that Germany has no intention of acquiring territory in South America at the expense of Venezuela. Unquestionably there is no occasion for fear of any project for territorial aggrandizement at this time, but there should not be the slightest doubt that Emperor William fondly hopes to place the German flag on new soil in South America in the not very distant future. German influence is growing stronger every day in that country. Most of the foreign trade of the country is in the hands of Germans, who laugh at the Monroe Doctrine. Moreover German army engineers have been traveling all over the country on map-making expeditions, and within the last few months German statesmen have written articles for Berlin papers in support of a project to annex territory in South America. The time is not ripe for aggressions, but it will be in a few years, when Germany will have at her disposal in home waters about ninety modern war ships. If she had them now perhaps she would not be so willing to submit the Venezuelan dispute to arbitration.

Cruelty to Children

Isabel T. Smart says, in Health Culture: "In Brooklyn the games played by the children in the public schools are all graded, arranged and taught with as much system and forethought as is the subject of mathematics or German. Much time and labor have been spent in providing—as nearly as is possible under the existing circumstances—for suitable play yards, and a properly graded system of games." Of course the idea is to "teach something" by means of tag and prisoner's base, and have the children gain some "ultimate truth" out of their recreation, but can one imagine anything more dreary than to be obliged to "play" under pedagogical supervision? This idea of taking advantage of every possible occasion to turn things into a lesson is one of the educational fads of the hour, and the talkers and scribblers on the subject never lose sight of an opportunity to glorify themselves and their methods. Readers of Sir Walter Besant's novel, "All Sorts and Conditions of Men," will remember the Palace of Delight conceived by two of the characters of the book, designed for the amusement and recreation of the people in one of the poorer sections of London. It will also be remembered that just such a Palace of Delight was brought into being and called the People's Palace. From time to time we are regaled in newspapers and magazines with accounts of the educational advantages it offers—night schools, trade schools, and what not, all of which are praised to the skies. Sir Walter says in his Autobiography that the original object was lost sight of and the end of its establishment defeated when the People's Palace was turned to utilitarian purposes and amusement and recreation crowded out. Jacob I. Riis in his "Battle with the Slum" tells of the fight made by himself and his associates for school playgrounds for the children. In one instance the playground was presided over by the janitor, who objected to extra work, so stationed an assistant at the entrance, armed with a club, to prevent the children from playing. In another case these slum children, living in tenements without yards, and with no place for disporting themselves except in the streets, found their gymnastic apparatus stored away and tables substituted, on which they were permitted to play games with educational cards. To be sure, as Mr. Riis says, the cards had geographical names on them and the boys were supposed to be absorbing knowledge by easy and undetected means, but what they were actually doing was gambling—betting on which card would turn up. In another case it was reported that the children "did not avail themselves of their privileges" of playing, and it was found on investigation that "play" consisted of "learning something" from one of the teachers in charge, and romping or running or filling their lungs was a misdemeanor. It has always been a notorious fact that institution-raised children were handicapped in their struggle for existence. They lack spontaneity and initiative and seem unable to act for themselves or to stand alone. They want the command, the signal to start and to stop, and the crowd to act with them. The public schools are fast becoming institutionalized. Some discipline there must be, and order in the coming and going, but there is such a thing as too much. When children have to play under orders, and are classified as in the "Tag class," or the "Fox and Farmer class," or the "Prisoners' Base class," it is only one step further to put them in uniform and substitute numbers for their proper names. It would be an undisguised blessing for the present generation of children, not to mention their successors, if the promulgation of an educational fad were to be made indisputable evidence of incurable insanity. What children want just now is a lot of family discipline in the places where it is neglected, and a wholesome and judicious letting alone in the directions where they are getting the most supervision.

Pardee Offends Club Women

Governor Pardee may be a very polished gentleman, but unless he is far more tactful than he was on a recent occasion when he granted an audience to a committee of clubwomen he is likely to involve himself in endless complications before the end of his term. The Governor is a graduate of Berkeley and a professional gentleman, and therefore the presumption is that he is versed in the conventions of polite society, but there are several cultured club women of this city who, after meeting the Oakland doctor on official business concluded that, notwithstanding his college training, he is lacking in those essentials which Mrs. Astor thinks no gentleman should be without. And those clubwomen have had their hammers out with a vengeance. They think it an awful shame that this State should have such a man for Governor, and one of them remarked, somewhat saucily, that she was prepared to believe that a pickhandle was more congenial to him than a clawhammer.

Why They Were Offended

The incident that occasioned all the trouble occurred before Dr. Pardee was inducted into office. The committee, headed by that distinguished woman, Mrs. John F. Swift, called on His Excellency to advocate the appointment of a commission whose duty it should be to visit the factories of the State and see that no child of tender years was employed therein. The Governor had made an appointment to meet the ladies at eleven a. m. and they were on time, but Dr. Pardee was not. He kept them toasting their tosies for fully an hour. Think of that—the representatives of a woman's club compelled to dance, or rather sit, attendance on a mere man, a servant of the people, for a whole hour! But that was not exactly the gravamen of the offense. When the Oakland doctor appeared to receive the ladies he was attired in a faded dressing gown, and on his feet were shabby carpet slippers. Imagine the astonishment of the ladies! The shock disturbed the continuity of Mrs. Swift's thought long after she began her address. But worse than all, when she finished her remarks Dr. Pardee began to growl like an old bear. He appeared to be indignant that they had wasted his valuable time, and he spoke to them in such a manner that Mrs. Swift resented his brusque speech and lectured him briefly on the subject of official courtesy. Dr. Pardee thereupon undertook to apologize. He said he should always be glad to receive them, but he was informed that one experience with him was quite enough. The parting was very frigid.

Jimmy's Latest Plunge

So Mr. Jimmy Dunphy has been defying home prejudices again by getting married by a Justice of the Peace. Jimmy's first marriage many years ago was an elopement, and I believe it was a San Rafael justice who tied the knot. Dunphy Sr., the cattle-king, was a great stickler for the religious proprieties, and being a strict Catholic he had the ceremony performed in church. But it did not appear to be any the more binding on Jimmy, who has always been something of a free lance in love affairs. This latest escapade aroused, no doubt, the indignation of his mother, who is now advanced in years and who controls the financial policy of the family. Dunphy Sr. never had any confidence in the financial ability of his son, and he disposed of his estate in a way that barred Jimmy from any hand in the management. And though Jimmy is now in the idle forties he has to depend on his mamma for an allowance.

Is Bernie Engaged?

The latest engagement rumor connects the names of Bernie Drown and Howard Veeder. The latter's devotion to this brown-eyed beauty has been noticed by his friends for some time, and now they say the devotion has received its reward. The match would be a good one from all points of view. Miss Drown is dark, Mr. Veeder is fair. Both love music and both enjoy social life. Mr. Veeder is a U. C. graduate and was a member of the Glee Club when he attended the university. Miss Drown is one of the best-liked girls in her set, and is invited everywhere. She has had the benefit of foreign travel, to cap a thorough school education. Her brother Willard married Edith Preston, Colonel Preston's daughter.

Invented a Novel Diamond Setting

Dr. Luella Cool's marriage with Dr. C. H. Walker was very quietly celebrated on Thursday of last week in Oakland. The few guests invited included the bridegroom's two daughters, Mrs. Havens and Mrs. Engs, and the bride's daughter, Mrs. Ward. Dr. Luella Cool used to have an office on this side of the bay, where she practiced up-to-date dentistry. She it was who invented for her patients the fad of implanting diamonds in the teeth. She went to Central America with this diamond-setting idea, and the brainy little brunette made quite a success down there. But she soon felt homesick for California, and returned to her old field of work. Dr. Walker is one of Oakland's "prominent cit's" and I understand is comfortably off in this world's goods. His bride's former husband, Dr. Russell Cool, is also married again. He has a lovely country-place near Los Gatos where he entertains his Bohemian friends on occasions. Dicka, his daughter by the other marriage, stayed with their mother after the divorce. She married a young mining man named Ward, who went to Siberia before the honeymoon was over and died there.

Stinging Personalities

Several members of the Bohemian Club were so severely jolted at the holiday jinks that they are talking about resigning. The personalities indulged on that occasion were of a very stinging character, and the smart inflicted in several instances was more than skin deep. The Bohemian is not a club in which to encourage personalities for it has some very thin-skinned members on the surface of whose bodies there are many raw spots. To maintain perfect harmony in such a club the flame of mutual admiration must be fanned incessantly. However, at the jinks personalities ran riot, and though the victims affected a good-natured interest in the jests at their expense, in more than one instance there was perceptible squirming. The climax was reached when the rear end of a horse appeared on the stage. The gathering was informed that it was alive and that if addressed by its proper name it would make response. Several names were shouted but without effect, and finally it was addressed as Joe Campbell. Immediately the rear section became animated, lifting and swishing the tail and executing a dance. I hear that Dick Hotaling was responsible for this bit of humor, and that it aroused the indignation of Mr. Campbell.

The Nile Club

When the Nile Club's rooms went up in smoke in Oakland last week, nearly all the club's belongings were saved except the valuable fifteen thousand dollar lion picture. Dr. Crowley, Clarence Crowell and a few other members managed to reach the rooms via the roof of Klingeberg's store, and so saved the club's furnishings that could be most readily rescued. The Nile is an organization similar to the Athenian and Bohemian clubs, but its formation began in a most unconventional manner. A few years ago Abe Leach, Clarence Crowell, Frank Raynes and another singer belonged to an "after dark" quartet. One night they were singing a serenade beneath the lattice of Charles A. Doyle when the latter called them in. In the course of conversation, Doyle raked up a reminiscence of the old Congo Club of Alameda and suggested that they five should form the nucleus of such a club in Oakland. The idea proved pleasing, Doyle suggesting as a name of the proposed organization the Nile Club. Later, Harry Melvin, J. A. Zander and others strengthened the five, and for seven months they held a monthly jinks at Mr. Doyle's home. The meetings were of a purely social character, and the programs of entertainment were always unique and sometimes even brilliant. Dr. D. D. Crowley joined and was made president, Crowell, Leach, Melvin and Doyle forming the first board of directors.

In time the Nile Club had its own rooms, Dr. Crowley being the moving spirit in obtaining and furnishing them up to the best club standard. On the walls were hung relics of the original club. One was a sketch of Doyle in the act of reading an original paper at the initial meeting. Another, more serious, by Dr. Wilson, represented the pyramids and the Nile. Two clever bits in charcoal showed a candidate on the apex of a pyramid with an enormous crocodile climbing up after him, the other showing the same man half way down the maw of the Nile's sacred lizard. I do not know how many of these treasures were saved from the flames in last week's fire.

Among the early members of the club were Billy Foote, Ben Clark, Tom Dargie, Carl Abbott, George De Golia, Martin Egan, Frank Jordan, Elmore Leffingwell, A. D. Moore Jr., Dr. Mehrmann, Roy Macdonald, Alex Stewart, Charles Spear, Bob Knight, Frank T. Thompson, Dr. Wakeman, Dr. Pardee, Dr. Sullivan, Fred Whitney, Harry Thomas and J. W. Stetson. One of the Nile's favorite songs, written by one of the "poet" members, goes like this:

"The Congo river is a mighty big stream,
And it flows in the bosom of the Nile;
There the 'pottamus listens on a summer's day
To the snore of the crocodile!
There's jungles on the side where the tigers hide,
And the ring-tailed monkeys smile,
A-watchin' of the elephants a-twistin' of their trunks
By the waters of the flowing Nile!

Refrain.

"On the green Nile, the green Nile!
That flows from the west to the east,
There the little niggers play
Seven-up all day,
And dance at a missionary feast!

"It keeps a-flowin' and a-goin',
While the monkeys are a-laughin' all the while,
On an irrigatin' chase all over the place
Goes the jolly, jolly river Nile!

"On a summer's night when the moon shines bright,
Rhinoceros a-snorin' in the lake,
Then the Nile niggers gather for a jamboree,
Sneakin' through the jungle and the brake!
Then the tom-tom tinkles and the calabash drums
Keep time in a very fine style,
With the niggers a-dancin' of the light fantastic
On the lovely little river of the Nile!"

Hoover at the Century Club

No more attentive readers of the newspaper accounts of the Moxey trial, now dragging its long length out in Judge Coffey's court, can be found in San Francisco than the members of the Century Club. The society ladies who compose this exclusive organization, strange as it may seem, are acquainted with "Professor" Moxey, who espoused a Mrs. Phillips, richly dowered in years and shekels, and they also know his side-partner, "Professor" John F. Hoover. This is the story. The Century Club, it seems, like similar active social organizations, is blest with an entertainment committee, and this committee in its desire to keep abreast of every passing fad, determined to get somebody to deliver a lecture on physical culture, and "Professor" Hoover was unanimously chosen. On the appointed day he appeared at the club accompanied by his understudy, "Professor" Moxey, and six ladies of assorted ages in very abbreviated skirts, whom he introduced as his class. The lecture was illustrated by gymnastic exercises by this corps of coryphees, while the beguiling Moxey struck Apollo Belvedere poses at the side-line.

A Chipper Septuagenarian

"Ladies, I will now present to you Mrs. Sallie Wiggles, of 9310 Mission street," chirruped the Professor, and then in a stage whisper: "She is seventy-two years of age and was a confirmed invalid for twenty years, until last summer she began to take my treatment." Thereupon an athletic little woman, somewhere in the sunny forties, bounded from the flies on to the stage and did about everything but turn hand-springs.

"Next we have Miss Sophie Spongecake of 11,014 Valencia street," chortled Hoover. "She weighed two hundred pounds and was adding adiposity at the rate of ten pounds a week when my gifted assistant, 'Professor' Moxey, took her case in hand. She is forty years of age." Miss Spongecake looked like a section of picket fence in good repair, seemed to be about twenty years of age, and was certainly able to jump higher than any woman in the room. The club members viewed this acrobatic performance with great interest, but the Professor's statements failed for some reason to impress them, for his school gained no clientele through his lecture. Miss Ethyl Hager remarked that Hoover should add archery to his curriculum, since he was such an expert with the long-bow.

An Historic House

The home in which the Philip Verrill Mighels's have settled themselves for the winter and spring is the old Silk Culture House in Piedmont. They have made themselves quite comfortable in this primitive abode, where quail and squirrels abound within shooting distance. The game can be shot from the window in this "arch-adian" place, as Mrs. Mighels wittily terms it. The author of "The Inevitable" is an ardent sportsman and did great feats in the way of fishing and hunting in Nevada during his recent occupancy of the Granite Mansion, the erstwhile home of the Washoe Seeress. Mr. Mighels came to California to rest his eyes, which he had overworked in London, and he was told to amuse himself with outdoor life for a time and let literature alone.

A Brilliant Woman Passed Away

Mrs. George Emmons White, who passed away in New York last week, was the eldest daughter of Mrs. Clara Shortridge Foltz, and was the most gifted of the three Foltz sisters. She married when quite a young girl Dr. Charles Gridley Toland, some time after his divorce from Anne Buckler, who not long ago took unto herself another husband in the East. After Dr. Toland's death, the young widow went upon the stage. She became a favorite member of Frohman's forces, but did not remain an actress long enough to attain stellar fame. Her tastes led her to another career and she took up newspaper work and literature with marked success. Two years ago her marriage with Rear Admiral White's son occurred. Her sisters, Bertha and Virginia, both adopted stage careers.

Stevenson's Step-Daughter

Though Robert Louis Stevenson has been a long time dead we are constantly being reminded that the family he married into is very much alive. Since his death the members of that family have been serving up his literary remains as precious tidbits, and no doubt they find it a profitable occupation. The latest evidence of the family's activity is the book issued by the popular author's stepchildren, in which Isobel Strong does some good work. How many recognize in the literary lady Isobel Strong, the harum-scarum Belle Osbourne who attended school in Oakland years ago. I recall her as a bright, swarthy-skinned, glowing-eyed child, short of stature and older in knowledge than in years. Her mother had been an actress, her grandmother was a famous theatrical costumer, and little Belle had been on the stage as a child wonder. And indeed she could pirouette and do various fancy dances with which she entertained her companions in the school-yard. Later on she fell in love with the son of a Presbyterian minister who had shown considerable talent as an artist. He went abroad with Toby Rosenthal to study art, and Belle Osbourne's heart went with him. The young man was Joe Strong and he married Belle Osbourne on his return from Europe. Some years later they separated and Strong married another. For awhile the young grass-widow worked as a reporter on the dailies, and then her mother made the fortunate marriage with Robert Louis Stevenson.

A Honolulu Betrothal

An engagement announced from Honolulu is that of Miss Ethel Kittredge and Mr. Edmund Baker. She is a daughter of the E. H. The Village Elite Get Gay

When San Rafael's Exclusive Ten tear loose in masquerade, the bickerings of the whist club are for the nonce forgotten, and uproarious hilarity fills the commuter's soul. Then, too, does the dealer in second-hand and fifteenth-hand fripperies jubilate. Mrs. Vincent Neale's Twelfth Night party came to a head on the date indicated. Mr. Neale, in a full court costume, that might have done service in a comic opera company, presented a picture of unparalleled magnificence. Dr. Howett must have gone to considerable expense for the evanescent glory of a Toreador's gold lace and scarlet plush. Harry Francis—too wary a bird to be lured to a prodigal display of rented plumage—appeared in shirt sleeves (his own) and a pastry-cook's cap. The ladies displayed corresponding taste and originality. Mrs. Hazeltine made a strenuous Topsy, Mrs. Hitchcock an adipose, but pleasing Chinatown belle, while Mrs. Cushing as an old maid and Mrs. Francis as a dowager of the seventeenth century looked their parts.

A Soubrette Mother

The Frank Daniels company is remarkable for the number of married couples to be found therein. Nearly every other man in the company has his lawfully wedded wife to flirt with on the stage. Even young Gracie Myers, the talented daughter of Annie Myers of the Tivoli, is not without her spouse, though he—Grafton Baker—has to flirt with another girl in "Miss Simplicity." Mr. Baker, by the way, is a graduate of the Ohio College of Pharmacy, and his father is a wealthy resident of that State. The young man preferred music to drugs, and went into grand opera for a season. It was while with a comic opera company, a little over a year ago, that he met and wooed Gracie Myers. The latter left this city two years ago to enter the Eastern theatrical whirl, and during her absence her mother took unto herself a husband in the person of Mr. Charles Pickler, an attorney. Gracie Myers returned home last Sunday, and there was a family reunion. It was the first time that Mrs. Pickler met her son-in-law, and also the first time that Mrs. Baker met her stepfather. There was great rejoicing on all sides. Mother and daughter look like sisters even without the aid of make-up. It is a somewhat novel experience for theatre-goers to listen to a prima donna one night, and to her soubrette mother the next night. Mother and daughter are intensely devoted to each other, and last Monday night Annie Myers availed herself of the opportunity to slip across the alley that separates the stage entrances of the Tivoli and Columbia and sit in the wings of the latter house and listen to the singing of "Miss Simplicity." Between acts at the Columbia, Gracie Myers slipped over to the Tivoli and listened to mamma in the role of Jack of Beanstalk fame.

As to "The Cross Ways"

After seeing Gracie and Annie Myers together one might be justified in surmising that when the latter was the soubrette of Lillian Russell's company on that memorable trip to England she stole from the airy, fairy one the secret of perennial youth. But perhaps both of them obtained it from the beautiful Langtry, who, the New York critics agree, is younger and more beautiful than ever. They also agree, however, that "The Cross-Ways," the play which she brought from London, is the worst ever. Acton Davis, the clever critic of the Evening Sun, wrote apropos of the play: "Poor King Edward! Poorer Queen Alexandra! Hereafter, in the time to come, when historians write the story of their lives, and the sacrifices which England's present King and Queen made for their country, the fact that they sat through a performance of 'The Cross-Ways' will be duly recorded to their credit under the head of Martyrdoms." One critic advises Mrs. Langtry to rest on her pasts and her pearls "instead of trying so late in the day to be still a bad actress."

Our Minister to Venezuela

Up at the University Club the other day some of the Yale men were talking of Herbert C. Bowen who has come into prominence as the American Minister to Venezuela. He is well known by several of the Yale alumni of this city. He was of the class of '78, and such well known diplomat as Andrew D. White and William Walter Phelps were his classmates. He was consul to Barcelona at the opening of the Spanish war, and in his biographical record in his classbook is his own statement of the riots in that town when the war broke out. One paragraph is as follows: "On April twentieth four thousand persons filled the square and cheered for Spain. I was dining and pushed my way from the hotel back, getting to my door and facing the mob. A big man pushed through the crowd and stood beside me, but did not speak. We faced the crowd, which continued to threaten us. The mob had no leader, and for a quarter of an hour we two and the mob faced each other. Then the soldiers and the police arrived, and the mob melted away. I asked the stranger who he was and he said, 'I am Norman Harrington of Chicago. This is my first day in Barcelona. It seemed to me there might be some trouble for the eagle up there and I thought I'd take a bit of it.' "

'Twas at the Brigham Ball

The Brigham girls were at the Loughborough-Wallace wedding, which reminds me that it was at their house the young people became acquainted. Mr. Wallace was more or less devoted to one of them, and he was invited to the big ball that they gave last year. It was there he fell in love with the charming girl who became his bride this week. The story is told of one of the Brigham girls that while in a literary mood one day she remarked that she was very fond of reading. Some one asked her what book she was devouring at that moment and she frankly replied:

"Mr. Barnes of New York."

The Ways of Writers

The disinterested spectator of the Comedie Humaine finds much amusement in watching the by-play between persons of the now fashionable "artistic temperament"—literary aspirants, say. This one who has tried the short-story (the limitations of which he was wont to liken to those of the sonnet), with the result of enriching the post-office department and acquiring a complete collection of return slips, now pooh-poohs the art of DeMaupassant and Poe, and while trying his hand at play-writing, assures you that here is something worth the while of genius, instancing Sophocles, Aeschylus, Shakespeare, Moliere, Goethe, etc. This other, who has "made good" with the editors of the short-story magazines, is of the opinion that any fool can write a play. A third, who has succeeded in "placing" a novel, meeting the successful short-story writer, falls to talking of "sustained fiction." "It requires brains, my boy," he declares, with divine condescension and admirable modesty, "to keep the thing up for one hundred and fifty thousand words," etc., etc. "No one but a lot of women reads fiction anyway," sneers the essayist, taking up the word.

The Sneer at Journalism

In the company of newspapermen, all the foregoing are careful to emphasize the fine distinction between literature and journalism. The poet rides his high-horse roughshod over the lot. Yesterday Jones deemed pricking to death by pen points the desert of the editor who printed such stuff as appeared in the Snip-Snap Magazine; today he informs you that he considers the Snip-Snap the standard of literary excellence; and you at once know where in the near future you may read in print a Jones masterpiece. Finally, those are popular who agree with Tolstoi that in matters artistic the voice of the people is the voice of God; while those who please the learned critics, but never see their names on the lists of the "six best selling," are of one mind with Stevenson, that praise, in so far as one may mean the countenance of other artists, is a savory dish, and one of the most enduring pleasures of the career of art.

Cupid's Conquest of a Bohemian Bachelor

The news of the engagement of Florence Josselyn and Henry McDonald Spencer occasioned no surprise among their friends. It was a case of the happening of the expected. By their marriage the Bohemian Club will lose another of its active bachelor members. Mr. Spencer is one of the "literary members in trade." He is one of the most cultured members of the club. There are few men in San Francisco better versed in the classics, and few of the dilettante litterateurs able to wield such a facile pen as Spencer's. It was through his taste for literature that Mr. Spencer made the acquaintance of Miss Josselyn, for he is a friend of her father, the author of "The True Napoleon." Miss Josselyn is one of the brightest girls in society, and consequently one of the most companionable. She made her debut four or five years ago, and she has made two trips to Europe.

Is Toland a Bigamist?

The club friends of Hugo Toland are wondering whether he is a bigamist. Two weeks ago I announced the report of his marriage with Blanche Walsh, the actress, and stated that I had not heard of his divorce from Gertrude Tidball to whom he was married two years ago. I have since learned that at the time of the report of his marriage with Blanche Walsh, in Chicago, his wife was in New York. She heard the report and ridiculed it, saying that she did not see how a man who already had a wife could take unto himself an additional one. But she was seen looking up the route of the Walsh company and consulting a time table. Gertrude Tidball was prior to her marriage a member of Nat Goodwin's company for two seasons, having served an apprenticeship at the Alcazar. Up to five weeks ago she was traveling about with her husband who was a member of Blanche Walsh's company. She is now looking for an engagement. After their marriage two years ago, Mr. and Mrs. Toland went to Europe and spent nineteen months there on a honeymoon trip.

A Honolulu Judge Married

George D. Gear, whom the despatches announce as having married Miss Mildred Durphy of this city in Honolulu this week, formerly lived in this city. He is the younger son of H. L. Gear, and was with his father counsel for the London Savages in the Blythe will contest. After he settled in Honolulu he continued to prosper. He was taken into the friendship of the royal family and when one of the princes traveled to the United States Gear, who is now a Circuit Court Judge, was his cicerone. This is not his first marriage. He was formerly the husband of Gertrude Larzalere, a sister of Leigh Larzalere the horse-owner, and of Mrs. Marvin Curtis. The Gears were divorced some time ago.

Rumbling of Discord

It has become apparent that the hard feelings engendered by the contest for honors in the last election of officers of the California Club have not been softened. Indeed it appears as though new dissensions have arisen, and that women who were friends at the time of the election are now enemies. The rumblings of discord were distinctly heard at the annual Founders' Day celebration, the occasion when the ladies throw large bouquets to themselves and little ones to one another, and incidentally tell the waiting world how glad they are they've come to enlighten the benighted. The dailies have already exploited the now famous Haywards' toast to "Our Past and Future President." They have told of Mrs. Smith's rare presence of mind and how she became mistress of an embarrassing situation by proposing "The Health of Our Past President." But no mention was made of the deadliest thrust of all.

What the Ladies Suspect

The program opened with Mrs. Smith, the president, on the platform. The first to make her bow to the ladies was a plump little school-marm, and by the way the school-marm element is becoming quite strong in the California Club. She read a paper on the genesis of the California Club. It was one fulsome, almost sycophantic laudation of the former president who was conspicuously absent on that anniversary occasion. It was praise for "our leader" and "our leader" until the address smacked of a Salvation Army exhortation, but there was not one word of recognition of Mrs. Smith, the incumbent in the presidential chair. Of course Mrs. Smith must have noticed the omission but she bore herself heroically, and then came the episode of the toast. Some of the ladies thought that it savored of a preconcerted plan to accentuate disapproval of Mrs. Smith's course, and the affair caused no end of discussion.

While the Chaplain Prayed

The Rev. C. L. Miel of Sacramento, who is a good newspaperman as well as a distinguished churchman, has been appointed chaplain at the State Senate, a place he held once before and thereby hangs a tale. In those days Senator Eli Dennison of Oakland and Senator Voorhies of Amador had front seats. During prayer those two statesmen always bowed their heads in reverent fashion on the desk. After Mr. Miel had delivered his invocations every morning for a couple of weeks he began to notice a curious thing. Immediately after prayer every day, as it seemed, Dennison would look up and smile and Voorhies would hand him a cigar. One day Jere Burke, who had been instrumental in getting the job for Mr. Miel, came and took him aside. "Doctor," he said, "you won't take it ill if I make a suggestion about your prayer?" "Not at all, not at all," said the parson, "I shall be glad to have any suggestion. "Well, doctor," went on Burke, "the fact is some of the folks in the Senate are Presbyterians and Methodists and they have been accustomed to hearing longer prayers. I think you have been making it a minute and a half or two minutes. Don't you think you could accommodate them with something longer?" "Why, certainly, certainly," said the chaplain cheerfully. "And you'll begin tomorrow, Doctor, won't you?" "Why, of course, if you wish it," said Mr. Miel.

And Voorhies Won

Next morning the prayer was three minutes. Senator Dennison looked up blankly and Voorhies grinned. That three-minute prayer had cost Dennison a basket of wine. They had been betting every day on the length of the prayer, over or under two minutes, and Dennison had been winning right along until they fixed the parson without his knowledge. The reverent attitude during prayer was assumed for more convenient holding of stop watches.

Prospective Gayety at Tevis Mansion

When Dr. Harry Tevis began making alterations in his old home, everybody concluded that Cupid was responsible for the upheaval and the son's undivided attention to his mother to the end of her days was spoken of with approval. But the renovations and preparations after all merely signified the advent of the Amsdens of Kentucky, who are going to make an extended visit. Mrs. Amsden is a sister of the late Mrs. Tevis and of Mr. J. B. Haggin's first wife. The Haggins will also occupy their house after twenty years' absence, and, so it is reported, the Countess Festetics will accompany them. Rumor has it that she is soon to re-embark on the matrimonial sea—but not on a yacht.

Sammy to the Front

There was an incident of the Christmas tree party at the De Young residence which occasioned much merriment. John J. Deane played the role of Santa Claus, and being unfamiliar with the names of some of the children present, he was not prompt in distributing the presents. A youngster whose name had not been mentioned hastened forward to where Santa Claus was standing and piped:

"Oh, Santie, don't you know me? I'm Sammy—Sammy Shortridge."

Sammy secured the speaker's eye, as it were, and also a satisfactory present, and then somebody remarked, "How like his father!"

Abe's Latest Achievement

Mr. Abe Ruef, the Mayor's mentor, the handy man of the Primary League, the attorney who figured prominently in the Probate court at the time that Jack Chretien reached the end of his tether, has succeeded in boosting his sister into a principalship in the School Department. Miss Ruef may be competent to fill the position, but the Board of Education would probably not have become cognizant of her competency were it not for the interest which brother Abe takes in educational affairs. This is the same Abe Ruef to whom Mayor Schmitz wrote an open letter at the beginning of his Administration to tell the public how dearly he loved that active political lawyer. That letter must have won many clients for Abey, for it read like a hint to people who have business at the City Hall to call at the attorney's office before doing business elsewhere. At the meeting at which Miss Ruef was promoted Miss McFarland, the logical candidate for the principalship of the Clement Grammar, was sidetracked. It was she who threatened some time ago to upset Mr. Ruef's plans for the promotion of his sister. In justice to Miss Sullivan, who was promoted to the principalship of the Clement Grammar, it should be stated that some time ago she suffered injustice by being sidetracked, and that in promoting her the Board of Education made amends. She was entitled to a principalship and she is in every way qualified for the position. It is to be hoped that Miss McFarland will be accorded the same treatment when the opportunity arises.

They'd Have None of Schmitz

The most unkindest cut of all was suffered by Mayor Schmitz the other day when the State Federation of Labor, in convention assembled at Los Angeles, voted down a resolution commending him for his honest and upright administration of the political affairs of San Francisco. The men that are grooming Mayor Schmitz for higher honors are mere novices in the game of politics. Their work is almost ingenuous enough to be raw. The quickest way to get a man's head batted off, metaphorically, is to give his enemies a pretext for discussing him. That was done in Los Angeles. The supposition is, among people who are not in touch with industrial affairs, that Mayor Schmitz is the idol of labor union men all over the State. He is not, but that fact would not have been given publicity if his friends had not started a fight in his behalf in that Los Angeles convention. The sincere and unselfish representatives of Labor were not slow to discover that Abe Ruef's protege was a mere job-chaser with a long reach for the evanescent honors and the substantial emoluments of office. The political labor leaders of San Francisco who are popularly believed to be herding the members of the unions, are nursing the Schmitz boom. They have had a hand in the distribution of patronage, and they are for him heart and both feet, but there are hundreds of disappointed ones who are eager for the opportunity to relegate him to the back row of a theatre orchestra. Fire Commissioner J. S. Parry is one of his managers, and he was in Sacramento this week co-operating with Abe Ruef to secure a complimentary vote for Schmitz for United States Senator. Is there anything that Eugene doesn't want?

Eugene's Latest Performance

Mayor Schmitz attested his gratitude to his constituents of the labor unions last Wednesday when he announced his appointments. When the list appeared it was quite evident that he had not forgotten the organization that had elected him to office. The most conspicuous Labor Union man among his appointments is John A. Drinkhouse, a wholesale tobacco dealer. Mr. Drinkhouse belongs to the Job Chasers' union of which Mr. Abe Ruef is Grand President. From the Examiner it appears that Mr. Drinkhouse obtained a certificate of character from "Happy Jack" Chretien who is rusticating at San Quentin. This is what the Examiner says: "While John A. Drinkhouse was Public Administrator John M. Chretien and 'Young Dutchy' attempted to steal thirty-five hundred dollars from the estate of Joseph Sullivan. In his confession Chretien said that Mr. Drinkhouse was in no wise connected with the probate fraud." I believe it was Mose Gunst who discovered that a police commissionership was of great value to a cigar dealer. He has been quoted as saying that it was worth one hundred thousand dollars to him. Mr. Ruef was the attorney for Drinkhouse when the latter was Public Administrator. I presume that the relationship of attorney and client still exists. Evidently Mr. Ruef has not lost his grip on the Mayor.

Rube Lloyd, Knight of Labor

Another distinguished Knight of Labor is Mr. Reuben H. Lloyd, who in his leisure moments attends to the legal affairs of the rich. Mr. Lloyd is undoubtedly a competent and enthusiastic Park Commissioner, but that was not why Mayor Schmitz appointed him. Under the mentorship of Mr. Ruef, our Mayor has studiously avoided newspaper criticism. The appointment of Mr. Lloyd it is thought, secured him immunity from the Chronicle. Mr. Phelan figured the same way but he was mistaken. However Lloyd is entitled to the job. He voted to make Herbert Schmitz, a brother of the Mayor, secretary of the Park Commission. Before the Charter, that glorious instrument, went into effect one talented young woman attended to all the duties of the Secretaryship. She still does so, but the first Charter Commission made her the assistant to the man whose duty it is to see that the fragrance of the flowers is not

VIENNA MODEL BAKERY.

One of the points of interest at the Centennial Exhibition of 1876 was that of the "Vienna Model Bakery and Restaurant." In fact it did not require a very brainy board of judges to decide that the "Vienna Model Bakery" was a decided addition to the enterprises of this country. And when, after a discussion of the pros and cons in the case, in which the inner man's opinion was a decided factor, the Gold Medal and Highest Award were bestowed on this venture without a single dissenting vote. One year later, in 1877, the Vienna Model Cafe and Restaurant was opened in this city and from the start made a hit. It has always commanded the highest class trade, in fact never encouraged any other. During the luncheon hour one sees the smartest people in town headed for the corner of Post and Kearny streets Drop in and you will be perfectly at home with your surroundings. At one table a matinee luncheon is being given—another table is graced by the judges of the Superior Court, who always make it a point to lunch at the "Vienna." But with increased prosperity has come a trifle of inconvenience to the restaurant's patrons, for they are sadly crowded for room. The management therefore now announces a move where the restaurant facilities will be more than doubled. About January fifteenth they will occupy the premises at 222 and 224 Sutter street, next to Goldberg, Bowen & Co.'s, where they will be in position to properly welcome their patrons. After twenty-five years of continuous catering to the public, they believe they are in position to serve it better than their many imitators; for, like all business successes, they have copyists. However, somebody said "imitation is the sincerest form of flattery," so remember that after January fifteenth the Vienna Model Cafe and Restaurant will be found at 222 and 224 Sutter street.

wasted on the desert air. He is also expected to grant the feathered ones in the aviary an audience occasionally just to encourage them. The salary was originally one hundred and twenty-five dollars a month. When brother Herbert took the job Mr. Lloyd voted to increase the pay of the expert on floral fragrance. He now draws one hundred and seventy-five dollars a month.

A Guardian Wanted

Colonel Daniel M. Burns has scored one more defeat. He undertook to prevent George C. Perkins from being re-elected to the Senate, and though he appeared to have a plethoric sack at his back he was unable to organize a dangerous opposition. Though Burns's "dark horse" was kept in the background it is believed that he was none other than Irving M. Scott. Mr. Scott is known to be a "good thing." Indeed many of his friends think that he should have a guardian to protect him from the political banditti. Mr. Scott fancies that he is destined for high political honors. At one time he thought that the whole country would demand that he be nominated for Vice-President. That was after the Oregon steamed round the Horn without leaking. He spent considerable money to have himself boomed by newspapers in the East.

Hot Air or Sarcasm

Says Madame La Bavarde: "I never saw Mrs. Pond Sr., in all the lifetime I have known her, look so handsome as she did yesterday afternoon. The art of looking young lies in feeling young. No rejuvenating process ever thought of—not even the magic springs which Ponce de Leon sought—equal this secret which the woman of today has discovered. This may sound irrelevant but it is not." I wonder what Madame La Bavarde is driving at? Why all that hot air for Mrs. Pond Sr.? Or is it mere sarcasm?

Thought He Was En Masque

Pedar Bruguiere, who celebrated his second marriage last week, in Reno, is extremely feminine in appearance. This effeminacy once led to an amusing incident of the Charley's Aunt order. Pedar used to wear his hair several inches longer than its present length. One day he had been having tea in the boudoir of his latest fancy in society girls, one who by the way somewhat resembles him in features and build. One of her girl friends rang the doorbell at the same moment that Mr. Bruguiere was taking his leave. They met on the stairs, when the young woman burst into mirthful laughter.

"Oh, how fine you look in boy's clothes," she exclaimed, "I never thought you could carry it off so well."

It was some time before her friend succeeded in explaining that those long curling locks belonged on the head of Pedar Bruguiere, her newest admirer.

When Reggie Bucked the Wheel

It was no doubt a great shock to the Vanderbilt pride when Reggie of that ilk was summoned, as the despatches tell, to testify against the keeper of a New York gambling house whose establishment the young millionaire was in the habit of patronizing. I recall that, about a year ago, Reggie Vanderbilt lost seventy-one thousand dollars trying to guess the whirl of the roulette wheel. Popped-eyed chums pressed around while he plunged ahead trying to recoup. There is no telling how much more he might have lost had not his elder brother, Alfred Gwynne, heard of his undoing. He hastened to the gambling house and dragged his brother away, making him solemnly promise never to gamble again.

A Gambling Palace

Next door to the Waldorf-Astoria is one of the swellest and most magnificent gambling houses in America. A big price was paid for the location in hopes of capturing the trade of the enormously wealthy people who live in that vicinity. The grand stairway, built of marble and decorated with carved female figures, life size, cost thirty-thousand dollars. Rich paintings hang in the palatial room where the goddess of chance, surrounded by all her green cloth paraphernalia, presides. When the house threw open its doors it represented an investment of nearly three hundred thousand dollars. Gamblers don't risk such a sum right under the eyes of the police unless they know they are "safe."

Joaquin Posing Down South

Joaquin Miller is now in the Southern States, being lionized. He has discovered a new section to pose before and is enjoying himself tremendously. Next to Whistler Joaquin is the most picturesque poseur of the age. When in New York he created a sensation by saying that he had never seen an elevator, or a street car before, and had never read a book in his life. He avails himself of poetic license even in his daily conversations.

Hubert Henry Davies, the author of "Cynthia" which Elsie de Wolfe now has in rehearsal in New York, is well known in San Francisco. A few years ago he wrote dramatic criticisms for one of the papers here. He wrote a monologue for Pilar-Morin, the pantomimist, and she made her vaudeville debut in it. A sketch for Lillian Burkhart was also well received, and then Mr. Davies decided to go to a larger field. He has made his home in London for some time past.

Miss Barber, the niece of Mrs. McKinley, who was married the other day in Canton, Ohio, to a Denver lawyer, was out here with the late President and his Cabinet on their visit to the coast. She was altogether the prettiest of the ladies of the Presidential party; petite, svelte, with wavy brown hair and large, glorious dark eyes. Mr. Phelan was one of her most constant admirers while she was here, and he was seen a great deal in her company. In Washington she was always the most popular lady of the White House.

"As by Summons" Creates Discussion

From Washington, D. C., a correspondent writes that a great stir has been created there by some recent social happenings. The vogue of the town in regard to invitations from the White House, it seems, is that they must be looked upon as commands. "The Queen desires," i. e., "Miss Roosevelt would be pleased" to see Miss So and So at such and such a time is considered as if she had said, "I command you to appear." Last week, Miss Roosevelt gave an impromptu party, and one of the invited guests was a debutante of the season. The latter was, on the same date, hostess at an affair at her own home, but the "summons" from the White House caused her to desert her own guests and go to Miss Roosevelt's party. But Miss Roosevelt, by the way, had not the slightest idea of the tempest her invitation had raised. This was not so bad, however, as the Postlethwaite affair, about which at least seventeen buds and eighteen society youths are still knocking, their relatives joining in the anvil chorus.

Mamma's Fiat Carried the Day

Miss Carolyn Postlethwaite had a dinner on for Saturday, two weeks ago, eighteen debutantes and as many youths being invited to celebrate thereat their young hostess's debut. Miss Roosevelt, not knowing of the dinner, and finding she would have a free evening, asked Miss Postlethwaite and some other girl friends to come to the White House for an old-time dormitory party. Her daughter being out, Mrs. Postlethwaite answered the 'phone and accepted for Carolyn. Later, Miss Roosevelt heard about the dinner and driving to her friend's house, told Carolyn on no account to change her dinner program. Matters seemed about to go all right when Mamma Postlethwaite again put her oar in. She insisted that her daughter should not commit such a breach of etiquette as to refuse a "command" from the White House. She sent her daughter to Miss Roosevelt's, and hostessed the dinner in her place. Her excuse to the guests was "a summons to the White House." Now as none of the debutantes knew of any function at the White House, they were indignant over their desertion. But such is Washington etiquette. Jules Cambon, the French ambassador, last year deserted the Thomas Walsh's dinner in his honor because a belated invitation from the White House had the same date. The Roosevelts try not to let "impromptu" invitations conflict with others, but they cannot be supposed to remember all that is going on in the Washington whirl.

Mrs. Reginald Brooke writes from England to her friends here that she is nearly recovered from her recent illness. Mrs. Brooke, who was Ruth Holladay, daughter of Sam Holladay of Holladay Heights, was one of the cleverest amateur opera singers in society some years ago. She was the intimate friend of Sybil Sanderson.

Is He a Millionaire?

A correspondent writes me from New York to ask if I am quite sure that Mr. Pierre Humbert Jr., whose wife was recently thinking of going on the stage but changed her mind, is really one of the millionaires of Gotham. He says he has tried in vain to find that brown-stone front alleged to be the residence of the rich Mr. Humbert, and he has concluded that there has been some mistake. I must confess that I do not know anything about Mr. Pierre Humbert. The dailies of this city stated that he was a New York millionaire, and that was their pretext for devoting much space to his wife, whose wonderful histrionic talents had been discovered by an elocution teacher who thinks he knows an actress when he sees one. I should not be surprised to learn that there has been some mistake. It is seldom that the wife of a multi-millionaire develops an ambition for histrionic honors.

"Mr. Chumpleigh is always boasting of his wife's frankness."

"That's because she never holds out anything that isn't worth keeping to herself. It's a wise wife that knows just how far candor should go."

Wanted the Royal Box

So President Roosevelt is thinking of appointing Governor Taft of Manila to succeed Justice Shiras of the United States Supreme Court! Well, Governor Taft may be a capable man but I fear that he has been spoiled in the soft, seductive climate of the Philippines, where one may still inhale the aromatic atmosphere of Spain's superscented court, and where the autocratic habits of the Dons are infectious. When Governor Taft went to Manila he was a fairly good exemplar of the simplicity of this Democratic government, but a story recently came to me from a correspondent in the Islands which has caused me to wonder whether the dignity of his position has gone to the head of His Excellency. It is the story of an incident at the Zorilla theatre in Manila. The Governor went to hear an Italian opera company in "Carmen," but when he entered the theatre he found that the large central box over the main entrance, which in the days of Spanish rule had been reserved for the chief executive of the islands, was occupied. Governor Taft had been occupying the same box, and he would have no other.

Went Off in a Huff

Unfortunately the management had not been apprised of his intention to visit the theatre, and the box had been sold. Governor and Mrs. Taft left the theatre and reentered their carriage. Thereupon the manager rushed after them and begged them to return, saying that the royal box, as it is called, had been vacated. But the great American dignitary would not alight from his carriage. He ordered his coachman to drive on. Though the Republican party pleads not guilty to imperialistic tendencies, it is quite evident that the germ of imperialism is in the atmosphere of the Philippines.

Gossip from Stockton

The wedding of Sidney Hodgkins and Miss Wilhoit, last October, writes my Stockton correspondent, seems to have been not only the realization of one dream of romance, but the beginning of another. Dr. Albert Edward Hodg-

kins came over from England last summer to visit his brothers who make their home in Stockton. He was easily persuaded to remain for the wedding, at which he officiated as best man. Few were the guests at the brilliant wedding who did not notice that the best man and the stately maid of honor looked exceedingly well together, and they proceeded to weave a bit of romance about them. Their weaving, it appears, was not badly done, for the doctor lingered long enough to have seen all his relatives married several times, and now as he speeds toward England it is certain that he does not go "heart whole and fancy free." And Society is asking earnestly: "Are they engaged?"

The stork flew over the tules to Stockton last week, bringing a baby daughter to pretty Mrs. Francis Hodgkins, who was May Budd.

The Demoralizing Mass Play

The mass play in college football, against which I have protested for several seasons, must go. The faculties are now opposed to it. Dr. Woodrow Wilson, the new president of Princeton, says, "At the present time the game is clearly to be discredited, because the rules have been slowly altered in the direction of making all success depend upon mere weight and mass and strength. . . . In proportion as sheer strength has been made the basis of the play the players have been tempted to do very brutal things. Indeed I am afraid that in some instances they were instructed to do brutal things, so as to put their opponents out of the game." Those of us who witnessed the contest last year between Berkeley and Stanford are quite sure that players are instructed to put their opponents out of the game. Under the cover of a complicated mass play a good deal of rough work can be done which escapes the notice of the umpire. The motto of some teams is to win by fair means if you can, but if you can't try foul. A game in which brute force has become the chief factor is demoralizing, and unless the mass play is eliminated skill. alertness and speed will not be essential to success.

The Inhospitality of Economy

Should the social saunterer drop in of an afternoon to pay his respects to certain San Franciscan ladies of smart-set pretensions, the chances are that he would be ushered by a Jap into a drawing-room dark as was Egypt when Jehovah frowned. While the Oriental slippers after his mistress, the caller gropes for a chair, and then sits down to reflect, his geniality frozen by the inhospitality of the sunless room. He feels as though there were a death in the house, and regrets the cheerful pavement. Were the dim religious light, in which after awhile the furniture outlines itself, arranged in the interest of the god of love, a choleric word against it would be blasphemy; but, alas! it is concern for the carpet, not for Cupid, which causes this down-drawing of blinds, this desolate lack of welcome, this uncomfortable air as of a drawing-room of the new-rich used only for company. In such an atmosphere social chat is quite impossible, so the saunterer at the first pause makes his bow and seeks the sunlight and God's gracious out-of-doors.

The Unfortunate Climber

The world of fashion is much like a fake show. Those who have paid dearly for entree into it—toadying away their manhood or womanhood, when snubbed on one cheek turning the other, as it were, Christianwise—come out smiling as though they had their money's worth. Beholding them, the rabble goes green with envy; but the pity which the philosopher feels for them is of a truth akin to contempt. Take for instance a man whose millions charitably cover a multitude of social sins. See the poor fellow in a salon (one o, printer, if you please)! Incurably conscious of his evening dress, his hapless hands hopelessly de trop, he does not dare to put one patent-leather shoe in front of the other, for fear of making a false step. In golden silence he sits afraid to open his mouth lest, as the saying is, he put his foot in it. Meanwhile, those to the manner born make free of the conventions, which at best are nothing but generalizations from the spontaneous conduct of well-bred people under given circumstances, and at worst, but petty devices for distancing the crowd—differentia which may very readily be dispensed with by those whose position in society is well assured. The man who is six feet-six does not go about announcing, "I am taller than my neighbors." Good-breeding is after all but a rarified good-nature; and the simplicity of the simple more nearly approaches it than does the poker-stiff pretentiousness of the society "supe" whose amateurishness is plainly evident to the most distant gallery god.

If Women Knew How

The power of reading minds, which Dr. McIvor-Tyndall is illustrating to large audiences, may be all very well on the public platform, but suppose your wife possessed it! That's the thought that makes some men shudder. They fancy what would happen if one should say to his beloved that he had to go out and see a man in the evening, and she would take hold of his hand and say, "Ah, I see—poker." Or he would assure her that he had been to the lodge and she would look into his eyes and say: "George, the lodge's first name is Mary." That would discourage a man. Or she might ask him for twenty-five dollars to buy a chatelaine purse, and he would tell her that he had just paid out his last nickel to a man. Wouldn't it jolt him to hear her say: "George Joseph, I can see in your mind that there is just thirty-seven dollars and nineteen cents in the upper corner of your lower left-hand vest pocket"?

They're Not Divorced

For several years Thurlow McMullin has imagined that he was divorced from his wife, Virginia, but he wasn't. He was granted a divorce by the Superior Court after a trial that attracted a deal of attention owing to the prominence of the litigants, but early this week the Supreme Court set the judgment aside and remanded the case for a new trial. The point involved was one of peculiar interest, and the case itself has many features that are not of the commonplace. The McMullins were married in 1871, and the husband deserted his wife five years later. He sued for divorce in April, 1898, and he charged his wife with having deserted him in 1896 though they had been separated for about eighteen years. It appears that the husband's plea was that his wife acquiesced in the separation of 1877 and that therefore it was not technical desertion on his part. He invited her to return to him in 1896 and as she failed to do so he charged her with desertion. He was asked on the trial if when he wrote her a letter offering to live with her again and provide her with a home, he expected her to accept the proposition. The court sustained an objection to the question, and thereby saved the witness from being compelled to answer it. It was on account of that ruling that the judgment was set aside.

Van Dyke Discusses the Case

Justice Van Dyke, who wrote the opinion of the court, had something to say on the law of the question and also on the general topic of divorce. This is what he said:

Cross examination is one of the most valuable means of eliciting truth, and when properly conducted should be upheld by the court and not suppressed. This was the crucial point—whether the offer was made in good faith—and the defendant's counsel had a right on cross-examination to test the conscience of the plaintiff upon the question of his motive or good faith in making the offer. The wife, as it appears, had conscientious scruples against a divorce, and would not listen to any separation in that direction. She is rather to be admired for that than punished. Divorces for slight or trivial causes, or by collusion or connivance, are becoming so common as to be a scandal. The marriage relation is the foundation of all society, and, on the contrary, divorces, unless for special reasons, are demoralizing and are not favored in the law. The Code declares: "If one party deserts the other, and before the expiration of the statutory period required to make desertion a cause of divorce, returns and offers in good faith to fulfill the marriage contract, and solicits condonation, the desertion is cured." (Civ. Code, sec. 102.) The statutory period referred to is one year, so that the plaintiff in this case could not avail himself of this provision of law, inasmuch as he had not sought condonation for nearly eighteen years."

A Bit of Heart Interest

In reviewing the evidence of the case Justice Van Dyke brought out the fact that McMullin left his wife one morning after a quarrel at the breakfast table, and that later on he sent for his trunk. It was packed by a servant and just before it was closed Mrs. McMullin put on top of the tray a little shoe, one of the first pair her little baby had worn. She also put on the tray a sheet of paper containing these words: "I married you for love, I have lived with you for love and I would have clung to you forever for love. You have broken my heart. You have wrecked my life. May those who have done this thing meet with just punishment. God help us all, and keep us from harm. Your wife."

After her separation from her husband, Mrs. McMullin obtained a place in the Mint, supporting herself and son on her earnings. Before her marriage she was Miss McNulty, a belle of the Southern set, and her friends all stood by her in her trouble. Her son, as it transpired in the divorce suit, was brought up a complete stranger to his father.

The McKennas and Martins

Mrs. McKenna, who before her departure for Washington was famous for her Madonna-like face and her wonderful red hair, is now quite another sort of beauty. She has become a grande dame with white hair. Although she looks older she is handsomer. She dresses in exquisite taste. She has been wearing a wonderful gown of mauve brocade trimmed with masses of point lace and sable. The breaking of the engagement of Isabelle McKenna and Peter Martin did not affect the friendly relations existing between the families. Mrs. Eleanor Martin and Mrs. McKenna are constantly together here, and Mrs. Downey Harvey has entertained for Miss Marie McKenna, who, by the way, is infinitely more vivacious than her older sister. She is a thin, fragile girl with a mass of waving blonde hair which she wears low at the nape of her neck. Very few have as yet taken up this style but it certainly is upon us.

At the egg-nog parties now all the vogue in society Chapin & Gore's whiskies are the brand used.

He Is a Pedagogue

Charles Johnson, who has won the heart and dot of Senator Newlands's daughter Edith, is not an idle hanger-on of society. He holds the position of instructor in a New Hampshire boys' school. His father, the late Dr. W. W. Johnson, was for years the favorite physician of the inner circle of Washington, D. C.

The Rustic's Compliment

At the Musical Club's reception at Century hall to Mr. and Mrs. Edward MacDowell, the famous composer stood up to his many inches like a man, under fire of fashionable eyes and killing speeches, and never once did he lose that lyric mien of his. Though, to be sure, there was safety in the numbers, the stand was none the less heroic. As I watched and waited, pretty women said things as pretty as themselves, and if any was at a loss for a word, if you will believe me, she was at no loss for a look; or did both lip and eye fail, it was evident that a handshake may be on occasion most expressive.

"Mr. MacDowell," one asked, getting a word in edgewise, "of all the pretty things that have ever been said to you, what was the prettiest?"

He laughed. In the laugh, too, was the characteristic lyric note.

"The prettiest thing? It is hard to say. But perhaps the prettiest, certainly the sincerest, I can now recall was this: One day an old countryman said to me 'that sure was your own thing you was a-playin' just now.'

" 'It was, but how do you know?' I asked.

" 'Because it sounds horrible, and hain't got no tune to it at all.' "

Which was the rustic's way of saying that the piece was of the nature of a classic.

The Quest of Beauty

Does any one read the "Beauty Hints," I wonder, in the Sunday supps. If any one does, and tries to follow the advice given, she is sure to find herself up against the hardest Chinese puzzle she ever tackled. Suppose she were to try to carry out the directions word for word, how much time would there be left out of the day for any other occupation beside brushing, combing, massaging and exercising? Not even enough to read up on the newest wrinkle for preserving complexions and forms. No doubt many women waste a lot of time in reading and trying to follow the directions. I know they read Ella Wheeler Wilcox and that other garrulous old lady, Max O'Rell, so why not the absurd directions for improving God's handiwork? I think it was E. S. Nadal who said the German baths and springs were crowded by two classes—beauties who had retained their attractions in spite of their tinkering and imagined it was the waters which aided them, and ugly women who lived in hope that some time or other they would strike the right medicine for their cases. So they traveled the weary round year after year, growing worn wan and wrecked in their hopeless quest.

Ovation to MacDowell

The first of the Steindorff novelty concerts last Thursday afternoon was a brilliant success. The event of the opening concert was of course the appearance of the great American composer, Dr. Edward MacDowell, who received an ovation from the large audience. He is a modest-looking young man of fine presence and entirely modern, utterly devoid of the Samson-like coiffure which often proclaims the musician these days. He was at the piano in a concerto for piano and orchestra (op. 23). His execution of his own composition was a revelation. He is less famous as a pianist than as a composer, but he played with masterly execution and delicacy of touch. He is a master in bringing out the singing tones of the most pianissimo strokes in which his music abounds. The orchestra played brilliantly the feathery, rippling passages. Dr. MacDowell responded to the cordial applause with one of his Concert Etudes, a brilliant thing brilliantly played. The orchestra alone followed with the celebrated Indian Suite, after which the composer again appeared in response to the demand of the audience. Mr. Steindorff modestly withdrew, but was compelled to step to the front to receive a laurel wreath. Beside the MacDowell numbers, the orchestra gave a splendid overture, "Die Verkaufte Braut" (by Smetana), and the superb Kaisermarsch (Wagner). Mr. Steindorff has reason to be proud of his excellent aggregation of musicians, who play so intelligently under his clever baton. The music lovers of the city have reason to be congratulated if the concerts to follow prove as delightful as the first.

Captain Sydney A. Cloman, U. S. A., is one of the old-time favorite "soldier beaux" who will be greeted with open arms on his return. News has been received of the marriage of pretty Leila Burton and Lieutenant Rush Wells, U. S. A., on December twenty-seventh at Governor's Island, New York harbor, where the bride's father, Colonel George H. Burton, is stationed as Inspector General on General Chaffee's staff. The three Burton girls are all unusually handsome, their beauty being an inheritance, for mother and grandmother were both noted belles in their day. The latter, as Minerva Norton, was a reigning toast in the West, where she married Colonel Charles Larrabee, and their daughter (Mrs. Burton) as Minnie Larrabee was on of the beauties of our swim in the later sixties. Of the Burton girls, Minnie the eldest married Captain Thomas Pearce, Seventh Infantry. Kathro, the third, is a great favorite in army circles at Gotham.

"That Is All"

Some quaint bits of humor are to be found occasionally posted on the bulletin board in the Chronicle's editorial rooms. The contributions are usually anonymous, and seldom will any member of the staff plead guilty. The other day there appeared on the board the following verses, the refrain of which was suggested by City Editor Simpson's customary daily announcement when he exhausts the "assignments":

Have you heard it, do you know it,
That direful, dismal call,
When the "C. E." sternly utters,
"That is all"?

How a heart, high hopes a-beating,
Will stop its jumping once for all,
When is heard that fateful murmur,—
"That is all."

Perhaps a meal is in the balance,
Leastwise no drink will surely fall
To the melancholy "quiller" who hears the—
"That is all."

Ah, well! Some day Saint Peter
Before the gate will detail all.
Will he say to him, I wonder,
"That is all"?

The Examiner Muse

The Chronicle is not the only daily that has versesmiths on its staff. They abound in the Examiner office. Last Sunday the Examiner published on the front page of its cover a purple picture of the Christy girl, and it inspired some one to write a "pome." The contagion spread, and nearly every man on the staff trotted out his Pegasus. The Examiner muse worked over time in a prize contest. Blinker Murphy refused to contribute and won. Here are the individual verses in a bunch:

Perhaps she's ripe for passion that's
Best done in highest color;
Maybe she wants a purple time;
At least none that is duller.

The purple artist knows his biz.,
Cease quarreling with each other.
One woman surely wears this phizz,
And she's the Purple Mother.

The lady's sure been drinking—
This precious Christy pet,
But nothing any stronger
Than Creme de Violette.

That purple lady's very good,
Or at least it looks that way
To me what doesn't draw a line,
But only draws my pay.

She had to pose for Christy,
Poor girl, with hat of lace,
And is it any wonder
She's purple in the face?

She read about the heathen bell,
The heathen bleater, too;
She read so much her face took on
The heather's purple hue.

I'd rather eat a purple cow
The skin and all—sapristi!—
Than gaze upon the purple girl
Of Howard Chandler Christy.

You never saw a purple girl,
You do not wish to see one,
But when the page you now unfurl
You'd rather die than be one.

The lady dreamed she had a flush
That turned her heart to hectic.
The pat of dough was changed to mush,
And left her apoplectic.

Let purple, green or any hue
Illumine these smart features,
What matters color, race or creed
In modern artists' creatures?

Beyond the Footlights

At the Odeon the curtain-raiser on this particular evening was: "Depit Amoureux." The beautiful Sophie Cherubin, who played the role of Marinette, was still on the stage, when Fabrec, the well known deputy, distinguished notwithstanding his forty years, for his golden beard and youthful appearance, whom one always meets at "premieres," opened without knocking the door of Mademoiselle Cherubin's dressing-room, and playfully called: "Cuckoo!"

The gay deputy, who had been carrying on a flirtation for some time with Mademoiselle Sophie, had hoped to surprise her, as he had done on many previous occasions, in the midst of the most bewitching disorder.

The scene of the pretty comedienne's feigned indignation and bashfulness amused him immensely. "Ah, Fabrec! you indiscreet man!" Mademoiselle would always exclaim, "I forbid you to look, sir. . . Quick, turn your face to the wall . . . until I have time to throw on my dressing-gown. Oh! what monsters men are!" etc., etc. The little comedy generally ending in a kiss of reconciliation, on the bare white column of the actress's neck.

Disappointed at finding the dressing-room empty, Fabrec started to leave, when old Constance, the actress's dresser, stepped from behind the screen: "If Monsieur will kindly be seated," said she, "Mademoiselle will return in five minutes."

Fabrec dropped into the blue-flowered armchair, crossed his legs, and beating a tattoo with his cane on the tips of his patent leathers, began to reflect, while old Constance busied herself in arranging the toilet articles on the dressing-table.

Why, he asked himself seriously, did he pay court to Sophie Cherubin? He was certainly not in love with her. Indeed, he had scarcely a desire to be. Yet at times he had been rather attentive—and one evening, when he had been unusually so, the actress had said to him, with a sage little air:

"Listen, Fabrec. You are a very fine fellow—but I have debts to the amount of forty thousand francs, and for you deputies the golden times of Panama have passed. . . . Come and chat with me, whenever you wish—but we shall never be anything more than good friends."

Frankly, Mademoiselle was right. Nevertheless Fabrec persisted in paying court, drawn towards the actress by that irresistible attraction which men find in the society of pretty women, content to obtain, as our gallant ancestors would have expressed it, "an occasional favor."

Her beauty and gayety charmed him. Her sprightly witticisms, tinged with the philosophy of the cynic, amused him. Besides, it was a pleasant way of killing time—and as he sat musing in the flowered armchair, he glanced mechanically at old Constance's shriveled face, reflected in the opposite mirror.

Its ugliness fairly startled him. Dry as a stick, wrinkled as a winter apple, the small head covered with an old gray wig, the dull, lifeless eyes, the one long yellow tooth biting the purple lips, made him shudder. Yet, he reflected, "This woman in her youth may have been beautiful, perhaps loved!" Indeed, Fabrec's kind, generous heart was touched with compassion for the shriveled old creature, apparently of seventy-five, doomed to toil on until death. Yet, in spite of his sympathy, his naturally fastidious nature experienced a certain disgust for the old sorceress, in dismal black rags.

She looked so out of place before the splendid dressing-table, with its wealth of luxurious perfumed articles. The touch of her fingers seemed to soil the delicate laces, the fragile white tortoise shell combs, and the finely chased silver toilet articles, glittering upon the actress's table.

Suddenly the door flew open, and Sophie Cherubin, in her short spangled petticoat, with a scarlet rose buried in her dark hair, rushed in. She looked as fresh as a bouquet, the divine brunette, and fairly sparkled with youth, beauty, tinsel and sauciness.

"Ah! Fabrec!" she exclaimed gaily, "you have just arrived in time to have a little chat. In a few minutes we go in costume to the Gaite, to play for the benefit. While waiting Constance will prepare my small bundle, so sit down, sir, and behave yourself."

The old dresser had already passed behind the screen. They began to gossip. Mademoiselle Sophie, as usual, teased the handsome deputy about his numberless conquests in the theatrical world. "Tell me," said she, coaxingly, "is that really a true story about you and the diva of the Nouveautes?"

Fabrec was discreet. The man who truly admires women generally is. He loves them for themselves, and not through foolish vanity. To Mademoiselle's numerous questions he responded by pleasantries which revealed absolutely nothing. This conduct irritated her.

"You are a sly-boots, Fabrec," she exclaimed impatiently, "and I despair of ever getting you to acknowledge any of your conquests in the green-room."

The deputy looked amused. "Well!" said he, laughingly, "since you display such intense interest in my love affairs, I will relate the story of my first passion."

"With an actress?" interrupted Mademoiselle.

"Yes . . but I warn you that the scene is not laid in the rue de Richelieu, and that the heroine did not belong to a swell company. At the time of the affair, I was only nineteen. I had just begun to study law. I was delightfully verdant and painfully timid, for I had just emerged from the provinces, when one evening shortly after my arrival in Paris I dropped in at the little theatre of the Gobelins, and fell promptly in love with the leading lady, Blanche Lilas, the moment she appeared on the stage.

"Now that I know the secrets of the dressing-room, and am aware that an actress's youth and beauty may disappear with two towels and a layer of cold cream; that our ingenues are generally blessed with grown sons, who are either lieutenants of cavalry or under-prefects, I have wondered whether Blanche Lilas was really young, and really beautiful. However, at the time I thought her the most charming of women. I lived but to dream of her. To admire her more frequently on the stages of the Gobelins, Montparnasse and Grenelle—for the company was an ambulating one—I sold my books to the stall-keepers in the Rue Cupas. . . and thanks to Blanche Lilas, I know the entire repertoire of the ancient melodramas.

"Ah! how charmingly pretty she appeared in the 'Idiot of the Mountain,' and in the 'Executioner of Amsterdam.' She was the only woman who ever inspired me to write verses—sincere, but execrable. Through timidity, I never had the courage to present them. When the vacations came, I went home to spend the holidays. I passed the time counting the hours when I should return to Paris. The first evening of my arrival I rushed to the Gobelins, Montparnasse and Grenelle. Blanche Lilas's name did not appear on any of the programs. Desperate, I had the assurance to interview the concierge of the theatre, and learned from her that Blanche Lilas's engagement had not been renewed, and that no one knew whither she had gone.

"I was in despair. I experienced that night the greatest sorrow and the greatest disappointment of my life. It was months before I recovered from the shock."

"Is that all?" asked the actress disappointedly.

The deputy nodded.

"Ah, Fabrec! you are a hoaxer," exclaimed Mademoiselle incredulously, and have been poking fun at me with your souvenirs of student life."

Here the conversation was interrupted. The door flew open, and a servant announced that the actors and actresses had taken their places in the carriages and were ready to start for the Gaite.

"Hurry! hurry! Mademoiselle Cherubin, we are late," screamed the manager from the staircase.

In the twinkling of an eye, the waiting maid took the small bundle from the old dresser's hand, and Sophie Cherubin, enveloping herself in her rich fur cloak, bade Fabrec a hasty goodnight, as the two women hurried off.

The deputy arose to go, when old Constance stepped from behind the screen, and stopped him. "I have a favor to ask Monsieur," said she timidly. "Indeed, what is it?" responded Fabrec kindly.

"My strength and health are gone, sir. It is with difficulty that I attend to the light duties of dresser. I have asked to be admitted into a hospital."

"Very good," said the deputy absent-mindedly, "the next time I come here you must give me a note."

The dresser, however, had not told all.

"Perhaps," said she timidly, "there is one thing which may interest you in me. I overheard your conversation with Mademoiselle. Well! I am the Blanche Lilas whom you once admired."

Involuntarily Fabrec uttered an exclamation of surprise. It seemed hardly possible to discover in this poverty-stricken creature the once beautiful Blanche Lilas.

"But how old are you, my good woman?"

The old dresser smiled. "Possibly not as old as I look. Trouble has aged me. I am sixty-two. I was forty-one when you saw me play in the suburbs. An actress's age does not appear on the stage. Nevertheless I was dropped from the company that same year, the manager considered me a trifle too passe.

"Misfortune followed my dismissal. Three months later, I was working as a domestic, and only after long years of hardship and misery, I obtained through the kindness of a fellow actor the position as dresser with Mademoiselle Cherubin. The only place now for me is the hospital. I have asked to be admitted under my true name, Constance Poireau. I hope, sir," she added, half bashfully, "that since I once interested you, that you will use your influence to hasten my admission."

"I certainly shall," said the deputy kindly. "Meanwhile," he added, fumbling in his vest pocket, "if I can be of any service to you—"

The old woman interrupted him with a dignified gesture: "I only desire your influence, sir, to hasten my admission into a hospital. Once there, with my small annuity from the artists' society, I shall be perfectly happy."

Fabrec extended his hand to say good-night. He could hardly suppress a slight shudder, as he held within his own the dried, wrinkled hand of the old dresser. Twenty years before, he would have been overjoyed to have imprinted on this same hand the kiss of his timid adoration.

His heart beat excitedly as he passed through the deserted corridors of the theatre. Even with his great experience this strange life of Paris amazed him, where he, comparatively a young man still, found it his duty to obtain in an incurable hospital a bed for the woman who had given him his first dream of love.

The Dance of the Dead

(Translated from the German of Goethe.)

BY HERMAN SCHEFFAUER.

The sexton peers down at the dead of the night
At the many round graves all a-row.
Lo, the moon hath thrown everything into the light
And the burial-ground is a-glow!
There a grave 'gins to rock and another one here;
Here a woman steps forth, there a man doth appear
In the whitest and longest of garments.

Now all starts to squirm with a terrible itch
And the bones join in merry-go-round,
The poor and the young and the old and the rich,
Though their shrouds hinder many a bound.
Since Modesty here is no longer of use,
They rattle themselves and the linen flies loose
And is scattered o'er many a hillock.

The femurs are lifted, the feet caper spry
And the movements are made with a dash.
There's a rattle and clatter arises on high,
As if sticks had been struck with a crash.
All this to the sexton so odd doth appear:
That the devil, the clown, whispers into his ear:
"Go, steal away one of the cerements."

It was said! It was done! and he hurries his flight
Behind the thrice sanctified door;
The moon whitens still with mysterious light
All the hideous dance as before.
At last, one by one, they slip softly away,
Enwrapped in their shrouds, and are under the clay
And under the grass in a moment.

Yet one, the last one, trips and stumbles around
And snatches and claws at the graves,
But never a fellow his shroud-cloth has found:—
For he scents it aloft where it waves.
He rattles the church-door; it hurls him a-back,
'Tis guarded and blest—or else, sexton, alack!—
It glints with its bright metal crosses.

Yet the shroud must he have, and the time is so short!
He must have it or nevermore rest.
So the knave grasps a carved Gothic cap for support
And clambers from cresting to crest.
Alas! for thee, sexton! what hope of escape?
From crocket to crocket the horrible shape
Climbs on like a long-legged spider.

The sexton is pale and stands mute and aghast
And would gladly give back what he took!
Lo, the cloth catches now—he has breathed his last!—
By its end on an old iron hook!
Then the moon 'gins to fade and her lustre is done;
Below, as the terrible bell thunders: "One!"
The skeleton shatters to pieces!

Among the motion pictures to be shown in Burton Holmes's second lecture, six fine pictures in motion of the Portugese bull-fights will prove most exciting, while numerous others will show scenes of activity in Lisbon and other cities, and in the country districts. The third lecture, on Denmark, through Hamlet's country on a motor-car, is most interesting. Hamlet's castle at Elsinore is visited; the celebrated Horse Fair at Randers is also visited, while the characteristic scenes found in the rural districts give a charming insight into the customs, the costumes and the scenery of the real Denmark. Among other motion pictures to be shown with this lecture, is one of the Paris-Berlin automobile race of 1891. This was taken at the Belgian frontier, and is a very long one, taking twelve minutes on the screen and showing Fournier, the celebrated French chauffeur and the other contestants as they are halted by the customs officers at the line between the two countries.

Gathered on 'Change

While the local market for stocks and bonds has not been very active during the past week, trade conditions have not developed any material change and generally speaking a good strong tone has been maintained. The decreased transactions during the holiday season and the moderate decline in prices in some of the leading stocks following the activity of the early part of December has evidently impressed investors with the idea that another improvement in the market with advanced prices may be looked for in the near future. This probably accounts for the firmness of values and for the further fact that within the last two or three days there is a noticeable increase in the volume of sales. There has been more disposition to buy and purchases have been so general that all of the leading stocks have been well represented. In common with the quiet of the market, Sugar shares have been rather dull and there have been but few fluctuations in the prices. As the value of these shares depends upon crop conditions and as the latter are known to be very favorable there is no reason to doubt why higher prices should not prevail. Heretofore the distance of the islands from this port and the lack of means of communication have been detrimental features to the business, but now with the opening of cable communication with Honolulu it brings the plantations in close touch with the financial market of this city and it is fully expected that this improvement will have a beneficial effect on these shares. Already some of the enterprising members of the Stock and Bond Exchange have forwarded cipher codes to their representatives in Honolulu and they are now in a position to keep themselves fully informed regarding the latest trade and climatic conditions in the Hawaiian Islands. Some of the brokers of this city are in favor of an arrangement whereby the Exchange here and the Exchange in Honolulu can have daily quotations transmitted over the cable, as the dealings in sugar securities are a leading feature in both places. In Bank shares there has been a general hardening of values, with the Bank of California securities leading in point of demand. A sale of a block of 10 shares was recorded at $472.50, but the few holders willing to sell generally demanded $480, a $15 advance over the asking price during December. Bids of $2,155 for the shares of the German Savings Bank have had no effect in tempting sellers, the latter being firm in their asking price of $2,200. Spring Valley Water shares have recovered from last week's depression, values advancing to $86 asked, and $85.62 1-2 bid, against $84.50 and $84 last week. Holders are showing less anxiety to sell. Contra Costa shares were steady at $67.50 with bids of $67. Gas shares did not figure particularly in the transactions and fluctuations in prices were generally small and unimportant. In miscellaneous securities Alaska Packers' shares were in high favor and liberal sales were recorded at $160. Although buyers raised their bids for California Wine Association shares to $100.75, the advance brought out no stock, holders generally being well satisfied with the present condition of the corporation and the regular dividends they receive. Oceanic shares continued inactive, with neither bidding or asking price being reported. Bonds figured more extensively in the week's transactions than for some time past and good prices were realized for the securities of the favored corporations. The bonds of the Pacific Electric Railway Company have been listed on the Exchange. The authorized issue of these bonds amounts to $10,000,000, of which $3,555,000 have been listed. Interest is at the rate of 5 per cent per annum and the bonds are due January 1st, 1942. The issue is secured by a deed of trust to the Union Trust Company, covering all the real and personal property of the corporation. H. E. Huntington is president, Epes Randolph, vice-president, and I. W. Hellman, treasurer.

Financial Notes

Early in the week the Bay Cities Water Company executed a mortgage for $10,000,000 to the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco. The mortgage covers the company's real estate in Santa Clara county, its personal property and everything it owns or may acquire. It is given as a security for a bond issue of 10,000 5 per cent bonds for $1,000 each, to run forty-five years from January 1, 1903. The company agrees to establish a sinking fund equal to 25 per cent of the money due in 1908. William S. Tevis, president, and E. G. Wheeler, secretary, signed the mortgage for the water company, and Fred W. Zeile, president and John D. McKee, secretary, for the trust company.

President Albert Gallatin, of the Sacramento Electric, Gas & Railway Company, is credited with saying that the Bay Counties Power Company has been given an option on a large block of the stock of his company, which amounts practically to the controlling interest; but from present indications it is not likely that any transfer of stock will be made before next June.

The shareholders of the San Francisco Brick Company, at a special meeting, voted in favor of a $250,000 bond issue in ten year six per cent bonds. —The Financier

STAGE

A Monopolistic Star

"Miss Simplicity" has come to town after two seasons on the road, and nowhere did she receive such a severe spanking from the critics as she did in San Francisco. Those of New York jolted her mildly, but it was reserved for the local connoisseurs of things theatrical to use the knout mercilessly on her somewhat slender and attenuated person. But they all agreed upon the cleverness of Mr. Frank Daniels, the star, who exploits himself in this new musical farce. And now let me call the attention of the gentlemen of the press to an injustice of which they have been unconsciously guilty. "Miss Simplicity" as produced at the Columbia is not the musical farce written for an amateur theatrical company in Boston, and purchased by Mr. Kirke La Shelle for production on the professional stage, with Frank Daniels as the star. It has been mutilated by this comical little chap to make a Daniels holiday. It was probably never a world-startling conglomeration of humor and melody, but it was infinitely better before the vanity of Frank Daniels dictated alterations calculated to keep the light of his presence constantly aglow. Mr. Frank Daniels, who is probably the funniest comic opera comedian on the stage, is the most selfish star that ever monopolized the stage centre. He exemplifies more eloquently than any other member of the profession the evils of the star system. He is not content merely to have the whole show revolve round him. It must permit him at times to substitute himself for the show. If a song is so charming as to delay his entrance by reason of the encores it receives then the song must be eliminated. This is no exaggeration. Several songs were cut out of "Miss Simplicity" for that very reason. All the laughs in the piece belong exclusively to Mr. Daniels. He vouchsafes other people the privilege of getting a few but they must not be too prolonged. Mr. Daniels is such a clever comedian that he can afford to be generous and permit theatre-goers to get all the enjoyment possible out of a performance, but he doesn't. He is not the star alone but the whole solar system. He will tolerate ensemble work providing he is "tout ensemble of the whole." And such are a few of the eccentricities of this genius of the comic opera stage. I mention them merely in explanation of the seeming shallowness of the piece. But there are many people who are such ardent admirers of Daniels that perhaps they approve of methods which enable them to see and hear so much of him. But what a great performance he would give if modesty were one of his virtues and he were willing to merely contribute to the success of a show! However, notwithstanding the editing of Daniels, "Miss Simplicity" is entertaining. The star, endowed by nature with a comical personality, is so funny that even though he has metamorphosed the work of Mr. Barnett into a monologue for himself, you are not permitted to suffer from ennui. His magnetism is of a high order. It is most effective in a certain speech written for him some years ago and which he cleverly works off impromptu. And the performance abounds in pretty dances and the usual kaleidoscopic effects which are concomitants of every well regulated musical comedy. The prettiest woman in the company is Grace Myers, the vivacious daughter of Annie Myers of the Tivoli. She is a talented prima donna with a sweet and well trained voice, which has the softness of velvet. Miss Mai Lowery, the soubrette of the company, has not much to do but she does it well. She is a graceful dancer and there is an abandon in her work that is quite fetching. Of the young men of the company Grafton Baker is the most spirited, and he has a single opportunity to show that he has a voice. But Mr. Daniels happens on every little while to vocalize, and he has been singing so much that his voice betrays signs of wear. It is becoming decidedly weak.

"Barbara Fidgety"

Opening nights at Fischer's are becoming more and more in the nature of family reunions. Each of the merry mummers at the cosy little temple of burlesque has a following, and on opening nights there is a crush of people in the auditorium with more than a bowing acquaintance with the people on the stage. The audience is prepared to laugh at everything that has the suggestion of a joke about it, and to applaud their favorites vociferously. Consequently there is more warmth in the house than the heating system is responsible for. The opening night of the new burlesque, "Barbara Fidgety," was marked by the usual enthusiasm. Edgar and Harry Smith are responsible for this travesty on Clyde Fitch's play. Those two gentlemen write pieces for the stage while you wait, and neither has ever been threatened with an attack of writers' cramp. But why kind Providence has overlooked them is one of those problems that are impossible of solution. However there is no possible question of the popular success of "Barbara Fidgety." The librettists may have violated the proprieties, the conventions and the unities, but the composer came gallantly to the rescue, and with the co-operation of the stage manager evolved a show that will please any audience. There is abundance of ginger in the production, and it goes with a zip that overcomes a desire to shed tears over the Smithsonian jokes. You marvel at the ingenuity of George Lask in crowding so much action on a miniature stage, and you laugh as heartily as ever at Kolb and Dill, even though you recognize their work in the first act as a familiar specialty stunt which formerly constituted their act in vaudeville. Barney Bernard, without his whiskers and shorn of his Yiddish dialect, is a bare comedian, but you forgive him for what you know he can do. Maude Amber, in the role and garb of a Southern girl, is picturesque, and contributes her share to the gayety of the piece. She is singing "Come Down My Evening Star," the last song written by John Stromberg and found after his death. Lillian Russell is singing it in New York. Winfield Blake has a congenial role in Captain Grumble, and his military song in the first act receives numerous encores. Olive Evans as the old colored woman shows that character work is her forte. More new dancers have been added to the company but Flossie Hope is still the Queen of terpsichorean artists.

MISS ROSE RELDA, Steinway Hall, January 16th

"Oliver Twist" at the Grand

Old playgoers remember Rose Eytinge as Nancy Sykes. In the scene with Fagin, where she tears Oliver from his grasp, the audience would sit with bated breath, watching every move of the actress. There are not many stars of the stage who care to include Nancy Sykes in their repertory, and the minor stock actresses who have attempted it here have only made Nancy a caricature. The first Nancy I remember was Mrs. McKee Rankin, and hers was a strong creation. But Nance O'Neil is more than strong in the part. She has absorbed it, as it were, and you see the Nancy Sykes of Dickens live and breathe before you. You cannot keep your eyes from her when she is on the stage: you fear to lose a word that falls from her lips. She brings out so clearly the tenderness, necessarily repressed, in the girl in the scenes with little Oliver. Her wonderful love for the brute to whom she is yoked is shown in many ways—when she is mending his coat-sleeve and when she refuses to leave "her Bill" at the bidding of future prosperity, voiced by Oliver's young aunt. What a charming picture she presents, twirling the key on that magical, supple finger! What a womanly attribute is the wrath displayed when Charlie Bates disturbs the serenity of her newly-made bed! How terrible, how tragic is her death! It is a question, however, whether Nance O'Neil's Nancy Sykes would be of such remarkable value if it were not for the powerful "playing up" of McKee Rankin as Bill Sykes. The brutal creature of Dickens's imagination is drawn by Mr. Rankin with a sureness that has no equal. Mr. Stockwell's Artful Dodger is another clever characterization and Mr. Mayall gives an acceptable portrayal of Fagin. The company as a whole is doing better work under Rankin's management than it has done under any of the stars preceding Miss O'Neil. Her enthusiasm for her work appears to be infectious.

Miss Crosby in a Problem Play

Rebellious Susan was not so very rebellious compared with the more rebellious heroines of the latest society dramas. She objected to her husband having so much liberty, that is all. The wife of 1903, instead of going off and leaving hubby a clear field to pursue his flirtations, would start a counter-flirtation near by, and so bring him to reason. Poor Susan started hers on the other side of the water, and it did not end well. But the play does, owing to the good offices of Susan's diplomatic uncle. The drama is an interesting one, aside from its problem, and is well played by the Alcazar people. Juliet Crosby, who is always at home in society dramas, makes the wife a real person. From the first scenes, where Susan's rebellion is instituted, to her return, repentance and reconciliation, Miss Crosby's fine understanding of the character is apparent.

A Strenuous Worker

Poor Georgie Cooper finally proved a victim to the strenuosities of the tank drama when she sprained her ankle last Monday at a rehearsal of "The Tide of Life." She had to leap from a high bank to the top of a flying train of cars, and her foot slipped with the injury mentioned. I have seen Georgie Cooper perform all sorts of wonderful feats in swimming, leaping, shooting and wrestling, and it appeared as if she were immune from the evils to which a melodramatic stock actress is prone. But this leap was the climax. She had a host of sympathizers when she crutched about the stage on the opening night, for Georgie Cooper is the idol of Central audiences.

Her Final Exit

The many friends in this city of Etta Butler, the talented Californian actress, were greatly shocked last Wednesday to learn of her death in New York. It was only a season or two ago that Etta Butler established herself as a star in the Eastern theatrical firmament, and she gave promise of becoming a most distinguished member of the profession. She came to this city at the close of last season to visit her father who had only a short time ago become a widower, and she returned to the East a few months ago. She would undoubtedly have obtained a good engagement were it not for the illness that compelled her retirement to a hospital. Only a few of her intimate friends were aware of the fact that she was engaged to marry a Mr. Terrence Farley, a New York lawyer.

The Army at the Republic

The public always likes military plays—witness the perennial favor enjoyed by "Rosedale," also the newer success, "Brother Officers." The Republic has a military farce this week that is full of fun. The company fits well into the several roles, Harry Corson Clarke having the principal fun-making vehicle. Margaret Dale Owen is charming, and one hopes to see her in a more important part as the season progresses. The Republic has quite settled itself now in the affections of playgoers, who find it a very cosy place to drop into of an evening. On New Year's night there was an immense audience.

"Yon Yonson" has a new interpreter at the California this week, Nelse Erickson, and he has proved his title to be the best Yon of them all.

Tyndall Will Tell How He Does It

Society has taken up the study of mental and psychic phenomena. The problem of the subconscious mind, dreams, premonitions, visions, telepathy and the rest of it are being dissected, discussed and explained. It is no uncommon thing these days to find the most youthful debutante quite up on the latest developments of the "subliminal self," "the astral form of thought," and all the abstruse problems of psychology that the visit of Dr. Alex. J. McIvor-Tyndall have made popular. Dr. McIvor-Tyndall has consented to tell how it is done, and will give a course of seven lectures on the various subjects embraced in psychic science, telling how to investigate the phenomena and how to develop the powers. The first lecture will be given on Sunday night, January the eighteenth, and will be followed by four subsequent Sunday nights until February the eighth, with three intervening Saturday nights.

The Holmes Lectures

The Burton Holmes lectures are sure to attract the most cultured class of our residents, but they will draw popular favor as well. To hear a famous traveler tell of the countries he has visited is always interesting. The illustrations to the lectures are also entertaining, the coloring having been done by Helen E. Stevenson from Mr. Holmes's own negatives, motion pictures and projections by Oscar B. Depue. The newest inventions in motion photography are shown at these lectures. The first lecture will be given next Tuesday evening in Steinway hall, the subject being "The Grand Canyon of Arizona." Portugal, Denmark, Sweden and two Norways will follow. The traveled will enjoy traversing with Mr. Holmes well-remembered scenes, while the non-traveled will learn a few things about the countries he may hope to visit some day.

"The Princess Chic" will be at the Columbia soon for its second visit. James and Warde in a revival of "The Tempest" are also a near future.

A New Shakespearean Note

Word comes over the wires that Mrs. Fiske will play Lady Macbeth next season. Mrs. Fiske has the physique of what the Shakespeare cult calls the real Lady Macbeth. These students, who take their Shakespeare historically, anatomically and geographically, have figured out that Lady Macbeth was not the big, majestic creature she is generally believed to be. They say only a slender, high-strung, nervy woman could have conceived the deed that led poor Macbeth to destruction. I can fancy Mrs. Fiske, as I remember her Tess, striking an entirely new note in Lady Macbeth.

Clara Morris in a recent magazine article tells what a storm was raised when she purposed giving a new Lady Macbeth to the stage. Her "foolish idea of a coaxing, crafty, womanly Lady Macbeth" was condemned by that fine old actress, Mrs. Farren, who advised her to give it up.

"My dear," said Mrs. Farren, "I starred for years as Lady Macbeth, and the louder, more violent, more declamatory I was, the better the people liked me. They expect to see Macbeth bullied into action, to speak frankly."

Miss Morris objected to the old notion, but Mrs. Farren persisted that the public never thought out character. The public liked to see what it had become accustomed to, the traditional Siddons, Cushman, Janauschek, Lady Macbeth. Miss Morris, on the contrary, believed that Macbeth's wife was purely feminine because she collapsed after the great deed.

It is hard to figure on what we are and are not to see of the New York hits during the seasons yet unborn. From frequent press-agents' epistles I had judged that "Foxy Grandpa," for one thing, was en route. But Monday's mail brought a line to the effect that Joe Hart and Carrie De Mar will have a new piece, "Sunny Jim," next season.

The Imperial theatre at London was recently opened for a special one-night production, under royal patronage, of "The Crossways," the drama in four acts, of which Mr. J. Hartley Murray and Mrs. Langtry are joint authors. The piece turned out to be identical with "Virginia," given at the Royal theatre at Manchester. Both authors appeared in the cast. There was no courting of criticism, for representatives of the press were not invited to witness the performance.

Features of Next Week's Bills

Nance O'Neil will give us her version of Lady Macbeth at the Grand, and Charles Millward, Herschel Mayall and E. J. Ratcliffe will be in the support.

That old favorite, "Tennessee's Pardner," at the Alcazar will give us again Agnes Ranken's charming portrayal of Tennessee. Alice Treat Hunt, the new leading lady, will come the following week in "My Daughter in Law."

"Jack and the Beanstalk" will have some new specialties at the Tivoli. It is hard to say when the run will end of this popular piece.

"The Telephone Girl" has not been seen here for two years, and promises to renew its big hit then, at the California. Murray and Mack in "A Night on Broadway" come next.

"My Wife's Husband" at the Republic will give Harry Corson Clarke opportunity for some clever work. "What Happened to Jones" follows.

"Miss Simplicity" will continue to fill the Columbia.

The Miles Stavordale Quintet will present a most novel entertainment at the Orpheum. One plays a harp and the others double-headed or box banjos, and are said to give the most perfect imitation of the human voice ever attained on musical instruments. The Elinore sisters, the character comediennes, will return after a prolonged London success, presenting "Adventures of Bridget McGuire." Zazelle and Vernon, called "The Tourist and his Valet," will return after a visit to almost every part of the globe. Edith Helena will change her selections, and Cressy and Dayne will present "Bill Biffin's Baby."

The new Electric theatre, containing "A Day in the Alps," and the two-pound baby in the life-saving incubator are Chutes attractions. The latest piece of Chutes enterprise, "Down the Flume," is bound to become one of the amusement features of the city. The amateur nights, held every Thursday, are popular.

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

Cowles in Concert

We used to call Eugene Cowles "the magnificent." He is still that, though on his present visit instead of gorgeous costumes he appears in the garments of every day life. But on Tuesday evening, when to gratify his audience he sang the well-remembered Armorer's song from "Robin Hood," it took little imagination to see before one Will Scarlet in his red fleshings, instead of a gentleman in black broadcloth and white waistcoat. The basso's voice is as resonant and inspiring as it ever was, but in the "Song of the Sword," and the De Koven number it was too big for the narrow confines of the auditorium. That the voice can be controlled at its owner's will was evidenced in the tender song given as Mr. Cowles's first encore, and in "When Stars are in the Quiet Night," his own composition. As another encore he sang delightfully that old Irish ditty that San Franciscans always associate with Denis O'Sullivan—"The Low Backed Car." The Toreador song from "Carmen" was Mr. Cowles's last contribution to the program. He sang it with spirit, and proved that, well as he can render tender and soft love songs, opera is his true sphere. It has often happened that when concert companies headed by stars have come this way, a success equalling that of the principal has been made by one of the supporting company. Such a hit was attained by Miss Elizabeth Blamere of the Cowles company. Miss Blamere sang several numbers on Tuesday night —Del Acqua's "Villanelle," Van der Stuecken's "O Come with Me," an Irish love song by Margaret Lang and an operatic duet with Mr. Cowles. She has a voice of great sweetness and breadth, and sings with feeling and understanding. Miss Clara Farrington, the young violiniste, and Mr. Walter Pyck, the pianist, both made individual successes in their numbers. The latter sustained the arduous role of accompanist for the entire program, but showed no signs of fatigue at its close.

The Bane of the Encore

I must enter one protest against the conduct of the audiences at the Cowles recitals. They insisted on encores, and encores again until the applause no longer meant a compliment but simply an insatiable greed. The encore at most concerts nowadays is out-of-date. That is, one applauds, the singer or player returns to bow, and that is the end. But in some quarters the pest still survives.

The critic of the New York Town Topics says of a recent appearance of Kocian in the metropolis that he "tuned much and fiddled badly. Glib fingers and an agile bow arm do not make a violinist, and I fear there is very little musical comprehension in Kocian's skull." Other metropolitan critics however, among them Emilie Frances Bauer, consider Kocian a great violinist. We shall have an opportunity to judge for ourselves presently, as Kocian is headed this way.

NEW DEPARTMENT OF THE HOPKINS INSTITUTE.

The scope of the San Francisco School of Design has been enlarged by the addition of a new department, that of designing for industrial porposes. The class opened on Monday, its work including drawing from casts, planning of patterns, modeling in clay, wood-carving, and furniture construction. The work is of an advanced character, requiring primarily proficiency in drawing. The department is in charge of Frederic H. Meyer, who has had extensive experience in this field, having studied in the Cincinnati Technical School, the Pennsylvania Industrial Art Institute, and the Royal Art Institute of Berlin. Mr. Meyer is at present connected with the department of drawing in the State University, prior to which he was superintendent of drawing and designing in the public schools of Stockton for four years.

The McDowell Recitals

Great interest is being manifested in the Edward MacDowell recitals, the first of which will be given this afternoon in Steinway hall, and the second next Monday night in the same hall. Mr. MacDowell appeared at the Steindorff novelty concert on Thursday, too late for more than mention here, playing his own second concerto with orchestral accompaniment. Mrs. M. E. Blanchard will sing groups of the composer's songs at the matinee recital today.

The Zech Symphony Orchestra

The symphony concerts by W. F. Zech Jr.'s orchestra have been among the most delightful features of the winter music season. The second series is now under way, the second concert of which will be given next Thursday afternoon at a quarter after three o'clock, at Fischer's. The program will be Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, Mozart's G minor symphony, the Siegfried Idylle, Wagner, Wuerst's Russian suite (for strings) and Moszkowsky's "Miniature" overture.

Rose Relda's Recital

The sale of seats for Rose Relda's concert, to be given next Friday evening in Steinway hall, has been very large. This will be the only occasion on which Miss Relda's friends will be able to hear her sing before her return to Europe to fill her operatic engagements. Her program will be: Bell Song (Lakme), Delibes, by request; Synnoves Song, Kjerulf, Serenade, Bemberg; Standchen, Strauss, Lucia (mad scene), Donizetti, Du Rossignol, Handel, Les anges pleurent, Bemberg, Das Veilchen, Beehgaard; Pastorale, Bizet, Polonaise (Mignon), Thomas.

One of the numbers on the program of the first Eugene Cowles concert was a setting by the basso himself for Tennyson's "Crossing the Bar." Our own Dr. H. J. Stewart wrote a beautiful setting for the poem some years ago, which is often sung at memorial services. The poem is one of the most tender bits of Tennyson verse.

Next Thursday evening will be given Mr. Louis H. Eaton's thirteenth organ recital at Trinity church. The program will consist of compositions by Bach, Saint-Saens, Haydn, Ernst and Bruch. Miss Dorothy Goodsell, soprano, and Hother Wismer, violinist, will assist.

Miss Millicent Levenberg writes me from Berlin that she is settled in the German capital, and is pursuing her music studies with vigor. She has given up her physical culture classes for the nonce, and intends devoting all her time to voice culture.

It is surprising how many people fall into the error of fancying "The Holy City" and the "Cantique de Noel" as being the work of the same composer. The former is by Stephen Adams, the latter by Adolph Adam.

Frank Damrosch is conducting a series of symphony concerts for young people in New York. At a recent one David Bispham read Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

Louis Heine, the erstwhile San Francisco 'cellist, is a member of the Franz Kaltenborn quartet, now giving chamber music concerts in New York.

Zelie de Lussan in song recital and Dippel the Grau tenor are both possibilities of March.

"Cloistral Strains"

This little volume contains a selection of sacred poems culled from the published works of Louis A. Robertson. At this day, when the rank of Mr. Robertson among the bards is so well established, any criticism of his work would be superfluous. He is dowered not only with a rare command of language and metre, but also with the true soul of the poet. The poems in the present volume have the genuine religious ring; they are not simply ground out for the occasion, but have grown like flowers out of a soul that has struggled and endured. One of the most beautiful and most rich in suggestion is that entitled "Faith-Founded Vision."

"Faith-founded vision the manger, rise
In all thy humble glory, and unfold
Time's dusty leaves, until thy page of gold
Shines through the ages on our wondering eyes.
From out the starry silence of the skies
A mighty flood of harmony is rolled;
Once more the song is sung, the story told,
And cradled on the earth a Savior lies.

"What priests and prophets did with faith foretell,
We looking backward with clear eyes can see
The thorn-crowned God forsake his throne above;
We hear the chorus, but we hear as well
The midnight moan in dark Gethsemane,
And sink o'erwhelmed beneath his boundless love."

Like the above, many of the pieces are in sonnet form, which Mr. Robertson handles like an adept. The book is tastefully gotten up in gray paper, with an old Mission cloister for cover ornament. [Published by A. M. Robertson, 126 Post street, San Francisco.]

Idaho's Poet

Clarence E. Eddy of Idaho is a strenuous young Westerner, "poet, prospector and newspaperman." He has compiled a volume of the verses which he has contributed from time to time to the various papers with which he has been connected, but he has the saving grace of humor which prevents him from taking himself seriously. "The Pinnacle of Parnassus" would seem a pretentious title for the achievements of Mr. Eddy's muse, but one enters into the spirit of the author, who disarms serious criticism by his cover design, which represents Shakespeare, Milton, Homer, Dante, Tennyson, Burns, Longfellow, Austin and Kipling laboriously striving to reach the heights upon which Eddy is seen securely throned, while the lake of oblivion swallows the innumerable other aspirants. The verses are mostly called forth by some local occurrence, such as the booming of a new mining camp, the return of the Volunteers, the death of a comrade, political happenings, and such affairs as loom large in small communities. There are a number of parodies, of which a few verses of one will serve as a sample of Mr. Eddy's muse and his optimism. It was called forth by some lugubrious stanzas of one Shelley Sutton:—

"The grave, all hail it! in its close embrace
There is an end to each accursed lot,
Life, time, eternity and space
Within its clasp are finished—and are not."

To this Mr. Eddy makes reply:

"You shouldn't be so sad,
Shelley Sutton,
And it really is too bad,
Shelley Sutton,
That you grope within the gloom
And are singing of the tomb,
While life's sweetest flowers should bloom,
Shelley Sutton.

"Life has many cares and sorrows,
Shelley Sutton,
Dark days and darker morrows,
Shelley Sutton,
But we shouldn't put in song
All the sorrows and the wrong,
While some joys to life belong,
Shelley Sutton."

Mr. Zech will have the assistance of Miss Marie K. Mills in his departments Full particulars as to terms etc., can be obtained at the School or will be sent by mail upon application to the Secretary.

Mr. Eddy will do better work than this, but as it is, there has been infinitely worse poetry published in all seriousness. As it is, the little collection ought to find place in the literary archives of pioneer Idaho.

"The Garden of Lies"

This is an exciting tale of adventure by Justus Miles Forman. It is a story much along the lines of "The Prisoner of Zenda," but it has a heroine who had to be deceived as to her princely husband's identity, not on account of political reasons but to save her mind from becoming shattered. She, poor lady, was mentally upset by an accident to her carriage when returning from the marriage ceremony at her home in Newport, where she had espoused a prince of Novodnia, described as a kingdom down near Roumania. As in "Zenda" the royal spouse's substitute wins the lady's heart, but unlike Mr. Hope's hero, he also wins her hand, for the unloved Prince had the misfortune to be betrayed by his revolutionary constituents, and was sent to a more appreciative world by a stray bullet from the mob, leaving his lovely morganatic wife entirely free to marry the intrepid hero. The very last chapter leaves the happy couple enjoying a prolonged honeymoon on some sumptuous, mysterious island whence the author thinks "they will some day return to us, when they are quite ready." Not only the plot and the adventures are reminiscent of Hope's stories, but even the sentences are constructed like those in that popular author's tales. However, it is well for a novel to have a worthy prototype, for "The Garden of Lies" holds the interest of the reader very much as does "The Prisoner of Zenda." It is a handsomely bound volume published by the Frederick A. Stokes Co. of New York.

Beatrice Harraden has a new novel ready for publication, but the title is not given out. Evidently it is not considered of sufficient importance in the literary world to warrant special mention. Miss Harraden did a lot of complaining over the ill-usage she thought she had suffered at the hands of rapacious American publishers, in connection with her first book, "Ships that Pass in the Night," but in reality she was treated very well. Moreover, on the strength of that one success her later books, or at any rate the first of them, had a fictitious value in the publishing world. None of them justified expectations, or paid for the advertising in anything like adequate returns. A Chicago literary professor has recently given voice to the opinion that the first three books of any novelist should be regarded as apprentice work and never given out for publication. In some instances, we should be loth to lose the first works. We could ill spare "Moran of the Lady Letty," for instance, or "McTeague," or "The House with the Green Shutters," or even Miss Harraden's "Ships," but in the main, there would be no irreparable loss if three times the first three novels of the average writer had been suppressed. It is of course quite possible that Miss Harraden will outdo her first success, and that she will live to see her name placarded months in advance, like Hall Caine and Marie Corelli, whenever she has work on the stocks, but there are no present indications of anything of the kind.

A. M. Robertson has begun the publication of a series of pamphlets on the subject of religion, politics, labor, education and other interests. The object is to treat these topics with an unbiassed freedom such as it is impossible to give them in established periodicals, where editorial diplomacy must more or less govern expression of opinion. The first number is entitled "The Divine Question," and under that title Lionel Josephare discusses immortality and the probabilities of a conscious future existence on a common sense basis, unaffected by our personal likings and longings. Though his reasonings and conclusions are unorthodox, he has treated the question in a fair and open manner, reverently and without scoffing. His is the attitude of inquiry, and his reasoning is dignified and inoffensive to the most rigidly creed-bound. The manner and matter of this first number of the Flame Series speaks well for the future of the undertaking.

The Pocket Edition

When publishers first conceived the idea of making volumes of a convenient size to be held easily in hand, instead of requiring a ponderous reading desk for their accommodation, it must have been a cause of rejoicing to scholars. The possibility of taking a volume to the fireside, or slipping it into a pocket when out for a stroll or a journey, added much to the pleasure of readers and also added many readers to make demand for books. But the "pocket edition," like many other good things, has been done to death. Why should there be "pocket editions" of books no one cares to read, simply because they are old, and why "pocket edition" books that are unsuitable for pocketing?

Elder and Shepard issue another of the Baby Roland Booklets. This time it is "His Calculations," and the illustrations discover his Rolandship in the act of climbing to the top of what appears to be an overturned box. In spite of maternal warnings, baby persists and finally "gets there." To those who take this sort of thing seriously, the booklet will no doubt prove valuable and interesting. The mechanical part of the book is deserving of all praise, but one can hardly help asking if the matter is worth while.

Stories Old and New

He Knew Tourists

When the Austrian troops were occupying Florence, one of the white-coated officers had planted himself in the piazza in front of the Duomo, and was gazing at the tower, earnestly, lost in admiration of its perfect beauty.

"Si svita, signore," said a little street urchin, coming up behind him—"It unscrews, sir!"

A Bayard Story

In Senator Bayard is vested the copyright of the story of the two Western cowboys who had been to hear a lecture on Junius. One of them, subsequently imbibing too much whisky "straight," got at last into the lachrymose state of inebriety. Sitting up in bed he passionately besought his companion to tell him "who writ them letters to Junius." Nor would he be pacified till the other cowboy assured him that he knew Junius very well, and that he had made him a present of the letters in question, which had been securely locked up in the hotel safe by the clerk in the office below.

Wanted to Die

A Washington man, who suspected a colored man in his employ of tampering with his private stock of whisky, allowed the demijohn to become empty. Instead filling it again, he put the liquor in bottles in a cupboard and labeled them "poison." One night he caught the servant in the act. Seizing a bottle in mock terror, the employer exclaimed:

"Heavens! Do you know what you are doing? Don't you see that bottle is marked poison?"

The colored man held it off and looked at it, smelled it, and, with a look of melancholy, replied:

"Tain't poison, suh. I's done been fooled again."

"How dared you tamper with it?"

"Boss, it was dis way. F'um de way yoh acted 'bout dat demijohn in de cellar I done thought yoh had yoh s'picions ob me, an' it made me melancholy, foh sho'. I's been tryin' foh mos' two weeks now ter commit suicide out'n dat bottle!"

A Lost Speech

During one of the Irving-Terry engagements in New York, one night after the last curtain both Mr. Irving and Miss Terry were called out several times. Finally the English actor advanced to the footlights. The theatre doors had by that time been thrown open and part of the audience had reached the lobby. The crowds flocked back obediently, however, and stood at the rear of the orchestra on tiptoe, straining their ears to catch a syllable. It was evident that Mr. Irving was talking, because those who had opera glasses assured those who had none that they could see his mouth moving, but so far as the speech itself is concerned it will probably remain forever a mystery. Mr. Irving had been speaking for about a minute when suddenly there was an explosion behind the scenes, and Mr. Cooper appeared on the stage as though shot from the mouth of a cannon. He looked fearfully frightened and embarrassed, but he had presence of mind enough to get off the stage as quickly as he could. Mr. Irving spoke for another minute, then bowed and the curtain fell. Five minutes later Manager Bram Stoker was surrounded by a crowd of morning newspaper reporters.

"I'm awfully sorry that I can't oblige you," said Mr. Stoker, "but I didn't hear the speech."

"Nobody heard the speech," cried the reporters in unison, "that's the trouble."

"Excuse me, gentlemen, I'll go and ask Mr. Irving about it," said Stoker.

Ten minutes later Mr. Stoker returned. His face had fallen about a foot.

"Really this is too bad, gentlemen. I have seen Mr. Irving and Mr. Irving seems to be as much in the dark as any one else. He says that he hasn't the least recollection of what he said."

The Fight Against the Friars

The Catholic church is having serious trouble in the Philippines. In consequence of the hatred of the friars by the natives an independent church has been organized, and it is growing rapidly. Moreover the "independents" have seized a great deal of valuable church property, including several churches and convents. The secession was started by an excommunicated native priest and he now has thousands of followers. The Catholic priests have demanded that they be put in possession of the church property, but Governor Taft has declined to interfere. The clergymen have therefore appealed to the courts. It is believed that if the friars were withdrawn the trouble might be settled, and it is said that a representative of the Vatican in the Philippines has sent a communication to the Pope recommending that the friars be withdrawn. The problem is a serious one and will no doubt prove embarrassing to the Administration, for it is evident that many of the natives who have joined in the secession have received encouragement from clergymen representing other church interests, and who are eager to get possession of certain valuable land. They have fomented trouble, and persuaded the natives in many sections, who were formerly content with their lot, to believe that they had been robbed by the friars. The jarring sects have been actively engaged in promoting rancor and strife, and they have met with considerable success.

The Saxon Court Scandal

That Saxony court scandal is a prolific theme for the European correspondents, but it is somewhat difficult to follow them. They appear to lack the capacity for writing sustained fiction. It is evident that the members of the royal family have not taken the newspaper men into their confidence. Hence the numerous contradictions and absurdities that have been flashed over the wire. Aside from the fact that the scandal has afforded us piquant views of royal high life, it is quite a commonplace episode even in Continental court circles. True, the surrender by a woman of her right to become a Queen is not a common occurrence, but it is not unusual for a crown-princess to form a scandalous attachment for a court functionary. The crown-princess of Saxony merely forgot herself to such an extent as to expose her shame to the world. Some sympathy is felt for her because of the infidelity of her husband, who has a gay soubrette at the royal theatre for a mistress. His wife thought she was justified in seeking solace on the manly bosom of the fascinating Professor Giron. But she is entitled to no special sympathy. She may be admired for having the courage of her convictions and contempt for the splendors and luxuries of court life, but certain moral and social obligations devolved on her which could not be disregarded with impunity. She may have been ruled by emotion rather than by passion, but she showed that she was devoid of the tender maternal instinct for she deserted and disgraced her children. It is charitable to view such conduct as the freak of a disordered mind, but to attribute to such a woman a romantic temperament with a passion for high ideals, is to sound the note of a false and pernicious philosophy.

A Funny Scientist

The only genuine humorists of the day are the gentlemen of science, those profoundly wise individuals who contribute to the gayety of nations by expounding their theories. When they are not engaged in proving that religion is rot they are seeking to demonstrate that all ills and even a few idiosyncrasies proceed from germs. The latest scientific humorist to engage attention is Dr. Arthur MacDonald, a "specialist" of the United States Bureau of Education. He is the author of a communication to Congress in which he calls attention to the discovery that it is in the best educated parts of the country that there are the most cases of insanity, suicide, juvenile crime and pauperism. Yet he does not wish to be understood as promulgating the theory that our schools are responsible for crime. What he wishes to assert is that the country is suffering from neurasthenia, but what that has to do with education he fails to explain. He says that such luxuries as the automobile, the electric car and the telephone tend to make people exercise less and think more, and that lack of physical exercise, combined with excess of mental exertion, wreck the nerves. He argues that when the nerves are unstrung the will becomes weak, depression and pessimism set in and loss of self-control follows, with the consequent abnormal actions leading on to crime and other social evils. We do not know whether Dr. MacDonald has any suggestions to make, but if such disastrous effects follow the use of modern means of conveyance, then laws should be passed making it a crime to ride in an electric car or an automobile. Dr. MacDonald would make a splendid witness for the defense in murder cases.

Those Washington Clerks

One of our dailies suggests, as a remedy for the "necessit" for divorce amongst the married post-office clerks, that the government should raise the compensation of clerks who marry in order to enable them to support families without the need of the assistance of the wife. It is a plausible argument, but what is needed is not higher salaries but less selfishness. Government clerks receive salaries out of all proportion to the rates of compensation for similar work performed for private individuals, and they are besides exempt from many of the restrictions and uncertainties which beset the ordinary employe. There is no danger of the government retiring from business, going into bankruptcy, or being absorbed by a trust. Once settled in a clerkship, with civil service rules in force, the government clerk is anchored as safely as the eternal hills and nothing short of a charge of dynamite will dislodge him. He has his summer vacation provided for, and is entitled to a certain amount of sick leave without deduction of salary. The cashier will not abscond with the funds just before pay day, nor will his employer "stand him off." The eighteen-hundred dollar male clerk in the postoffice department would be fortunate to get a thousand a year elsewhere. Yet other men marry, rear their families respectably, and do not ask their employers to share the burdens and responsibilities which they voluntarily assume. The female clerks who cannot more than make ends meet on their fat salaries would be even worse off elsewhere. What these Washington clerks need is not more money but a different standard. There is no necessity for them to dress like the wives of cabinet officials and foreign ambassadors, nor to entertain in lavish style. They are not part of the government, and their personal vanity is the only factor in the case which appeals.

The Library Vandal

One of the impertinences which readers of library books are obliged to suffer from is the self-assurance of the marking fiend. Care and caution are of no avail, since it is manifestly impossible for librarians to minutely inspect each volume that is returned to them, and the markers appear to consider the books loaned to them under specific conditions as their personal property, to do with as they will. As a consequence, the margins bristle with question marks, comments and "corrections." Words are underscored, capitals marked down, spelling changed, and any unusual word, or word used in an unusual sense, is sure to be penciled in some way. Foreign phrases are kindly translated, out of pity, no doubt, for the ignorance of later readers, who are presumed not to have become aware of that useful appendix to the dictionary. "Involved," "silly," "ungrammatical," "absurd," adorn the margins, while the fly leaves contain estimates of the moral worth of the characters. It is a species of vandalism which is no whit in advance of tearing out engravings or mutilating pages for the sake of some paragraph or poem contained therein, and is just as much an offense and as worthy of prosecution as the other. It is not difficult to size up the calibre of the mind which dictates this outlawry. High school girls who are taking their first lessons in rhetoric, and are but just making the acquaintance of sentences that "won't parse," do their share, but the newly recruited members of "culture clubs" are the worst offenders. The girls may outgrow their critical inclinations, or if nothing else comes to the rescue, they may not always read with a pencil in hand, but the culture club woman has to take notes. Indeed she reads for the sake of taking notes, writing "papers" and posing as a blue-stocking. She has visions of authorship dancing in her head. Most likely she was the star essayist in her school days and head of the grammar class, and she has never outgrown the memories of the honors that fell to her in the correcting of "false syntax." Her mental vision is bounded by her grammars and rhetorics on one side and what she learned at school on the other, while the remainder of her horizon is hemmed in by what the pedagogues and schoolmarms amongst her acquaintance have set up as immutable laws of language. It was one of these hen-minded individuals who protested, at a teachers' institute, against Robert Louis Stevenson's books in the district library, because he ended sentences with prepositions. If it is even so small a matter as the correction of a date, in these days, there is a sufficient inducement to make a book of the matter. If it were possible to detect the vandals, a proper punishment would be to compel them to furnish a new and clean copy of the work they have profanated, leaving them in possession of the original volume. To find themselves perforce the owners of a book they thought so little of might, in time, cure the book-markers' mania.

Resenting Criticism

French justices have been making some curious decisions lately, and it is to be hoped that other nations will not regard them as precedents. A French theatrical manager recently recovered heavy damages from a dramatic critic who commented adversely on the play and performance. According to the managerial idea, dramatic criticism is an impertinence. People go to the theatre for amusement, and if they do not like the divertisement offered them they may stay at home next time, but they may not voice their disappointment. The critic in question referred to the play as "sorry stuff," "nonsense of not very humorous character," "common, not to say vulgar," and the jury, under instructions from the judge, found for the plaintiff, basing their conclusions largely on the fact that for a run of six nights the receipts had been but fifty per cent of the receipts for a previous run of the same length. Apparently nothing but the figures were taken into consideration, though there may have been other attractions at the same time, or perhaps the memory of the other appearance was in itself enough to keep people out of the theatre. Following in the wake of the Parisian case comes Oliver Hall, one of the authors of "The Girl from Kay's," who had a number of dramatic critics in New York cited for adverse criticism. The critics seemed to regard the matter as a practical joke, but they were soon informed that it was stern reality and the author was in deadly earnest. It may be all the better for the drama in the long run. Audiences have been permitting the dramatic critics to do all the talking, and expressing their own acquiescence in, or rejection of these views by attending performances in force or staying away. A return to the mature cabbage or over-ripe egg would be less pleasant to managers and actors than a few sharp words in a morning paper. Managers and authors of this type appear to forget that they are not independent of public patronage. The pronunciamento of a judge and the findings of a jury will not make a poor play good nor a bad actor an artist. Knowing what has been the effect of sensational methods before, one cannot but suspect that "The Girl from Kay's" is some poor, weak imitation, and that the author hopes to crowd the theatre as a result of his advertising dodge.

Our Costly University

As a matter of course, the State University has a hand out for more funds, and equally as a matter of course, the newspapers are advocating generosity and extolling the great good which results from "higher education." That man of straw, the mechanic who left the grammar school to be apprenticed to his trade, and thinks the same course good enough for his son until it is suggested to him that he might have, with more schooling, made himself a scientific investigator or an inventor, is brought to the fore, and every other argument is worked overtime to prove that special taxes should be levied and larger appropriations made. It is pointed out that the number of students is increasing beyond expectation, and the conclusion which is drawn is that a course in the university is the one great good. The additional funds are wanted principally to provide for the increased attendance, but looking the situation squarely in the face, it might come more nearly to a solution of the problem if, instead of making provision for increased attendance, some of the students, or so-called students, were met with discouragement which turned their steps in some other direction. Colleges and universities are useful, and if you will, necessary, to some members of the community, but for the majority of the students they are a waste of time. The majority of the attendants have no definite idea of what they want. There is a vague something called "general culture," which they hope to capture without special exertion, but what it is or what they expect to do with it is more than they can tell. Football and fraternities sum up the situation. A good time, and an idea of making acquaintances who will steer them into some good thing where there is a high salary and no work, is what they hope to accomplish; a chance to be taken in as a partner in some large commercial or banking business, or an election to the post of railroad president or trust manager is about the right thing. The result is that poor men, and men of moderate means, are staggering along under the burden of supporting their grown sons and daughters, long after they should be earning their own living, in the vague hope that like Micawber, "something will turn up" for them, and seeing their hopes dashed and their over-educated offspring accepting clerkships and subordinate positions which they could have filled just as successfully from four to eight years earlier, and learned the habit of work betimes. Even if all college graduates left their alma mater with an education, there are not places enough in the community for them to fill. There are today, in California, two teachers to every class, and the teacher-factories are still pouring out their products without reference to the demand. There is room for only a limited number of doctors and lawyers, and other professions in which a man can expect to "wear his best coat and keep his hands clean." Other qualities besides a familiarity with the names of the writers of the Elizabethan era are necessary for success in life, and while there are hundreds and thousands of college men glad to pick up a few dollars at any sort of precarious clerical occupation, there is a crying need for good mechanics. The women are no better than the men. It is an axiom that a girl who has graduated from a high school will turn up her nose at the thought of marrying a mechanic. If she cannot secure something more "aristocratic" she will have a "career" of her own, hence the grand army of half-starved and underpaid chorus girls and others who, in the old-fashioned phrase, have been "educated above their station." One graduate from a college who makes a mark in the world and does something worth the doing will attract more attention to his alma mater than the whole crowd of mediocrities who pass in through one door and out through the other. When but a few picked students attended college, each with a definite idea in his own mind of what he wanted, and a steady purpose of accomplishment, a college education and a college degree meant something. Now college graduates are as thick as fallen leaves in autumn, and the consequence of reckoning the importance of the institution by the crowd that it turns out, not by the quality of their attainments, is a lowering of the standard of education. In order to have large graduating classes, there must be large attendance, and the way to secure it is to send out "drummers," as the North Western University does. Education which unfits for the practical affairs of life is infinitely worse than none, and that is the effect of a college course on many students. The most that can be said for a university is that it has a refining influence upon the community, and that it elevates the average of individual tone and morals, and to achieve that end should be the main purpose of the faculty. If that were the main purpose of the Berkeley faculty we should contend for the most generous support by the State.

Gage's Exit

When Henry T. Gage cast aside the reins of government the other day and proceeded to the railroad station at Sacramento to return to his home and obscurity he had an escort of two men—Guy Barham and Dan Kevane. The State's capital was thronged with politicians, men who a few short months ago were proud to receive a glance of recognition from California's Executive. Among them were many who had received favors at his hands, but amid the pomp and ceremony of the inaugural of the new King the dead one was forgotten, and he wended his weary way to the depot unaccompanied save by two personal friends. The circumstance bespeaks, more eloquently than words, the ingratitude of politicians. Yet some one remarked that Governor Gage fared not so badly, for it was recalled that when the unspeakable Markham retired into the obscurity whence he shall never emerge, there was absolutely none to cheer him on his way. He drove alone to the station, and on the trip to Los Angeles there was only a railroad porter to do him reverence.

That Fatal Banquet

Now that Governor Gage is once more a lowly Los Angeles lawyer, it may not be amiss to point the moral of the tale of his political career. The moral is that it is not wise for a public officer to defy the power of the press. Braver, purer and wiser men than Gage have done so and lived to regret. Gage undertook to make Dan Burns a United States Senator, and because certain dailies refused to co-operate with him he grew indignant and denounced them. M. H. De Young was friendly with Gage until the latter insulted him at a banquet in Los Angeles to which the Chronicle's proprietor had been invited. After making a boorish speech Gage did not have the courage or the decency to remain until Mr. De Young replied. If Gage had been wise he would have reflected that the Chronicle is published every day in the year, and that the Governor of the State has the public ear only on sporadic occasions. He defied the Call, too, and he has been glad enough to drop those libel suits which he was vigorously prosecuting some months ago. The evidence gathered by the Call in those cases was astonishing.

How He Lost Otis

At the banquet at which Governor Gage insulted Mr. De Young he also took a smash at General Otis of Los Angeles whose paper had published some uncomplimentary things about the Governor during the absence of the proprietor in the Philippines. Otis had been a warm friend of Gage, and was eager to express regret for what his paper had published. He had been telling De Young about it the day the banquet took place, and he said how sorry he was that Gage had been acting so coldly, in view of their past relations. But after that bitter speech Otis was for war. Politicians all over the State patted Gage on the back for the courageous manner in which he resented newspaper interference in politics, but when the ex-Governor walked to the railroad station at Sacramento the other day he was accompanied by only two friends. And probably the bitterest enemy he has in the State is Dan Burns, the man on whose account he antagonized the papers that four years ago demanded his nomination and worked for his election.

Phelan's Faux Pas

And by the way, how similar to the fate of Gage was that of Mr. James D. Phelan, the turning point in whose political career was also encountered at a banquet. It was the occasion, too, on which Mr. Phelan hurled defiance at the press. Phelan had gathered all his appointees at the banquet board in the Palace, and when he arose as the toastmaster of the function to make his opening address, he was in most exuberant spirits. The mellow wine was of a brand that should have softened asperities, but it appeared to have a contrary effect for the Mayor launched a tirade against the editors in their high towers. Only a few days before, Mr. Phelan had appointed Mr. Lloyd a Park Commissioner to please Mr. De Young, and he had sought to placate other editors in a similar fashion. Hence their great astonishment when they read of his abuse. Instead of attributing his indiscretion to the wine they grew indignant and they have never forgiven Mr. Phelan. Politicians should beware of banquets. The first that our musical Mayor attended was a Republican function, and he forswore allegiance to the labor unions. Luck has been against him ever since.

McNab's Death Rattle

The echo of Gavin McNab's death-rattle was heard the other day when Louis Mooser, treasurer of the boycotted Democratic State Central Committee, gave vent to a few squawks attributing the bankruptcy of that organization to the extravagance of certain members, and also to their failure to turn over all moneys collected, to him. I have heard that their reason for not giving the money to Mooser was that they never could find out how he was spending the coin that did get into his possession. They suspected him of being McNab's man on the committee and therefore they had no confidence in him. If ever Gavin McNab permits Barney Murphy to call a meeting of that committee there will be some interesting and perhaps sensational revelations. I doubt whether the disgruntled Mooser is anxious for such a meeting to be called. I even doubt that Mr. Franklin K. Lane would care to have all the financial operations of the Monticello clique shown up.

Ruef and the Fountain

The fine Italian hand of Mr. Abe Ruef has been transferred from the Board of Education to the Board of Supervisors. At the last meeting of the city's legislative body a resolution was passed directing that the Ben Franklin drinking fountain at the junction of Kearny street and Montgomery avenue be removed to Washington square. Under the charter the Supervisors have no authority over public fountains and statuary, for they are under the jurisdiction of the Park Commissioners, but since Eugene Schmitz went into office, when such trivial matters as questions of jurisdiction interfere with the plans of Abe Ruef they are quickly disposed of. It was Mr. Ruef who engineered the measure banishing the Franklin fountain to Washington Square. If Mr. Ruef's objections to the grotesque statue were inspired by prejudices arising from his artistic soul and he caused the fountain to be dumped into the bay I would hail him as a public benefactor, but he purposes to deface a public park with the unsightly mass of metal. The Ruef temperament is not of the artistic brand. His is a materialistic soul.

Why Ruef Is Interested

Now as to why Ruef has interested himself in the matter. Through the benign influence of this municipal regime Mr. Ruef has been accumulating wealth. He is becoming a heavy taxpayer. The title to the property at the gore at the junction of Kearny street and Montgomery avenue was lately transferred to Mr. Abe Ruef's father. Therefore Mr. Ruef has something akin to a personal, if not a purely personal interest in everything affecting that piece of property. Evidently he believes that the Franklin presence depreciates its value. As that neighborhood abounds in saloons perhaps Mr. Ruef thinks he could get a higher rent if free water was not in competition with ten-cent whisky. Or, perhaps by purchasing the property he succeeds to the interests of Dr. Cogswell, the donor of the fountain, who stipulated when he made the gift that it should revert to him whenever the city ceased to maintain it. When that fountain was erected in the early eighties, a corner stone was first laid, and the records in the office of the Board of Supervisors show that it contains, among other things, many coins of all denominations of the period, and also gold coins of foreign countries. So, though the fountain has no artistic value, its intrinsic worth is not to be regarded lightly.

Senator Perkins's Business Acumen

Senator Perkins continues to maintain his grip on things temporal as securely and serenely as he did in those good old times when he kept a general merchandise store in Oroville. Old Perk, they called him then, Genial Perk. He won the sobriquet through the glad-hand way in which he gathered in trade: he uses the same methods now in gathering in votes. But those old times were filled with perilous days, if not with togas and things improper. As usual, Perkins's roving eye was the first in his locality to detect that the diggings round about his camp were not furnishing as much gold as usual. He knew this as an infallible sign that things were on the wane and that the camp, as a mining camp, would soon peter out, so he looked about for a good man on whom to unload his store. His brother, naturally, was among the first to hear that the place was for sale and insisted on buying it.

"But you're too easy-going," said the future Senator, "you never can keep these old settlers here up to the paying mark."

"I'll take my chance," was the reply, "and I'm ready to risk my money as a forfeit."

"Nope," said the embryo statesman, "I won't take a chance. You'll be down on me to help you out if you don't make the riffle. But I'll tell you what I'll do, I'll hitch your business ambition on to the business instincts of a good hustling Jew: the two of you ought to make a team that'll continue to keep the business on a paying basis."

And so it was that the Senator sold out his Oroville store to the partnership consisting of his brother and Wise. But the combination of business ambition and the business instincts of a good hustling Jew somehow or other didn't succeed. It busted as hard as anything else in and about that mining camp. One of the old miners explained it: "Anything that old Perk wanted to sell is suttinly worth sellin' and the queer thing about it is that any feller wanted to buy the place. I never believed that Wise was a real, eighteen ounce, genooine Jew, anyhow, from the way he bit into that there store bargain that Perk offered him, an' some day I bet it'll come out that Perk rang in a sucker Christian on his brother in that trade."

"What drove him crazy?"
"Trying to find the solution of a magazine sonnet."

Marconi's Evil Genius

Marconi proudly declares that he has made it possible to publish a daily newspaper on a transatlantic steamship. And yet he has been posing as a public benefactor. Farewell, the solace of freedom from care in the bosom of the mighty deep! Vanished is that sweet comfort to be attained by security from communication with the madding crowd. No longer will it be possible for the brain-weary citizen to maroon himself on an ocean liner, far from the tick of the telegraph instrument, refreshed by absolute indifference to the tongue-wagging of Dame Grundy and the importunities of his acquaintances. The marconigram is to be a menace to the peace and comfort of every ocean tourist.

The Gerson Germ

Since Paul Gerson came to town there has been an hegira of stage-struck society women toward the footlights. If somebody doesn't get out a writ of injunction to restrain this man Gerson from inoculating our society women with the virus of the dramatic art he will spread a plague over the town. I do not happen to know an actress who is indebted to Mr. Gerson for her knowledge of the dramatic art. Indeed I am not quite sure that he is skilled in the art himself, but I do know that with the assistance of the press he has a wonderful knack for metamorphosing an ordinary pupil into a society woman of high degree. Every other day or so some daily publishes the picture of a society woman who is about to graduate from Paul Gerson's class, and who according to his statement is "the possessor of unquestioned talent and much magnetism." What becomes of them after Mr. Gerson springs them on the public I do not know. Perhaps they take to the typewriter and proceed to earn an honest living.

One of the Italian Nobility

The latest talented "society woman" of the Gerson school is Mrs. Russell Avery. This is what the Bulletin said of her: "Much interest is manifested in the higher society circles of Sausalito and also among her many friends in this city over the announcement that Mrs. Russell Avery is to make her debut." Evidently Mr. Gerson was not satisfied to have his pupil merely a representative of the "higher social circles of Sausalito," whatever they are, for it was stated in addition that she is a niece of Prince Corsini, and that she has long cherished the plan to follow in the footsteps of her famous countrywoman, Eleanora Duse. How strange, that the niece of an Italian Prince, who hopes to become a second Eleanora Duse, should leave Italy and come all the way to Sausalito, California, to study with Mr. Paul Gerson for the purpose of making her debut in San Francisco! One of the singularly anomalous features of journalism is that accuracy is demanded of a reporter, while a press-agent is permitted to procure the publication of what is obviously untrue.

Rudeness at Concerts

If there is one thing that proclaims our provincialism more than another it is our tolerance of the practice of seating people at a concert during the rendition of a vocal or instrumental number. There is nothing so irritating to music lovers as to have their attention distracted by footsteps or rustling skirts just as they are being soul-stirred by a musical artist, and people that give offense in that manner are usually of the uncultured class. I was therefore surprised at the Lily Lawlor concert when Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels and party moved down the centre aisle when the Minetti Quartet was playing. Again was I surprised at the first Steindorff novelty concert last week when Mayor Schmitz disturbed a large audience. Dr. Edward MacDowell was at the piano and he had his audience entranced when the bearded Mayor appeared on the scene and strode into a box. If Mr. Schmitz had been a pork butcher before his elevation to the mayoralty I would not have been surprised at his untimely entrance, but he was a musician. Or rather, he was the leader of an orchestra, a bad orchestra but an orchestra nevertheless. Moreover he is reputed to have written a march. The Mayor was not the only offender at the Steindorff concert. He was accompanied by Mr. Roncovieri, the musical school director, and later on, when attention was again riveted on the pianist, came a loud swish, swish from the rear, and several women marched down and joined the Mayor's box party. I should like to know the impression made upon Dr. MacDowell by the unpardonable solecism of the Mayor and his friends. Probably he thought he was playing in Oshkosh.

Amusing Affectation

After attending a MacDowell concert I was amused to hear the half-hearted praise and even the superior condemnation of the American composer by some of our half-educated musicians, men and women who do not know counterpoint from a hand-saw. People are sheep in their admiration for genius as in other things. Many people fancy that because MacDowell is not an "old master," or at the least a foreign celebrity, that he therefore of necessity must be mediocre. The truth is that they have not been sufficiently prepared by active press-agents to place themselves in a passive state to receive the thrill of his magnetism. He looks and acts as a normal man should look and act, and therefore it is hard for those who have been accustomed to associate the artistic temperament with eccentricities of person and manner, to recognize the genius of the American composer.

They Preferred to Leave

Mrs. Fred McNear, in a big white picture-hat and joyful rags in harmony, was among the audience at an entertainment in Steinway hall last week. With her were two of her friends, in beplumed chapeaux. The trio retained their millinery after the curtain went up. A few others in the audience did the same. In the course of time an usher went the rounds, requesting the removal of feminine headgear. The program was then about a third over. Some of the women immediately doffed their hats, others defying the mandate until a second request was made. But the three picturesquely millinered society women rose in a body and retired from the hall. Perhaps they felt that they were contributing to the success of the show and should therefore be permitted to flaunt their finery.

Because He Was Rich

The youthful scion of the house of Judson, who amused himself one night last summer by drawing his pistol on a Berkeley policeman who had the temerity to object to his boisterous conduct while intoxicated, has been pardoned. Judson had two enormous advantages over the ordinary youthful inebriate. He was a university student and he had a rich father, hence, in his estimation, he owned the earth. Much to his surprise and indignation, he was actually arrested and escorted to the city prison, and still more to his astonishment, the judge before whom his case was tried sentenced him to a term in jail without the alternative of a fine. Of course it is not to be imagined for an instant that the sentence was carried out. What is the Judson money good for if it cannot secure immunity for the members of the family? One trick after another was tried to stave off the punishment, and now, six months after the offense, the young man goes scot free. Does any one imagine for a quarter of a second that a young plumber or iron molder would have been so fortunate? Would the "stain on his character," or the certainty of losing his job have a feather's weight in the balance?

Service Only for Show

Bishop Nichols of the Protestant Episcopal Church of California is not one of those thin-skinned individuals who cannot enjoy a joke when the point turns in his direction. Last week when Booker Washington spoke at the Pavilion, he told a story about an old darky mammy. She had wandered into an Episcopal church, mistaking it for a Methodist sanctuary. She rose up, knelt or sat with the congregation, groaning her responses in a very loud "Amen" as is the custom of her church. Finally she attracted the notice of an usher, who went up to her and whispered:

"Madame, you must not do that here."

"But, honey," returned mammy, "don't you know I'se gettin' religion?"

In pained surprise, the usher returned:

"Oh, but, you know, this isn't the place to get religion!"

Bishop Nichols, with two of his confreres, occupied a front seat when Mr. Washington told this story, and they all three laughed heartily at its finish.

Joullin Waiting for the Mood

Among the art colony Amedee Joullin is probably the most indolent and the most dependent on moods. This seems to be more the case in his pot boilers than in his chefs d'œuvre. It has been over a year now since he received his commission from the State of Nevada to paint the historic scene of the driving of the last spike, but Joullin still continues to put off the committee whose business it is to worry about when the thing shall be completed. "I cannot finish it for some months," he says persistently at each application. "I must wait for the right mood to come and heaven knows when that will be." A wag in discussing art matters said the other day, "Before Joullin's last spike has been driven Gabriel's last trumpet will have been blown—and Gabriel will probably have little use for artists."

The Critical Jorgensen

Mr. Chris. Jorgensen, whom Mr. Hill, "the artistic discoverer of the Yosemite," calls "a souvenir painter," does not seem to have any great patience with the artistic shortcomings of the layman. It is told of him that he once visited the house of a Californian woman whose pictures were not all they might have been. Their chromoesque defects might have been passed by by some less sensitive critic than Mr. Jorgensen, but not so the painter of "El Capitan." He stood before the worst of the collection, head cocked on one side, finger to eye monocle fashion, and gazing in mock serious rapture murmured tender nothings about the "original high lights," "wonderful impressionism" and like jargon of the salon, till the simple owner of the pictures prayed for an earthquake. And now there is one Californian woman who is waiting with a sandbag in a dark alley through which Mr. Jorgensen passes every night.

"I hear Mrs. Flirt is a great strategist."

"Yes, she is skilled in amatory manœuvres. When she has an engagement for lunch she 'phones the enemy—her husband—that she is thinking of making a sortie in the direction of the office. Then he stands on guard and she deploys in another direction."

Why Spreckels's Ranchers Don't Bathe

Among landholders of the State the Spreckels's have always enjoyed an exceptionally good reputation as employers, in fact it has always been more their pride than otherwise to give the best possible treatment to their men. Recently Mr. Spreckels gave orders to the foreman who runs his ranch near Gilroy that all the buildings where the farm hands sleep should be provided with bath tubs and hot and cold water. The order was straightway complied with, but the weeks passed and the foreman didn't notice any particular diminution of the rich red earth on the countenances of his followers. About this time he made some personal inquiries as to why the bath tubs were not put into general use. The first man he interviewed was an Irishman.

"Do you ever use the fine new bath tubs that Mr. Spreckels had put in for you?" he asked.

"Bath tubs, is it?" said the Irishman. "No, I don't use your bath tubs on this ranch, nor none o' the rest of us, nayther. I won't bathe afther that dirty Portugee there and the Portugee he says that he won't bathe afther the Greaser, and the Greaser says that he won't bathe afther nobody. So there ye are. Everybody contented wid his own dirt and dispisin' of his neighbor's. And that's me all over. I may be dirthy, but thank God, it's me own!"

The capitalist who would wash the California ranch hand must be like Gilbert's "Gallant Captain of the Mantlepiece," who provided a valet for every four of his men and a private bath tub and a barber shop with every berth.

Her Latest Admirer

Wouldn't society open its eyes with astonishment if Lurline Spreckels were to say a bas to the French nobleman, and bestow her heart and hand on a petty officer of the American navy? This piquant and popular society girl has kept the gossips guessing for a long time. She has had so many admirers who betrayed all the evidences of serious intentions that her friends have fancied her hopelessly involved half a dozen times. It has seemed incredible to them that a girl having so many opportunities should defer the fatal plunge so long. When the news came from Paris that a French nobleman was infatuated with her, and that he was anxious to make her his wife, her friends waited patiently for the report of their engagement. But it never came. Miss Lurline returned home a little later and she appeared to be heart whole and fancy free. Presently it was rumored that the titled Frenchman had come all the way to this city to be close to the object of his affections, and that he was not receiving the slightest encouragement. And now comes to me the tip that young Mr. Skipwith of the Marblehead is the most favored of Miss Spreckels's suitors. Mr. Skipwith is the paymaster of the Marblehead, and during the sojourn of that vessel in port he has been more than dancing attendance on Miss Spreckels. Indeed his attentions have been such as to warrant the information that of all the young society women he has met she is the one he admires the most.

The Beau of the Ship

The Marblehead has been in port quite awhile and it has several interesting officers aboard, including Captain Phelps, who is a great favorite. But he happens to be a married man. Paymaster Skipwith is recognized as the beau of the ship, and he is the naval lion of the season. One of the most popular of our debutantes has been suspected of being more than casually interested in him, but the keen observers are sure that he regards Miss Lurline Spreckels as the most magnetic of our belles.

Calve's Second Love

Calve has been depending so much on her love affairs for free advertising of late as to warrant the suspicion that her voice has deteriorated. Jules Bois, the man she has selected for her first husband and second love, is an interesting writer on occult topics. He wrote "Le Satanisme et la Magie." It was published in Paris by Leon Chailley. From its exhaustive treatment of diabolism Joris Karl Huysmans drew all his lore for his satanic novel, "La Bas." He wrote a play once to make an audience shiver. One act was played in total darkness, voices of different timbre speaking solemnly a dialogue that quite transcends in mystic realism anything Paris had ever heard. It was a play for the Parisian decadent. Unluckily for Bois, some one bribed the gas-man to turn on the lights in the middle of the act.

Calve's Uncanny Belief

The news that Calve has been captivated by a dabbler in the occult is not a matter of surprise. When she was out here she gave a young girl in the French colony who possesses a fine voice an uncanny exhibition of her belief in transmigration of souls. Through family influence it was arranged that on one of her well days Calve was to try the voice of the ambitious young amateur. Calve kept her promise and sent for the girl.

"Ah," cried the emotional prima donna, in French, after looking intensely a moment at her visitor, "I have been waiting years for you." As the young lady was a few minutes late she interpreted this as the natural exaggeration of the artistic temperament.

"Sit down here where the light shines on you," said Calve, pointing to a footstool at her feet, "and let me look at your eyes. The same golden flecks," cried the prima donna excitedly, "and the same eyelashes, half brown and half black. Now think," commanded Calve, pressing her hands on the girl's forehead. "Do you remember a little child lying in a wicker basket and a young girl rocking it?"

"No, you don't remember," said Calve sadly. "Perhaps if you hadn't died so young you would recall it."

The girl had thought herself very much alive until she heard the astonishing information that she had died young. Calve explained to the others in the room that she was sure this young girl in her former life had been the child of a family in France. "I was only a young girl myself when the baby died," said Calve, "but I loved it dearly—almost like a mother, I had played with it and watched over it so much."

She refused to try the girl's voice on the plea that she did not want the reincarnation of her one-time charge to become a professional singer. "I knew I would meet you again, my dear," was her parting to the young lady, and the French colony had something to shrug its shoulders over for nine days of wonder.

Our Prince of Hosts

There is at least one young millionaire in San Francisco who is willing and knows how to spend his money for the entertainment of his friends. I refer to Dr. Tevis. Most of our moneyed men in society spend their money as though they fear they will earn the reputation of being "good things." With the wealth they inherited came also the legacy of penuriousness. I hear, now that all the bills are in for the New Year's entertainment which Dr. Tevis provided for his friends, that the cost reached the astonishing sum of six thousand dollars. As there were only half a hundred people there the figure may sound top-heavy, but I am assured that it is not padded. The fireworks alone are said to have cost two thousand. As they were set off in Chinatown to get a long-distance effect, others could enjoy watching the small fortune go up in smoke. Then, too, the cost of turning the house into a regular theatre must have been enormous, but Dr. Tevis was determined to have all the appendages of the real thing, from the box office with Mr. Mizner in a silk hat and false nose behind the window, to a raised floor and opera seats. Instead of the water which is passed around between acts in some theatres, champagne sparkled between every rise and fall of the curtain.

Mrs. Tobin's Hit

The idea of displaying the show-windows of large stores with real people posing as lay figures was a good one but it took money to carry it out. Mrs. Joe Tobin as the bride in the White House window was the hit of the affair. The "woodeny" way in which she posed was so slightly suggestive of life that she seemed one of the haughty waxen creatures, who wear a new gown every day. The guest list is still a subject for dispute. While the idea of the vaudeville was yet in short clothes Mr. Tevis declared that he would have to cut out all the unmarried girls, for if he began inviting them it would be too hard to draw the line. As the affair was given in honor of Mrs. Gus Spreckels it was considered quite natural that the matrons should have an inning. But so many of the young married set who have been close friends of the Tevis family were left out that people began to query about it. The solution of the matter is said to lie in the host's off-hand way of doing everything. He went to a dinner not long before the affair and by the last course felt so kindly toward every one of the thirty guests there that he gave them a verbal invitation to come, en masse, to the vaudeville, although many of them were the merest acquaintances. When it came to sending out the formal invitations he found he had invited almost the entire number he could accommodate, in just this offhand way, and any number of people who had a right to expect invitations therefore did not get them.

How "Wreck" Womble Pulled Through

That the way of the college athlete is strewn with troubles as well as touchdowns is a fact well known to those familiar with the academic life. The husky exponents of the pigskin pastime are petted and prodded through college somehow even though their brain be in inverse ratio to their brawn. If they have the brawn they are pretty sure of being allowed to stay at college four years, which is the stipulated life of an unprofessional football player. They don't always get their sheepskin by the time they have been graduated from the pigskin. Many of them have to leave college without a diploma to show for their strenuous college life. Lloyd Womble, familiarly known as "Wreck," was chosen as graduate coach of the team that carried the blue and gold to victory this year. "Wreck" was a "graduate" coach all right, as far as football was concerned, for he had played for his college four years, but in the small matter of graduating from the academic departments of the university he had failed to make good.

A Dentist and a Tutor

However, "Wreck" announced that he intended to make up for the hours lost while coaching. He pulled through at Christmas time and was given his degree. A little later he handed in a bill to the Associated Students for the amount he owed a tutor for coaching him through. He rested his claim on the fact that at the solicitation of the students he had given so much of his time at college to football that there was very little left to devote to studying, and herefore the associated students ought to pay the tutor's bills it had been necessary for him to contract. The committee in charge of the associated students' affairs paid this naive bill without a protest, but tripping on its heels came another from the redoubtable "Wreck" for eighty dollars for services rendered by a dentist. His teeth, he said, had been injured while playing football. Some one reported that "Wreck" had really once chipped a tooth in a game, but as the bill was for putting his teeth in full repair with all the modern improvements, it seemed hardly necessary for the money to come out of the treasury of the Associated Students. However Mr. Womble's dentist bill was finally paid by the students. College athletes sometimes come high but the modern university must have them.

Phelan Invited the Baron

Baron Von Schroeder's term of probation is at an end. The frisky nobleman whose redolent libel suit still scents the ambient air of Marin county has bobbed up once more in society. Mr. James D. Phelan, the wealthiest though not the gayest bachelor in California, has taken him under his wing, and the boycott is off. Prince Pomatowski once asserted that Mr. Phelan had lost the sesame to society's portals, but the Prince was angry at the time. Mr. Phelan has sufficient social influence to rehabilitate almost anybody in San Francisco in need of a coat of whitewash. And he has just returned from London where people think nothing of skipping over a conspicuously elastic moral boundary. Travel broadened his mind. He found that the smart set had exploded the ancient idea that one's companions gave some clue to one's character, or that if one touched pitch it was likely to come off on one's fingers. Mr. Phelan gave a dinner at the Bohemian Club the other night to Mrs. Joseph McKenna and Baron Von Schroeder was "among those present." He rubbed elbows with Mrs. Jimmy Robinson, Ed Greenway, the Jim Follis's and the Henry Crockers.

Off with the Boycott

Apropos of the Von Schroeder case, why should there be such a thing as a social boycott? The modern society man and woman with a large-minded charitableness and generosity are not going to desert their old friends because they are "down on their luck." Unqualified condemnation is hardly a desirable attitude when at any moment they may be in the same boat. In New York society the sponge is always passed over misdemeanors. Even the woman who has been indiscreet is not irretrievably "cut" as she would have been by a sterner or more censorious generation. There are many equivalents for virtue and respectability in these meretricious days. Civilization is not so perfect yet that one can or ought to expect too high an ideal from one's fellow creatures. So off with the boycott.

Did Not Like Our Canned Goods

Rear Admiral A. S. Kenny, Paymaster General, U. S. A., is once again the subject of newspaper notoriety through charges which he and Admiral "Bob" Evans have filed against each other, growing out of a quarrel they had regarding some changes in the uniform of the service. Admiral Kenny was for several years quite a prominent feature in San Francisco society. He came hither as the first naval paymaster, succeeding the former navy agents, who were political appointees from civil life. He was a tall, handsome man with genial manners and was popular alike at club and in society, especially the latter, as he was a bachelor. Admiral Kenny's second appearance in California was when he came for the purpose of fitting out the Arctic steamer Rodgers, which sailed from this port in search of the Jeannette. He created quite a tempest among our wholesale merchants by openly asserting his poor opinion of the canned goods put up here. He purchased supplies for that vessel in the East, which were brought here by rail. Great was therefore the rejoicing among the Californian packers when a whole carload of the goods was found to be unfit for use and ordered dumped in the bay. The transaction gave Paymaster Kenny a good deal of unpleasant newspaper notoriety and he left San Francisco in wrath, saying he never wished to see the place again. He has kept away from us ever since.

A Strange Coincidence

An occasional correspondent has sent me some very interesting club gossip from New York. It deals with Lily Langtry and Lord Rosslyn, the bankrupt British Earl who lost his fortune on the French turf and at Monte Carlo, "playing a system." He was on the stage for awhile in London and in New York, but now he is writing dramatic criticisms for a New York daily. His criticism of Mrs. Langtry's play was more severe than that of any other critic in New York, and in discussing it the other day, the actress told a story of a coincidence that has given rise to much speculation and comment. She related first that her play was founded on an incident that occurred a few years ago at Monte Carlo. She met at that well known gambling resort a young Lord who was hard up. He asked her to accompany him to a jeweler's to see a superb set of pearls. She consented and on the way he asked her to represent herself as his sister, the Duchess. She refused, and thereupon he explained that if she would do so he could secure the jewels on approval for a couple of weeks. Then he would pawn them, and by his infallible system beat the bank at Monte Carlo and get them out again. At this point in her story the name of Lord Rosslyn was introduced and she said that when she opened in New York, the first night, to her amazement, almost the first face she recognized in front was that of the titled Britisher. "The humor of the situation struck me quite keenly," she said. "I had a quiet little laugh all to myself about it." Later on she learned that he was there as a critic. She considered it quite a coincidence that the first play he was sent to criticise was "The Crossways." She regarded his criticism as brutal because she had befriended him in London. "It was surely a remarkable coincidence," writes my correspondent, "if Lord Rosslyn was the man who figured in that Monte Carlo incident, and in club circles it is believed that Mrs. Langtry was hinting that such was the fact." Somebody has suggested that Clyde Fitch should combine all the incidents and use them in a new play.

VIENNA MODEL BAKERY

One of the points of interest at the Centennial Exhibition of 1876 was that of the "Vienna Model Bakery and Restaurant." In fact it did not require a very brainy board of judges to decide that the "Vienna Model Bakery" was a decided addition to the enterprises of this country. And when, after a discussion of the pros and cons in the case, in which the inner man's opinion was a decided factor, the Gold Medal and Highest Award were bestowed on this venture without a single dissenting vote. One year later, in 1877, the Vienna Model Cafe and Restaurant was opened in this city and from the start made a hit. It has always commanded the highest class of trade, in fact never encouraged any other. During the luncheon hour one sees the smartest people in town headed for the corner of Post and Kearny streets. Drop in and you will be perfectly at home with your surroundings. At one table a matinee luncheon is being given—another table is graced by the judges of the Superior Court, who always make it a point to lunch at the "Vienna." But with increased prosperity has come a trifle of inconvenience to the restaurant's patrons, for they are sadly crowded for room. The management therefore now announces a move where the restaurant facilities will be more than doubled. About January thirtieth they will occupy the premises at 222 and 224 Sutter street, next to Goldberg, Bowen & Co.'s, where they will be in position to properly welcome their patrons. After twenty-five years of continuous catering to the public, they believe they are in position to serve it better than their many imitators; for, like all business successes, they have copyists. However, somebody said "imitation is the sincerest form of flattery," so remember that after January thirtieth the Vienna Model Cafe and Restaurant will be found at 222 and 224 Sutter street.

End of a Famous Resort

A San Francisco bon vivant, who spends several months of each year in Paris, has just returned with the dolorous news that the famous old Moulin Rouge, the scene of the greatest bacchanalian fetes and the most boisterous bal masques of modern times, has nailed up its doors. The cocottes, the boulevardiers, the artists, the errant bohemians and the polloi of the Quartier Latin will know it no more, and some other resort must be founded to shock prudery and contribute to the gayety of decadent nations. Strangely enough, Le Moulin Rouge didn't pay, though it was in "the gayest section of gay Paree." Its gorgeous revels of wantonness paled sadly during its last years, till finally it lapsed into a dive of the lowest order.

Was the Gayest Spot in Paris

I remember the incandescent old place when it was the vortex of French gayety, and that means the spot of wildest revelry on all the earth. From the street the place looked nothing more than a blaze of light from which poured the streams of music, uncontrolled laughter and feminine shrieks. In the daytime it wore a grotesque architectural make-up. The main part of the structure was one story high, mostly made of glass that the lights might the better lure the chance passers by. Rising above this low roof was the big red mill that gave the resort its name. It was copied after the mills one sees so often among the dikes and dunes of Holland. The four big revolving arms were very much like those the Commissioners are having framed on the old Dutch windmill now being constructed in Golden Gate Park, only over the sweeps of Le Moulin Rouge were numbers of incandescent lights, outlining the structure. For that matter lights, lights, lights, thousands of lights were scattered over the whole place, outside and in, as if to substantiate the boast of old Papa Gerome, the proprietor, that "no one could pass through Paris without seeing the blazing glory of Le Moulin Rouge." In those halcyon days the countless lights glowed their brightest on the nights of the famous great balls. On such splendid occasions Parisians left their dinner tables or stayed away from the opera to watch the throngs of gay revelers. One was sure to see sights never to be forgotten. Everybody, except the curious sightseers, came in costume. The models from all the famous ateliers were sure to be there and they were rarely overdressed. Everyone was merry and mischievous and all were hunting for good times, though they never transgressed into deviltry to find them.

Pictures to Tempt Bacchanals

Papa Gerome, who conceived these scenes of revelry, used to call the place his atelier of pleasure. He was a most ingenious manager and a past master in the art of knowing just how far to go for the most effective displays in rare and racy combinations for a semi-respectable entertainment. He had the eye of a genius for designing floats, gorgeous creations in which flesh-colored tights, bright eyes and bare throats were the decorative features. He knew the appetites of his patrons and he never disappointed them. He touched the buttons that made the glowing old mill throb and color. He knew the moments when the chic dancing girls from the various places would appear at the door and throw themselves with all their abandon into the merry rout. He could time to a moment when some famous high kicker, caught in the bacchanalian madness, would try to outdo the pranks of the wildest. He knew how much lingerie and how much rouge it was wisest to display and where they would be the most effective in his picture. Over this kaleidoscope of color and pleasure he sat like a master, and watched prudishness and abandon rub elbows. The dancing usually began early and lasted till late. Supper was rarely announced before three o'clock in the morning. About that hour scores of waiters would carry tables into the room and the prankish guests usually helped them to make ready for the meal. It was always a veritable banquet. And now the blaze and glitter and glare have vanished. Papa Gerome is gone, so are the mad revelers. Even the doors are nailed fast. Pleasure has swept over them with her merry throng in these swift days of our gayer Society.

Knockers at It Again

Some of New York's prudes are much worried at what they fancy is an effort of Mrs. Florence Baldwin Deacon to edge herself into society through the stage door. Mrs. Deacon is visiting Elsie deWolfe and Miss Marbury at their recherche home in Irving Place, and the visit has caused considerable comment. Miss de Wolfe was a society woman before she became an actress and she has never been dropped from the blue book. She is invited everywhere. But because Mrs. Deacon is visiting Miss de Wolfe, there is no reason for the anvil chorus's assertion that she is trying to use her hostess's social pull to re-enter her old set. She may be there solely for the purpose of enjoying the artistic atmosphere of Washington Irving's onetime residence.

Brett's Curiosity

President Brett of the Macmillan Company made his hasty trip to California to confer with Professor Gayley, but while here he resolved to satisfy his curiosity by visiting Gwendolen Overton of Los Angeles, whose work he admires very much. He was very anxious to meet her and he did. Miss Overton is a very plain young woman. She is the daughter of an army officer, and she entertains a great deal at her home in Los Angeles.

But Mrs. Burnett Was There

Daughters of the American Revolution, or some of those who worship ancestral patriotism and freedom in Sequoia Chapter, have been shocked and amused through the visit of Mr. Booker T. Washington. It seems that when arrangements were being perfected by the various clubs to hear Mr. Washington, Sequoia Chapter, the proud mother of all blue-blooded Daughters in California, was invited to accept one hundred and fifty tickets and contribute five dollars therefor. The matter came up for action at last week's meeting, and after being vigorously opposed by several color-blind ladies, led by the "Grenadier" of the Chapter, Mrs. Wellington C. Burnett, as that contented and estimable lady is called, was defeated. The stately and statuesque "Grenadier" with patrician nose extended high in the revolutionary air, wanted him "to go back to his own people for aid, and not come to us." She did "not want it to go on record that Sequoia Chapter had contributed five dollars for the negroes in the South." Mr. Washington came, saw and conquered—even Mrs. Wellington C. Burnett. As the vast crowd gathered in Mechanic's Pavilion to hear and see Mr. Booker T. Washington, the most conspicuous lady way up in front was Mrs. Burnett. At first she was overlooked in the crush, and she bowed her haughty pride at the feet of this negro man, or perhaps it was the name of Washington. At any rate she seated her dignified person on the steps of the platform where she became an obstruction until an usher led her to a front seat on the stage, where she enjoyed the lecture, blissfully unconscious of the smiles of other Sequoia Daughters seated among the common herd. They were amused to find that though she objected to spending the funds of Sequoia Chapter for the elevation of races, she was quite willing to contribute her presence for that purpose even though the elevating duties of the chapter are confined to noses and lorgnettes.

Her Verdict

This week the Daughters of Sequoia Chapter met again. It was noised about that Mrs. Wellington C. Burnett had really attended the Washington lecture. Her supporters in defeating the Outrageous Extravagance of giving five dollars for one hundred and fifty tickets simply could not and would not believe the story. One lady, the wife of a leading banker, was amazed at the news, and going to Mrs. Wellington C. Burnett asked her if she attended the lecture and what she thought of Mister Washington. "Oh, yes, I was there; he isn't much of an orator, but he has a beautiful, soft and refined hand." Shade of the immortal Washington, to whom freedom was a religion, and negroes a pleasure, look with charity down upon the Daughters of the American Revolution!

My Lady of Blingum

Whoever wears the aristocratic trousers of the Poniatowski family, there seems to be a general understanding among vulgar tradespeople in San Francisco to the effect that the Poniatowski title came to the American girl who bears it with the usual business arrangements. The Poniatowski match has, of course, been more happy than most, as the Prince is at once a good fellow and a good business man, but this fact is not taken into consideration by the Blingum kitchens. Formerly provisions went to the princely mansion addressed to Princess Poniatowski; but of late the men who address the sacks of potatoes, boxes of canned goods and the like have gained in brevity where they have lost in reverence, and the piles of merchandise upon the Blingum platform bear the simple legend, "The Princess."

Playing with the Trust Problem

Now that people are beginning to die of cold through the East on account of the fuel squeeze engineered by the omnipotent coal trust barons, the proletariat is turning anxious eyes toward the law-makers in Washington and wondering what help is coming from that direction. The prospect of early relief is black in the extreme. One of our Representatives writes me that there will positively be no definite trust legislation at this session of Congress, although there is likely to be a good deal of talk and several more propositions for their regulation. Senator Hoar's bill, which created so much talk at the time of its birth, pleases nobody but its author and is severely criticised on all sides. The Cullom bill is quite as hopeless. The Littlefield bill, which provides for practically no restraint upon industrial combinations, but requires them to publish their transactions, has more supporters but it lacks the proper administration backing. At one time an attempt was made to convey the impression throughout the country that the President was interested in the bill's welfare. But President Roosevelt has disclaimed all such interest and Littlefield admits that the instrument stands alone on its own merits. The strongest sentiment among Congressmen this week is in favor of adopting the recommendation of Attorney-General Knox to exhaust the powers of the existing anti-trust laws. If anything is done this winter it will be to appropriate money to pay the expense of such prosecutions. Whatever the Attorney-General does will show the line of effort along which the Administration hopes to solve the present trust troubles.

Under the Monster's Paw

Most of us Californian householders hardly appreciate the painful and pitiful condition of those living under the iron paw of the coal monsters. I have just received a letter from a friend who lives near Boston. He is a salesman, in good circumstances, the head of a family of four. For two months past his coal has been costing him one dollar and a half a day. "I use it as sparingly as possible," he writes, "just enough to keep the chill out of the house, for I had been warned by the dealer that he didn't know how long he could supply me even at that price. Now he has sent word that he can't sell any more coal at any price for the trust supply is short and they can't fill his order. I don't know what I'm going to do when my own scant supply gives out: it won't last a week longer. The weather is bitterly cold and people will be fighting for coal if this condition continues another month."

Before that letter reached here the press despatches announced that the citizens of one town had raided a stalled coal train and seized all the coal in sight. They left receipts with the railroad employes for every pound they took and promised to pay for it all at the regular market rates. The city fathers of Toledo have published notices that the police must not hold any man arrested for taking coal from railroad yards and trains. What must the very poor people be suffering when affluent citizens resort to such radical measures to gain relief! Meanwhile the lawmakers in Washington are talking the matter over and the trust magnates are putting up the price of coal. The magnates say it will continue to advance till May. Something is likely to drop before then—and it won't be coal alone.

Kipling Americanized

Even Mr. Rudyard Kipling does not disdain to improve his English by borrowing modes of expression from us. When he wrote his "American Notes" he ridiculed us for using such expressions as "to help carry." His latest poem shows that he did not live in Vermont in vain. In it occurs this verse:

> "The dead they mocked are scarcely cold,
> Our wounds are bleeding yet—
> And ye tell us now that our strength is sold
> To help them press for a debt!"

Mr. Kipling has learned that the "to" isn't so necessary as he thought it was.

He Must Go

The entente cordiale of local newspaperdom is now firmly established. Heretofore when any crooked politician or blackmailing lawyer saw an opportunity to vent his spite against a newspaper that had at some time or another exposed his corrupt practices, he availed himself of it, and all the other newspapers gave him encouragement. "Never lose an opportunity to smash your contemporaries" was the editorial slogan. But that cut-throat policy has been abandoned. The newspaper proprietors have decided that it is high time to band themselves against the common enemy. Some nights ago a burly employe of a Coursing Park brutally and cowardly maltreated a reporter for having warned the public against his methods. This week the Publishers' Association met and decided not to mention the Coursing Park in the news columns until the reporter's assailant had been discharged.

The marriage of Miss Stella A. Hermann and E. C. Heller was one of this week's events. The wedding was celebrated at the bride's home, 2003 California street, on Wednesday afternoon.

It Was a Frost

The old-time politicians at Sacramento were much disappointed over the Inaugural ball. It was as tame as a Presbyterian meeting. The only champagne used was of Californian manufacture and it was used to spoil the punch. Veteran statesmen who think that an Inaugural ball should be an orgie to be a success pronounced this latest one a rank failure. They recalled the "good old times" when gay women walked among the dishes, and brave men dropped frapped oysters down the backs of fair but flushed femininity. The Pardee ball was thoroughly respectable. Governor Pardee imparted to it the air of old-fashioned respectability by appearing in a claw-hammer of the vintage of '76. It is said that he wore it at his graduation banquet. His whiskers were untrimmed, and he might have been taken for an anarchist. General George Stone enhanced the picturesqueness of the occasion by appearing on the floor in full regalia. He wore a wide white chamois-skin round his waist. It looked like one of the abdominal bandages worn by our soldiers in the Philippines for prophylactic purposes. The bandage appeared to serve as a corset, for the General couldn't bend. He was evidently suffering under the weight of tinsel. I hear that Mrs. Charles Belshaw was the best gowned woman at the ball. Many of the guests brought pistols but left them in the cloak room.

The stork has visited the home of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Selfridge and has left a wee lassie for his gift of gifts.

Some of the Gowns

At the Loughborough wedding one of the handsomest women as well as one of the best dressed was Miss Grace Spreckels, who wore a wonderful white mousseline frock, spangled daintily, while around her neck was a necklace of pearls. Miss Lillie Lawler looked her very best in a pale blue satin frock. Mrs. Eleanor Martin has given up the light colors that she used to wear and she appears almost invariably in black. Miss Ethyl Hager wore a cream colored satin gown while Miss Joliffe was in white tulle with a pink neck piece of pink roses. Miss Charlotte Ellinwood, who is always vivacious and pretty, wore a pale green silk covered with white point d'esprit. Miss Elizabeth Ames was in a pale blue frock and the Misses Brigham in white. Miss Carrie Taylor wore a simple but effective gown of pale yellow satin.

New Gowns at the Fortnightly

The San Francisco debutantes are making this the record season for gayety and extravagance. Ambitious mammas are pushing their goods regardless of expense, and the teas, luncheons and dinners at which the little debutante-lambs are exposed to the great-wolf, the public, have filled the bavardes of the dailies with glee and their columns with copy. New and many frocks are the rule, too, which is good for the drygoods merchants. At last week's Fortnightly Miss Leontine Blakeman looked regal in blue satin draped with yards and yards of real lace, and Miss Genevieve King, in a soft clinging gown of some Oriental fabric, was another who won her full mead of attention. Miss Susanne Blanding—her first appearance since her grandmother's death—wore a dainty gown of closely shirred white chiffon.

At the Church of the Advent last week, Miss Mari. Deal was quietly married to Lieutenant George Winterburn of the Ninth Cavalry. Miss Deal is the daughter of Mrs. Marcellus Summerfield Deal. Mr. and Mrs. Winterburn will live at Hotel El Carmelo, Pacific Grove, as the lieutenant is stationed at Monterey.

When Schmitz Balked

There is no love lost between Mayor Schmitz and ex-Mayor Phelan. They met at the Waldorf in New York a few months ago, and this colloquy ensued:

Phelan: "I heard you were here."

Schmitz: "And I heard you were here."

Phelan: "Who told you so?"

Schmitz: "A policeman."

Mayor Schmitz gave a banquet the other night to the members of the Board of Education. James Denman, the veteran and perennial taxeater, took occasion to propose a toast.

"To Mayor Schmitz and ex-Mayor Phelan," said Denman, who has a lively sense of past as well as favors to come. With unbecoming immodesty Mayor Schmitz raised his glass at the mention of his own name but lowered it at Phelan's as though he were afraid it would choke him. He declined to drink. Denman then agreed to omit the name of Phelan and the Mayor swallowed his wine.

The Mayor's Quaint Objection

While on the subject of official courtesy to the feminine politician, it may be stated that Mayor Schmitz was protagonist in an encounter not altogether dissimilar to that which Governor Pardee had with Mrs. John F. Swift. A committee of ladies, members of the California Club but on this occasion representing the Political Equality Club or some such suffrage organization, waited on the Mayor to ask him to appoint a woman on the Board of Education. The Mayor hemmed and hawed, backed and filled. No, he would not appoint a woman on the board. His reasons? "Well, ma'am," he finally explained with evident embarrassment, "a woman on the board makes it uneasy."

Etta Butler's Return

The body of Etta Butler, the actress who died in New York last week, arrived here last Thursday. It was accompanied across the continent by her friend, Nevada Hefron, the Californian girl who succeeded her in the leading role in "The Liberty Belles." Miss Hefron obtained a leave of absence to make the trip. Etta Butler was an ornament and a credit to the stage. Though she was a girl of undoubted talent her friends remember her best for her splendid traits of character. The merriest of companions, she was never frivolous but always frank and generous. The funeral took place Friday from St. Paul's Episcopal church, the Sunday-school of which she attended in her childhood.

The Diabetes Foot

The latest fashionable complaint is the diabetes foot. It will never become common, like appendicitis, because you cannot have it unless you've lived on pate de fois gras, frogs' legs, underdone ducks and other delicacies, washed down by the rarest vintages of France. The diabetes foot is the hallmark of the epicure. It comes high. It bespeaks years of devotion to the luxuries of the table. There are not more than half a dozen diabetes feet in San Francisco. And I understand they are all confined to the Pacific-Union Club.

One of the McAllisters

It is not often that a McAllister gets into the divorce court, but Mrs. Louise McAllister Young, who is the goddaughter of Mrs. Ward McAllister of New York, and the daughter of the Rev. Marion McAllister, formerly of this city, for the past few months has been focusing attention upon herself by her troubles over her child. She accused her husband of stealing their daughter. The lady's engagement has been announced to the celebrated portrait painter, Alphonse Yonger. The wedding will take place in the spring, and the couple will later go abroad. Mr. Yonger came to America several years ago to paint the portrait of the Governor-General of Canada and his family.

Wouldn't Take His Presents Back

A Stockton belle conceived a novel way of disposing of the gifts she had accepted from a devoted swain, and which were embarrassing when an estrangement came and the young man refused to have them returned to him. She counted the presents, then invited as many girls as there were trinkets to what might be termed a "broken hearts" party, and bestowed on them the pledges of an affection in the past tense. One wonders how the erstwhile admirer feels when he sees one girl wearing his ring, another a "frat" pin, a third a brooch and so on through the long list. But as the rupture was "his fault" no remarks are expected from him.

McCoy Did It

It is surprising to learn that the ten thousand white people who crowded Mechanic's Pavilion to hear Booker Washington contributed less money than the handful of negroes who attended his lecture at Zion church. He received five hundred dollars at the Pavilion and eleven hundred at the church. It is said that more money might have been forthcoming at the Pavilion if Mr. McCoy of the Young Men's Christian Association had not taken it upon himself to start the audience by telling funny stories. The collection should have preceded Mr. McCoy. He was an anti-climax and fell absolutely flat after the wit of Mr. Washington.

Why She Fought It

The decision of the Supreme Court setting aside the divorce of the Thurlow McMullins will no doubt be followed by a new trial. Mrs. McMullin is said to have fought the suit with such persistency because she understood that her husband wanted to marry another woman. She not only brought up her son a stranger to his father, but when his engagement with Mollie Thomas was announced she was very indignant that the newspapers referred to him as a son of Thurlow McMullin.

Madge—Whom did you meet at Mrs. Climber's party?

A Rare Artist

The first of the New Year series of Henry Holmes's concerts, held in Heine hall, was evidence of the happy fact that not only does Music visit us on occasion and then steam East again, but she also deigns to dwell with us. Mr. Holmes is a concert in himself. He is more. To look at him is a liberal education: the years have etched upon his face, deeply but with exquisite delicacy, the great word, Artist. To hear him is happiness; he is a master. Rich in self-knowledge, self-reverence, and self-control, he can afford to be modest. Never, therefore, does he play to prove his mastery, but always to delight his audience. Nowadays it is a treat to listen to a virtuoso large enough to dispense with those cheap inartistic tricks and petty displays of technical ability wherewith so many musicians solicit the applause of the inartistic. All that one man may do to maintain the dignity of the noble art he honors—that does Henry Holmes. A place among the rare company of pure joy-makers is his.

Gossip of the Service

Captain and Mrs. Augustus F. Rodgers will return from their trip to New York before Lent. They may be accompanied by their niece, Mrs. Harry Allen, who waited in New York to see her daughter Harriet, who will make a tour of Europe with the John Kittles. Lieutenant-Colonel George F. Pond, the newly appointed Chief Quartermaster of this Department, who will take the place recently filled by Colonel D. D. Wheeler, will arrive from the East about the end of the month. Colonel Pond will be accompanied by his wife.

The Wisconsin will be here in time for the officers to be guests at La Jeunesse's next dance. Admiral Silas Casey has returned here to haul down his flag and transfer his command of the Pacific Squadron to Admiral Henry Glass, which will be done on the twenty-eighth of January.

At the last Friday Fortnightly when, with Lieutenant Kelley, Lieutenant Bettison made his appearance, some of the girls were inclined to withhold the glad hand from the latter. You see, Mr. Bettison had the bad taste to become engaged to a Philadelphia girl instead of choosing one of Ours. But the lieutenant smiled so benignly, and appeared so glad to be at the ball, that he soon thawed the ice.

There will be another "soldier's bride" before Lent, when Edith McBean marries Dr. Kierstedt. He will take his bride to the snug quarters assigned the post surgeon at Fort Miley, the new army post near the Cliff House. Apropos of Fort Miley, it seems almost incredible, in the short space of time which has elapsed since work was begun upon it, to see the pretty cottages already facing the parade ground there. Thus far they are occupied by the commanding officer, Captain Hancock, and Lieutenant William Patterson, quartermaster. Both these officers have charming wives.

In Bleak Arizona

Burton Holmes's first lecture in San Francisco was greeted by a packed house. The subject was the Grand Canyon of Arizona, and it is safe to say that the magnificent colored views, moving pictures and verbal descriptions of the lecturer went far to correct many false ideas and vague impressions of this wonderful corner of our country. The views thrown upon the screen disclosed the fact that Arizona is possessed of some forest country, a fact not generally known, and the slides showed the six horse stage traversing the wooded stretches of table land that lie between Flagstaff and the Grand Canyon. The term canyon is a misnomer; the chasm in the plateau is from five to thirteen miles wide. The strata have been denuded by water to the depth of a mile, the chasm narrowing gradually to its base, where, at the bottom of a dark gorge, runs the turbid Colorado. The intervening stretch is full of fantastic rocks and cliffs whose shapes and coloring defy description, but whose colored representations on the screen convey the impression of something incredibly fascinating yet half infernal. From the brink of this gulf it is possible to descend to the bottom by a trail to which those of the Yosemite are high-roads in comparison, and the moving pictures gave a vivid idea of what one's sensations must be in descending. Mr. Holmes paid a tribute to Mayor Powell who, in 1869, first braved the dangers of the canyon in a small boat, he and his companions taking three months for the journey. Two of the men, overcome by the terrors of the trip, endeavored to climb out of the gorge, but were killed by Indians on the way up. The redskins did not believe the story of their trip and killed them for impostors, while Major Powell and the rest of his party who trusted to the mercies of the river came through in safety. During the intermission some moving pictures of the Moqui Snake Dances were displayed. It gave one a creepy feeling to see the braves picking up serpents as though they were bits of string and dancing with the writhing creatures in their hands.

That Mammoth Library Scheme

Another effort, and it is to be hoped it will be the last, is being made to bring about the consolidation of the Mechanics' and the Mercantile libraries. What purpose is to be served by the amalgamation it is difficult to perceive. When San Francisco was less than half its present size, it supported both these institutions and in addition, the Odd Fellows, the Pioneers and a number of other fraternal and benevolent organizations maintained libraries for the benefit of their own members. The Municipal Free Library has supplanted most of these smaller concerns, but that is not a precedent to follow in the case of these larger institutions. There is no more reason why the Mechanics' library should absorb the Mercantile than there is for reversing the plan and letting the Mercantile take in the Mechanics'. Now that the Mercantile library has removed to Sutter street, there is not even the vague excuse of "central location," and as to building accommodation, if the Mechanics' Institute building is, as it is so frequently asserted, too small for its own accumulations and patronage, what would it do with the increase which would naturally come about with the consolidation? There is today the same difference to be noted in the membership of the two libraries that there was at their foundation. The Mechanics' is all bustle and movement. There is a continuous stream of matinee girls, shoppers, candy-munching school girls and idlers passing in and out. It has always been an ideal place for making appointments and a most distracting one in which to read. This is the age of the colossus and the crowd, and it may seem a great thing to the inconsiderate and the heedless to be able to brag that the combined libraries constitute the biggest library west of Chicago, but a library must be something more than a collection of books. Any well-conducted bookstore can exhibit shelves, tables and packing cases full of volumes, yet it is far from being in any sense a library. The Mercantile Association has disposed of its Van Ness avenue property and is freed from the burden of debt under which it struggled for several years. Periodicals are on file and new books added as fast as they appear, while the quiet atmosphere is in itself an inducement to patrons. If the short-sighted policy of consolidation is carried out the result will be not an improved library, but none at all. Sooner or later some other corporation will be chartered to begin at the bottom and work up by slow degrees, to the position now held by the Mercantile library.

How the darkening days flow by!
  Daily we grow old and older,
  Daily our warm blood runs colder,
Daily, breath by breath, we die.

Thus the gray-beard spoke—four score
  Years his ancient poll had whitened,—
  And his faded orbs once brightened,
Then grew dimmer than before.

Soon must come the anchor's fall,—
  The all-hailed and blest conclusion;—
  Let not terror nor confusion
Seize thy soul at Azrael's call.

All to me the Sage addressed
  Wisest words—his eye dim-seeing,
  Scarce beheld the radiant being
That against my side had pressed.

Skipper in Life's fever-ship,
  When the World-sea winds shall smite thee,
  When men's serpent teeth shall bite thee,
Curses vast shall crowd thy lip

Many the seas I voyaged o'er,
  Youngling, ere I brought to harbor—
  Now from out this green-grown arbor
In yon skies behold my shore!

Fire and fast and storm my part;
  Deep and dread the Past's dark ocean
  Rolls o'er wrecks of mad emotion
Bound by cordage of the heart.

On the reefs of Passion lie
  Faiths I held ere Woman faltered,
  All thy fair world shall be altered
When thy Love's illusions die.

Through and through the sea-paths lone
  Shone no Northwest Passage later,
  Ere I sailed from Youth's Equator
Unto Age's Arctic Zone.

Bound in ice my joy-dreams wild,
  Even as thine shall be, young brother,—
  Soon our kind and earthen Mother
Claims her Life—a-weary child!

Close beneath thy manly bloom,
  I behold a spectre grinning,
  Culling from thy brows the thinning
Locks that Sorrow must consume.

Close beneath that visage fresh
  Of the maid thy presence gracing,
  I behold a worm defacing
All her beauty of the flesh.

Speak no more! I cried, too much
  Hast thou spoken in thy madness,—
  Would thou mar her May-time gladness,
Whom no chilling breath must touch?

Tell him, treasured one, the Truth!
  Tell of Love the seas outlasting;
  Tell of hearts no woe is blasting;
Tell of flowers blown from youth.

On his beard a kiss she pressed,—
  Then the young time blessed the olden,
  Then his silvern paled her golden
Hair that showered o'er his breast.

In his ear she breathed a word,
  Magic word of might beguiling,
  Soon his iron face to smiling
Melted and his heart was stirred.

All his creed of Woe and Fear,
  At the voice of Beauty's daughter,
  Vanished like the snow to water
And was cancelled with a tear.

Thus we left him, she and I,
  Still and lonely like a mountain
  Crowned with peace, from which a fountain
Calls the Spring-time flowering by.

On Friendship

Few people have the faculty for friendship.

All they feel is on the surface, and all they can comprehend is surface.

They wish to tell all they see and all they do, and demand the same from those they know. But any one will answer their turn.

You today, and I tomorrow, and some one else next week, that they may empty themselves upon.

Friends are usually intimate, or they can grow into intimacy. But intimates are not always friends.

If one starts an intimacy, it is apt to go to smash before it reaches friendship. —The Thinker.

Her Past's One Folly

"There goes the most virtuous woman in her set—the exclusive set," said Hensill, "she is absolutely above reproach. No fault of omission or commission, no minor folly, no breath even of gossip has ever been whispered about that woman."

"Do you really believe the woman lives who has never yielded, in all her life, to an impulse of folly?"

"I don't doubt it, with Mrs. Earl Thomson its living proof."

I followed his look, and saw a medium-sized, slender woman with pale brown hair, a clear, colorless skin and wide-open brown eyes. She was faultlessly gowned and carried herself as such a paragon should, fearlessly and with military erectness.

But what was it in Mrs. Thomson's face that seemed familiar to me? Had I ever seen her before? I caught my eyes wandering in her direction several times, trying to place in my memory those brown eyes, that white skin, that graceful carriage.

Probably I met her at some reception," I thought, "when I was in San Francisco before."

I had been in California on two former occasions with my string of race-horses, and had been treated to the usual round of social functions of the elite and the non-elect. Mrs. Thomson, I assured myself, must have been among those I had met in swelldom.

Hensill requested me to come with him, and I left the stand without having placed the occasion when Mrs. Earl Thomson and I had met.

"When Love is kind,
Generous and free,
Love's sure to find
Welcome from me.

"But when Love brings
Heartache and pang,
Tears and such things,—
Love may go hang.'

Over our wine, Hensill had grown confidential. He related several of his episodes d'amour. The other men, likewise, capped story by story, experience by experience, and then it came my turn. Paxton, who was of a sentimental cast, quoted Tom Moore, and the verses above reminded me of a little experience I had on my first visit to San Francisco.

"Hensill here," I began, "and I were dining at a 'show' restaurant in the Latin Quarter. Hensill wanted to show his Texas friend all the sights, and that was one of them. We were about half way through dinner when two women entered. One was a brunette dressed in deep mourning, evidently a widow. The other was a younger woman, exceedingly sedate in appearance and in this respect unlike her companion whose black eyes flashed with merriment over the conversation with which they punctuated the courses of their dinner.

"'I'm going to start a flirtation with that woman,' said Hensill, who was a dare-devil chap and never feared a rebuff in Cupid's court.

"'Oh, not with her,' I, more timid, answered, 'why, those are ladies.'

"'Oh, I know that,' was his reply. 'I wouldn't care for any other kind. That's the sort that makes the game worth while.'

"As he spoke, he raised his glass to his lips and looked across the room at the brunette. She, also, had her glass raised at the same time, and it happened that as she drank she looked across at us. Hensill bowed, much to my horror. The brunette apparently paid no heed to his action, but I saw a ghost of a smile flicker about her lips. That was all, then, and I hoped Hensill would desist. The other woman had observed nothing. All at once the latter looked up. She saw Hensill looking toward her—and she bowed. I was thunderstruck, but Hensill immediately jumped to the situation. He literally flew across to her table, and they exchanged greetings. Then came an unexpected denouement.

"'Oh, I beg pardon,' said she, 'I thought you were Mr. Eveson. I'm short-sighted—horribly. What an absurd error!'

"'Oh, I'm often mistaken for Eveson—I knew him years ago when we were boys.'

"Hensill told me afterward all that passed, for I had lingered with my dinner at our own table. And he did not know Eveson from Adam. But he stayed and chatted awhile, to the brunette chiefly, for the other woman shrank back into her dignity after she found out her mistake.

"'I'm sorry I'm not Mr. Eveson,' said Hensill, as he rose to join me, 'possibly, however, we may see you later on, and become better acquainted.'

"He looked toward the brunette. From my distant seat I could see the ravishing smile she gave him. 'Perhaps,' Hensill said was her answer. You remember, don't you, Hensill?"

Remember? Well, yes, I do, my boy, though until you recalled that restaurant affair I had forgotten all about it. I remember well, now, how you hung back when I suggested waiting outside for them. And I remember how reluctantly you let yourself be drawn into what followed."

"When they came out," I took up the thread of the story, "Hensill was there to meet them. It took little to persuade the brunette to enjoy a little lark in our company. Possibly this was not her first adventure of the kind.

"'It'll be loads of fun,' she said to her companion, 'and nobody'll ever know.'

"'But—'

"'Oh, nonsense. You came out with me to seek an adventure. Here you have it.'

"Hensill, by the way, had introduced himself quite properly, giving them his card and showing them his business letters to back up his statements. I stayed in the background.

"'Well, you must let me go home early,' said the younger woman, 'for you know, Bertha, I never go anywhere like this. You only persuaded me to try that bohemian dinner by assuring me it was quite correct.'

"'Lily is an awful stickler for propriety,' laughed Bertha, 'but we'll just follow our fate this once.'

"Hensill called a carriage and we drove to the Cliff House. It was a lovely night, and its beauty seemed to affect us all. It raised the spirits of even timid me, and Lily was the liveliest of us all. She sang, in a charming voice, and one of her songs was that one, Paxton, you just quoted—old Moore's 'Love may go hang.'"

"Well,—the end?" asked Paxton, "we must hear your conclusion and then go to the Pavilion for the band concert."

"The end was like Cinderella's first ball. They excused themselves from us somewhere around midnight on some pretext—and before we knew it they were gone. Hensill and I had to call up a cab for ourselves. The ladies took the carriage."

"And we never saw them again. Memory, over-heated by much champagne, was dull the next day. Their faces, even, became hazy. I am sure," said Hensill, "I'd never have known the brunette had I seen her in the street again—fascinating as she was."

As the band regaled us with Tom Moore's Irish melodies, Hensill, who was scanning the audience, exclaimed:

"There she is again—the paragon of virtue, Mrs. Earl Thomson. You remember, the woman I showed you in the grand stand this afternoon?"

I looked again at the woman who had never been guilty of a single folly.

"Come over, I'll introduce you," said Paxton, "she's my cousin by marriage, you know."

As he performed the introduction, I thought a gleam of amusement danced for an instant in Mrs. Thomson's eyes. It was as quickly gone, and replaced by the cold, proud expression the most virtuous woman in her set habitually wore. But that instant had revealed to me where we had met before.

She chatted idly with us.

"Do you ever act on impulse, Cousin Lil?" asked Paxton, "you are certainly the most self-contained woman I ever met. Even this music doesn't enthuse you."

"There are occasions," she replied, smiling as if something amusing had occurred to her, "when I might act on impulse. But I doubt if I would repeat the error—deliberately."

She glanced carelessly at me, and then turned to the gentleman at her side.

"My husband," she said, "let me make you acquainted with Mr. ——" —The Tuefman.

"Did you go to Mrs. Newrich's ball?"

"Indeed I didn't. I was afraid I'd have to speak to her."

STAGE

The Imaginative Press Agent

It appears as though the theatrical press agent has carte blanche to deceive the public through the press in any way that his fancy dictates. Editors that demand accuracy from reporters are willing to publish any old yarn that the boomer of theatrical stars sends in. I took occasion, some time ago, to expose the fake that was sprung on the public when a second-rate vaudeville actress was introduced to us by an Eastern manager as a foreign dramatic star in "Captain Jinks," and I have determined to nail every press-agent lie that comes within my ken, believing that in doing so I will render a public service and at the same time discourage prevarication on the part of purveyors of theatrical amusement. The theatrical profession should not have to deliberately misrepresent in order to attract attention to plays and players. The competent press-agent who has the news instinct, as all press-agents should have, is never short of good material for a story. There is an abundance of material in every company that comes this way, but the trouble with most press-agents is that they don't keep in touch with the members of the company they represent. They prefer to "fake." A sample press-agent fake appeared in an evening paper this week. It was published as a telegram from Portland, and purported to be the story of how Vera Michelena, the prima donna of the "Princess Chic" company, was found by Manager Slocum. It was stated that on the last night of the year 1902 he was in despair because he was without a prima donna, in the city of Tacoma. He was told by a friend, of a girl in a not distant convent, who possessed a wonderful voice. He went to the convent, heard her sing and engaged her. The girl was Vera Michelena. It's a pretty story, but not true. Moreover it is unnecessary, for Vera Michelena is interesting enough without that sort of a story being told about her. She is the daughter of Fernando Michelena of this city, who was once a famous tenor in grand opera and who has developed in her a very sweet voice, though she is only seventeen years of age. Manager Slocum heard her sing in this city early last year, her parents having arranged the meeting. Subsequently she went East and sang in the chorus of Slocum's company. She deserves great credit for having "made good" in such a very short time. One does not often hear of a seventeen year old girl who graduates from the chorus in a few months to become the prima donna of a good company.

From Saddle to Stage

Joe Kane, of "The Telephone Girl" company, which has been crowding the California during the week, is a budding genius of musical comedy who is of sufficient interest to figure in a press-agent story, but he has been overlooked. Kane is a youngster who has just passed his majority, yet he has exhibited all the elements of a seasoned star. A few years ago he was a jockey, but somebody discovered that he had talent, and secured an engagement for him on the stage. He made a hit last season in "The Belle of New York," and he was such an enthusiastic youngster that occasionally when he met a group of boys on a street corner, he would stop and go through his whole act for their amusement. There is considerable talent, by the way, in "The Telephone Girl," and the performance at the California contains many interesting features, but the musical comedy is one of those plays that elevate the stage to the level of the gallery. Its plot is decidedly vulgar.

"Lady Inger of Ostrat"

Before Nance O'Neil goes away she is going to give an Ibsen matinee. We know little about Ibsen out here, except for the one performance of "The Doll's House" which Blanche Bates gave. But Blanche Bates in Ibsen and Nance O'Neil in Ibsen are two very different things. Miss Bates gave us her idea of Nora, but Nora was only an episode by "Lady Inger of Ostrat," which Nance O'Neil will play at her matinee. Lady Inger is a great, tragic figure who appears in the history of Norway when it was under the dominion of the Danes, in 1528. The chief characters are Lady Inger, widow of High Steward Nils Gyldenlove; her daughter, Elina; Nils Stensson, a waif who has been brought up in ignorance of his real station, he being a love-child of Lady Inger and Sten Sture the banished king of Norway; and Nils Lykke, a Danish knight and councillor, a rake who has ruined among many others Lucia, one of Lady Inger's daughters, who died of a broken heart. An outlawed Norwegian noble, Olaf Skaktafl, is also a strong character. The play is very sombre, so gloomy in fact that Nance O'Neil said when she studied it for a London presentation it drove her near to brain-fever. Lady Inger is a noble, proud woman who, in her hopes to raise the Danish hand from the Norwegian throat, has tried many ways and made many mistakes. She married one of her daughters to a Dane high in power but the match was unhappy. Lucia, the second daughter, was betrayed by the Danish knight. As the play opens the latter, Nils Lykke, has come to Lady Inger's castle, it being known to the Council that a conspiracy against the Danes is under way, its focus being at Ostrat Manor on the Trondheim Fiord. He pretends that he is seeking the hand of Elina, and Lady Inger pretends to smile on his suit with the idea of later spurning him with disdain and making the proud roue a byword. To Nils, as he sits alone in the hall, there enters young Stensson, bearing letters from Peter Kanzler, his foster-father, to Olaf Staktavl. Stensson is unlettered and does not know what is in the packet. All he knows is that Count Sture, the son of the outlawed king, and who was expected to lead the uprising, is dead, and that he, who resembled Sture closely, had been made to impersonate him in his journey to Ostrat. Lykke, however, reads in the packet that Stensson is the son of the late King and Lady Inger. He was taken from his mother while he was an infant and brought up by a rough soldier and peasant woman. Lykke tells the youth the secret of his birth but binds him by an awful oath to disclose to nobody what he knows, until he (Lykke) shall give him leave. The councillor concocts a plot. He tells Lady Inger that her son is living and she, in a burst of joy, tells the story of her liaison with Kens Sture. Lykke promises to return her child to her arms if she will sign a paper promising her support to Count Sture. She, not knowing her former lover's lawful son is already dead, signs the contract though in her heart she sees her own son on the throne instead of his step-brother. She causes, to be sure of his good faith, the councillor to be detained a prisoner in the manor. He uses Elina's newly awakened love for him to effect his escape. Then, as her beauty and tenderness overpower him, he forgets that he had intended to deceive and betray her, and really falls in love with her. He gives her a betrothal ring and then hastens away that he may save young Stensson from the sure death that will befall him if the insurgent peasants discover him, after finding out the death of the real Count Sture. As he goes, in comes young Stensson, hotly pursued by his enemies. He longs to tell Lady Inger who he is, for he loves her at once, but his oath holds him. Lady Inger hides him in her room, but—with the idea of having her own son gain the throne—she lets Olaf go in and stab the youth. The murderers give out that the lad has killed himself. Then Elina tells of her betrothal to Lykke. Lady Inger, believing her daughter has merely feigned love for the councillor with view of humiliating him, tells her that Lykke was Lucia's betrayer. Close upon the knowledge that she has wrecked her daughter's heart comes the news that it was her own son whom she had caused to be murdered. The curtain goes down with Lady Inger, crazed with grief, sinking senseless on her son's coffin, saying, "I lack but another coffin, and a grave beside my child." The sombre situations of this tragedy have few light moments, but some of the dialogue, which has by the way been cut considerably to make a matinee presentation possible, is beautiful. When Lykke is seeking Elina's heart he says:

"For this I believe: a woman is the mightiest power in the world, and in her hand it lies to guide a man whither God Almighty would have him go."

Olaf Staktafl gives vent to this bit of philosophy in a scene with Inger:

"A woman's mind is shifting ground to build on."

At the Grand

For the first time during her present engagement Nance O'Neil has succeeded in pleasing all the critics. The public, which has been pleased all along, in this instance has agreed with the professional carpers. Nance O'Neil's Lady Macbeth is the most artistic thing she has done. She plays the part on traditional lines but there is much individuality in it for all that. It is hard to fancy any other kind of Lady Macbeth than this, the woman whose heart is buried beneath her boundless ambition but whose conscience is still alive. Nance O'Neil brings out the feminine side of Lady Macebth's character very strongly, but it is not the femininity of an ordinary woman. Her acting and declamation in the sleep-walking scene are things to remember. Never has Nance O'Neil's beauty been so apparent as in her Lady Macbeth. In her red wig and beautiful costumes she is always a picture. The play is staged with lavishness and fidelity to detail, and the "Macbeth" music by Edgar Kelley is an effective part of the production. E. J. Ratcliffe surprises by the excellence of his Macbeth and Mayall as the noble Macduff is admirable. The company as a whole reads its Shakespeare well.

Stars of Vaudeville

The Elinore sisters are queenpins of eccentric comedy. Their stunt at the Orpheum is productive of laughter of the genuine and hearty kind. They are the cleverest and most original women in vaudeville. The Miles Stavordale Quintet contains some fine musicians of extreme versatility and evident talent. The bill as a whole this week is a strong one from start to finish, with plenty of variety.

Agnes Ranken has repeated her former success in the tender little part of Tennessee in "Tennessee's Pardner" at the Alcazar. It is practically the same cast that gave the play before, and it is as strong a cast as one could ask. A quartet of singers under Dr. Stewart's direction adds effectively to the piece's interest.

To Star or Not to Star

There is a probability that Juliet Crosby, who has been temporarily filling the post of leading lady at the Alcazar pending the arrival of Miss Hunt, will star next season. Miss Crosby made a delightful success in the heroine's role of "The Case of Rebellious Susan," a success worthy to rank with her "Madame Butterfly" of two years ago. She is an actress of real ability. But Miss Crosby, who is in private life Mrs. Fred Belasco, is not quite sure that she cares to star. She is ambitious in her profession and takes a warm interest in any part entrusted to her, but she is also fond of domestic life. Starring would mean giving up many things in which she now takes delight. Mrs. Belasco is a capable housekeeper, and her home is one of the cosiest and prettiest in the city.

Leading Ladies

Alice Treat Hunt, the Alcazar's new leading lady, who will make her first appearance here next Monday night, is a beauty. Of that I can speak surely, for I have seen her. She is a brunette, with large, expressive black eyes. She is of medium height with a slender, graceful figure and she gowns herself in perfect taste. Messrs. Belasco and Meyer have now two most attractive leading women for their stock companies. Engenie Thais Lawton, at the Central, is a charming woman. She came here with the Frawleys but remained with the local stock when Frawley took his company across the seas.

The Milk Bath Beauty

With Anna Held in "The Little Duchess" which shortly comes to the Columbia, is Saharet, the highest salaried dancer on the stage, also Franz Ebert, the cute little liliputian. Anna Held was a frost during her last visit here, because she was a wee bit too suggestive to suit the Baldwin audience. Since then she has developed comedy talent to a marked degree and no longer depends on her undulating hips alone to attract audiences. In "Papa's Wife" she pleased New Yorkers who had frowned upon her "Play wiz me" antics when she first came from Paree. In Paris, by the way, Anna Held was only a cafe chanteuse, and it was the bourgeoisie who delighted in her songs and posings. When she came to the United States, she found that audiences over here in the high-priced theatres where she appeared required something more than beauty and diablerie, and she made of herself a comedienne to please them. The milk bath fiction that her agent, Bowles, evolved to boom his star long since passed into oblivion. Anna is now a Broadway favorite, and her chorus, by the way, holds the laurel for beauty. It includes more Johnnie-fetchers than any other chorus in New York.

The Neill-Frawley company, writes a correspondent from Manila, met with a frost in the Philippines. It is attributed to an inadequate English-speaking population. Upon one occasion Frawley played Svengali to Mary Van Buren's Trilby. "It was expected," writes my correspondent, "that he would fall down in attempting the role, but he didn't. He came right up to the notch, in the realistic death and everything." Ye shades of Wilton Lackaye! Fancy chubby Tim Frawley hypnotizing anybody, even on the stage. But now, when one comes to think of it, perhaps that was the secret of Frawley's luring so many society girls to his company, not to speak of well-known professionals. They followed him to the frozen North, and now they are starting on a tour of the world with him.

Jap Objections to Belasco's Jap Play

In the current Critic Belasco's "Darling of the Gods" is criticised by a Japanese who takes it to pieces bit by bit. He says it is not a drama of Old Japan, as it is sub-titled, but of the period of twenty-six years ago. Further, he says it is not a Japanese drama at all, but "a sort of Du Barry-La Tosca-Faust Japanized or supposedly Japanized." He says Mr. Belasco has twisted up Japanese history into a "bungle." The great torture scene, according to this writer, is impossible because the Minister of War in 1876, when the play is dated, was Sanjo, one of the ablest, greatest and most humane men of his time, his Cabinet being composed of men opposed to cruelty and torture. He explains the significance of the term "geisha," which is misused in the drama, and he forcibly objects to "a Japanese Du Barry," saying that no Japanese woman ever shrieks or hysterics; no matter how her feelings may be disturbed, outwardly she is always calm. Her forte is silence, always silence. Apropos of the scenic accessories he calls them all "un-Japanese"—"Such a frightful display of ornaments and curios, jumbled about"—and he accuses Mr. Belasco of having been inspired by the furnishings of some American shop making a specialty of Oriental things. "Japan," he says, "is a land of delicate colors and lights. Its sun is not preposterous. It is only glorious. . . . The Belasco sun is too familiar. It is as attainable as any red apple at a fruit stand."

Fischer's "Fiddle Dee Dee" road company went to smash in Seattle, leaving Carrie Roma out of an engagement. She returned to San Francisco just in time to secure an engagement at the Tivoli as Katisha in "The Mikado." This is a contralto role, and is therefore unsuited to Carrie Roma's voice, but being a good character actress she will no doubt play the part satisfactorily.

Tyndall Lectures Drew Large Audiences

Dr. Alexander J. McIvor-Tyndall, the authority on psychic phenomena, last Sunday lectured before another very large audience at Elk's hall on "The Truth about Spiritualism." The interest in the lectures has been so general that a larger hall has been engaged, and the lectures will henceforth be given in Steinway hall. The subject tomorrow night will be "The Genesis of Psychic Science: Its Study and Its Meaning." The lecture will begin at eight o'clock and will be open to the general public. A great number of business and professional men have taken the time and opportunity to learn something of the new psychology as taught by McIvor-Tyndall. These say that the lectures are free from mysticism and are practical and helpful. On Sunday night, January the twenty-fourth, Dr. McIvor-Tyndall will talk about "The Power of Thought: How to Gain and How to Use It."

Burton Holmes Next Week

Mr. Holmes gave his "Portugal" lecture for the Camera Club last night, and with "Denmark" this afternoon will close his successful "first appearances." On Monday evening, Mr. Holmes will give an extra lecture, the subject being "Peking," a city visited by him about a year ago, shortly after the suppression of the Boxer outrages. This lecture was the favorite of his last winter's series. On Tuesday evening, he will resume his regular

Features of Next Week's Bills

Vera Michelena, the beautiful daughter of Signor Michelena, the tenor and voice teacher of this city, will sing the title role in "The Princess Chic" at the Columbia. Maude Berri had this part when the opera was presented here last year. "The Princess Chic" is full of life and dash, and made a memorable success on its former presentation; in the company are Joseph Miron, Walter Lawrence, Forrest Huff, Edna Floyd, and another Californian girl, Adele Stoneman.

Nance O'Neil's portrayal of Lady Macbeth has proved such a success, and the demand for "Macbeth" seats has been so great that the management has found it impossible to take it from the boards as yet. Therefore the production of the scriptural drama "Judith" has been postponed until next Saturday night, "Macbeth" to be given until that date. "Judith" will be magnificently staged. It is the play in which Ristori was famed and Nance O'Neil is expected to achieve one of her greatest successes in the role of the Deliverer.

"My Daughter in Law," at the Alcazar, is one of Caree and Bilhaud's most amusing French farces and will serve to introduce Alice Treat Hunt, the new leading lady, in a light part. Later she will have a chance to show what she can do in emotional roles. Hastings, Osborne, Morrison, Dempsey, Bacon and Walter Belasco, Miss Belgarde, Miss Howe and Miss Waldrop will be in the cast. It will be the initial production of the piece here.

Murray and Mack are great favorites here and their new farce, "A Night on Broadway," promises to pack the California. Murray and Mack are two of the funniest funny-men on the American stage today.

Harry Corson Clarke will give his greatest success, Broadhurst's first farce-comedy and by many considered his best, "What Happened to Jones," at the Republic. This will be Clarke's last week here before beginning his road tour. Ralph Stuart, a popular matinee idol from the East, follows with a carefully selected company straight from New York. The Republic has come to stay and the management is bound to get attractions that the public wants.

"Barbara Fidgetty" suits Fischer's patrons to a T. It is a burlesque of a much higher order than any yet given at the popular theatre. Maude Amber's song has made an immense hit.

The production of a real comic opera at the Tivoli is a decided step in the right direction, and if "The Mikado" is given in its Gilbert and Sullivan shape, without more than the inevitable handful of gags it is sure to be a pleasure. Ferris Hartman, who played the Emperor of Japan in the opera's original production on American soil, will have that role again. Arthur Cunningham will be Pooh Bah, Bertha Davis Yum Yum and Annie Meyers the fetching Pitti Sing. Caro Roma has been engaged for Katisha, the music having been transposed to fit her soprano. Edward Webb will be Koko and Oscar Lee Nanki Poo. This opera is to be the first of a series of revivals of the old favorites.

Two American burlesque stars fresh from London triumphs, Jules and Ella Garrison, head the Orpheum bill, their reappearance here after five years of absence. Fields and Ward, "hot tamales, fresh from Mexico," are clever conversationalists and parodists; Les Frasettis, violin, harp and xylophone solists; the Scott brothers, equilibrists and acrobats. But the big welcome will be given to Dick—or rather Richard J.—Jose, whose contratenor will be heard for one week only in the newest songs, including "The Brotherhood of Man."

Since the big theatre at the Chutes has been comfortably heated with radiators, the high class specialty performances given every afternoon and evening are rendered doubly enjoyable. The Quartoscope Pavilion and Marconi's marvelous rifle, the latest novelties at the popular pleasure resort, attract a great deal of attention and "A Day in the Alps" and the babies in the life-saving incubators are as big drawing cards as ever. A baby monkey, just born in the Zoo, is the latest addition to the happy family. "Down the Flume," the latest piece of Chutes enterprise, is destined to become most popular. —The Playgoer.

With the Money Makers

An Hawaiian Merger

From my Hawaiian correspondent I learn that the directors of the Rapid Transit Company and Colonel Davidson, representing the Hawaiian Tramways Company, have arrived at a tentative understanding, by which the Rapid Transit Company will acquire all of the franchises of the Tramways company. As Colonel Davidson is the president of the Tramways Company and is the personal financial representative of the owner of the controlling interest; there is but little question but that the understanding arrived at will be ratified in London. It was the desire of the English company to buy out the Rapid Transit Company and part of President Davidson's mission at Honolulu was to attempt to achieve this object. The owners of the Rapid Transit line absolutely refused to consider such a proposition, however, and the counter-proposition to buy out the Tramways Company was thereupon taken up and practically agreed upon. Until the controlling stockholders in England can be communicated with and it is ascertained that it is a certainty that the arrangement negotiated on their behalf by Colonel Davidson will be ratified, the details of the transaction are to be withheld from publication. So certain is Colonel Davidson that the deal negotiated by him will be ratified, that all hostile local action on the part of the Tramways Company against the Rapid Transit Company have ceased and the two interests are co-operating in harmony.

With its application to list its securities, the United States Shipbuilding Company has filed with the New York Stock Exchange a statement of its earnings for the quarter ended November 30, 1902, being the first three months of its business. The statement of net earnings of the corporation and its constituent companies, including the Bethlehem Steel Company, is as follows: Earnings, $1,163,022.22; deduct, reserve on estimate profits on contract work in shipbuilding construction, $74,138.04, and accrued interest and sinking fund payment on all United States Shipbuilding Company's bonds for quarter, $391,666.67, a total of $465,804.71, leaving the surplus net earnings $697,217.51. The surplus net earnings for the first quarter are equivalent to a basis of 6 per cent on the preferred and over 7 per cent on the common stock, after payment and provision for all interest charges of every kind, including sinking fund clauses and interest charges on account of the underlying mortgage obligations of the Bethlehem Steel Company. It is exceeding strange that with such a statement, the securities of the corporation should be offered at such low figures on the New York curb. On December 30th the common stock was offered at $20 and the preferred at $58, with no bids in evidence, and for the bonds $90 was asked but no bids were reported. The company has increased its contracts since its organization and now has unfinished work under contract aggregating over $51,000,000. A belief has been expressed in some quarters since the giving out of the quarterly statement that publicity in further detail on the affairs of certain of the subsidiary concerns not engaged strictly in hull-building would be something of a revelation to the public and not by any means calculated to depress the value of the shares when they shall have come into more active trading.

Interesting Bits from 'Change

While there has not been much of an interest in business in local stocks and bonds during the past week the fluctuations in in prices have been more numerous and in some instances covered a wider range than for a number of weeks past. Generally speaking the wants of buyers have mostly been supplies by purchases in small parcels, but the readiness with which buyers have paid asking figures gives evidence of the strength of the market and shows that investors have a firmly based confidence in future enhancement of values. The sugar stocks have attracted the usual amount of attention and while in several instances there have been moderate declines in prices the general situation is considered satisfactory, with every indication of a continuance of a good trade movement in this class of security. Alaska Packers' Association shares have fluctuated slightly from $158 to $160. There has been some inquiry on the part of investors for this stock, but holders have been loath to sell as it pays $1 a share per month regularly; it is considered a very substantial holding. Some operators consider this stock too high-priced, but when the excellent financial condition of the company is taken into consideration the careful investor will readily see that present figures are warranted by actual facts. At the annual meeting of the company lately held it was shown that the output was 1,306,947 cases of canned salmon and 5,893 barrels of the salted fish. Large and extensive additions were made to the cannery plants and their equipment and three new canneries, two in Alaska and one on Puget Sound, were built during the year. At the close of 1902 the total assets of the corporation were $7,025,307, while the current indebtedness was $1,567,268. The total surplus in the reserve fund at the close of the year was $1,762,038. During the year the company paid $576,000 in dividends and in the financial statement the same amount has been appropriated for dividends during the coming year. Giant Powder shares have gradually declined during the week from $73.75 to $69.50. Some of the operators on the street say they know of no particular reason for this depreciation and express the belief that some manipulation was in progress. Whether or not this is so cannot be stated, although numerous rumors of various descriptions have been current. None of these statements, however, could be verified. Some very wide fluctuations have been noticed in the price of shares of the Union Trust Company. Early in the week the price was about $2,150, a day or two later it was $2,450, after this there was an advance to $3,000, at which one share was sold, and lastly the price dropped back again to $2,150. This seems rather a remarkable fluctuation to take place within one week and why it occurred no one appears able to give a tangible explanation. Quite a number of shares of Contra Costa Water stock were sold at $67, but the price gradually weakened and now $65.50 is the best bid. Considering that this stock is paying 5 per cent per annum on its par value, which is equal to 7 1-3 per cent on the present price, it would seem to be a very profitable investment. The 5 per cent bonds of the corporation are selling at $106. Spring Valley Water shares fluctuated but little, the price ranging from $84 to $85, with moderate sales at the latter figure. Trading in bonds during the week was comparatively light. Some North Shore 5 per cents brought $101.50, and $121.25 was paid for Northern Railway of California 5s. Pacific Electric Railway 5 per cents changed hands at $109.25. Hawaiian Commercial bonds brought $98.50.

The directors of the First National Bank of San Francisco have declared the regular semi-annual dividend for the six months ended December 31st, at the rate of ten per cent per annum. With the extra Christmas dividend of $6 per share paid last month, this makes a return to the stockholders of the institution of 16 per cent on the par value of their stock for last year.

A special meeting of the shareholders of the Charles Nelson Company has been called for March 10th, to consider and vote upon the proposition to increase the capital stock from $750,000 to $1,000,000.

At the special meeting of the stockholders of the Bank of California held on Tuesday the action of the directors, to establish one or more banks in different sections of the city, was ratified and they also voted to increase the number of directors from eleven to twelve. At a subsequent meeting of the directors Frank Bartow Anderson was elected director to fill the newly created place, and was also made vice-president. Anderson is assistant cashier of the American Exchange National Bank of New York. He is to make San Francisco his future home and will take an active part in the management of the Bank of California.

MUSIC

The MacDowell Concerts

There was a crush at the MacDowell concert last Saturday afternoon. Our foremost American composer demonstrated upon this occasion that his temperament and conceptions are poetic. His music comes, as he says, "from within, out," and he marshals the abstract thoughts of his listeners as he will. His playing of the pastel illustrating the Scotch poem (after Goethe) was delightful and is an argument to refute the theory that music cannot express the concrete without a diagram. This also was true of "The Eagle," an illustration of a Tennyson verse. He graciously repeated "The Shadow Dance" which is so familiar to many pianists. He played the Concert Etude which he gave at the Steindorff concert as an encore number, in brilliant style, and after numerous recalls repeated it. He also gave in his first part, numbers by Mozart, Rameau and Schubert. The piece de resistance to the MacDowell disciples was his "Keltic Sonata," a composition noble in structure and worthy to take its place among the classic gems of modern times.

Another large audience greeted Dr. MacDowell on Monday evening. Nearly all the local musicians of note and a great number of smart society folks were there. Numbers by Bach and Loeilby were the first, and then came the Moonlight Sonata. MacDowell's interpretation was exquisite. In the Adagio movement grief was expressed as wofully as it is possible for that emotion to be conveyed by a piano. In the second movement, the pianist soothed and enthused his audience, but in the last, the Presto, his hearers were left tumultuous and sorrowful, as Beethoven could have wished them to be. Let us bow to the master who can play upon our emotions thus. It was after the Allegretto movement the ushers seated some late comers, and during the ill-timed process the artist remained idle and looked calm rebuke at the offenders. Besides a Grieg "Notturno" and "Rustic Wedding March" by Strong, the composer played several of his own compositions, closing with a brilliant "Polonaise" (Op. 46). As an accompanist he was a revelation and a delight. Mrs. M. E. Blanchard sang sweetly six of his charming songs. The greatest compliment that could be paid her she received—the composer's approving smile. MacDowell's extremely modest manner is most refreshing.

Explanatory Lectures

J. Hamilton Howe, Mus. B., gave his first lecture before the students of the Von Meyerinck School of Music on last Monday afternoon at three o'clock. The subject was an explanatory talk upon the works to be given at the second concert of the Zech Symphony Orchestra. The illustrations were given from the pianoforte, Mr. Howe being assisted in the four-hand arrangements by Miss Mabel Gordon. Some very pertinent remarks were made in reference to methods of carrying on symphony concerts for the past twenty years, and an earnest plea for the support of the present series of symphony concerts, that they may have permanency. In addition to the regular students of the Von Meyerinck school there were several others present who are interested in symphonic work. These lectures are for the public and will be given at the Von Meyerinck school each Monday afternoon preceding the Zech concerts.

Wenzel Kopta, a famous Bohemian violinist who has been concertizing with Richard Strauss, Anton Dvorak, Felix Weingartner and others, will give two recitals in this city at Steinway hall, Tuesday night, January twenty-seventh and Friday afternoon, January thirtieth, under the direction of Will L. Greenbaum. The programs will include Tartini's "Trill of the Devil," Paganini's second concerto with the famous "Campanella," the "Witch's Dance," Ernst's Hungarian Airs, Laub's Polonaise and other standard classics of violin literature. Mr. Gyula Ormay will play the accompaniments. The sale of seats will open at Sherman Clay & Co.'s next Thursday morning at nine o'clock, and prices will be seventy-five cents and one dollar.

Madame Fabbri-Mueller will be given a testimonial on her seventy-first birthday next Friday evening, at Steinway hall, when a most interesting program will be presented. Madame Fabbri has lived in San Francisco thirty years, coming here after she had attained note as prima donna of the Imperial opera houses of Vienna and Berlin, at Covent Garden and in oratorio in London.

Testimonial to a Boy Soprano

If little Angelo Fabbri were in New York he would be drawing a fat salary as soprano in a boy choir at a smart church. Perhaps it is better for the child and his voice, if not for his fame and pocket-book, that he lives in San Francisco. His people are musicians and artists and they do not lightly prize the divine gift that is Angelo's. His voice has been carefully trained and his control of it is really wonderful. At his benefit concert last week he sang Gounod's "Ave Maria," the Patti arrangement of "Home Sweet Home," "A fors e lui" from "La Traviata," and "Then You'll Remember Me" from "The Bohemian Girl," the last two in costume. His singing was perfect. Unlike most boy sopranos, Angelo Fabbri's voice is not a shrill treble. It is as sweet and sympathetic as a woman's, just an occasional sharp tone reminding one that it is a boy's voice. He sings with marvelous ease and trills and staccatos like a bird. In the Gounod number, two of Angelo's boy friends, N. Feuerstein and Irving Bibo, furnished the accompaniment, the former at the violin, the latter at the piano. Master Feuerstein also played a Godard Berceuse and Moszkowsky's Serenata, with Master Bibo at the piano, both showing an excellent knowledge of their instruments. There were other numbers, the best being a recitation by Miss Martha Stuart Miller. She gave the beautiful "Soul of the Violin," which calls for so many degrees of expression.

Thirteenth Eaton Organ Recital

On Thursday evening at Trinity church a large audience enjoyed Mr. Louis H. Eaton's thirteenth organ recital. Though these recitals are free to the public, a collection on this occasion was taken up for the benefit of the choir fund. The program was a fine one, including organ numbers by Bach, Saint-Saens, Bush and Guilmant; violin numbers, rendered by Hother Wismer, by Sinding and Ernst; soprano solos by Miss Dorothy Goodsell—"With Verdure Clad," from Haydn's oratorio, and Gounod's "Oh, Divine Redeemer."

At the usual monthly musical service at St. Dominic's tomorrow evening, the following program will be rendered: Organ prelude, Fantasie in F minor, Callaerts; "Praise ye the Lord," Randegger; solo, "O ye that love the Lord," Miss L. C. Stone; quartet, "Sub Tuam," Dubois; solo, "Come unto Me," Coenen, Mrs. Lily Roeder Apple; organ solos, Moderato (Gothic Symphony), Widor, Andante Grazioso in A (first time of performance), H. J. Stewart; Allegro, from Sixth Symphony, Widor, Mr. William B. King, organist of the First Congregational church, Oakland; selection from "The Last Judgment," Spohr; solo, "Abide with Me," Liddle, Miss Ella V. McCloskey; solo, "Remember, Lord," (Fall of Babylon), Spohr, Mr. T. G. Elliott; "Av Verum," Gounod; at benediction, "O Salutaris," Stewart; "Tantum Ergo," Dettner; organ postlude, March in C, Spohr. Dr. H. J. Stewart is organist and director of the choir.

A concert of unusual interest will be given by Dr. H. J. Stewart at Steinway hall on Tuesday evening, February third, when will be presented a program consisting entirely of his own compositions. Dr. Stewart's friends in the musical profession have united in tendering their services on this occasion, and with their assistance the composer will be enabled to present to the musical public of San Francisco a number of works hitherto unheard in this city.

In the description of the new San Francisco Conservatory of Music, in a December issue of Town Talk, occurred two typographical errors. It was represented that Professor Bonelli has eighteen pianos in his school whereas he has only ten. The lesser number is quite sufficient for the purposes of the school, though the intelligent compositor appeared to think that eighteen are essential to a well regulated musical academy. He also limited the number of concerts given by Professor Bonelli to one a year, whereas two are always given.

I hear that Carrie Brown Dexter, one of Oakland's best sopranos, is going East to try her luck in vaudeville or musical comedy. She will live with Mrs. Olive Reed Cushman while in New York. —The Music Critic

The Last Book of Norris

More than ever must we realize, after reading "The Pit," the great loss that has been sustained in the death of Frank Norris. As each successive book issued from the press it was remarked the enormous stride upward and forward which he had made. The question which was raised when "The Octopus" appeared, whether that was not the climax from which there would thereafter be a steady decline is answered in the negative. "The Pit" is even a better book than the "Octopus." It is free from the repetitions and reiterations which many readers found monotonous, and it has fewer mannerisms. There is too, more of human interest. The characters stand out more clearly from the background. There are fewer of them, and the scene is more compact. Though one divines from the first that Jadwin will speculate in wheat, that he will fail and lose his whole fortune and that in his fall he will drag others with him, nevertheless it will not lessen the interest in the drama for any but those readers who care only for the clearing up of a mystery in the last chapter. The character drawing is masterly. There is Jadwin, a type of American self-made millionaire, beginning life on a farm, and making his way upward. All he knows is work and he does not know how to stop it or do anything else. And Cressler, "once bitten, twice shy," who succumbs to the sure thing. There is Landry Court, the young employee of the commission house, who buys and sells millions of bushels a day without feeling any temptation to speculate on his own account, and Corthell, the dilletante artist and elegant. One could shake hands with the women. We know them all. Laura, the product of Massachusetts culture, looking down from the heights of her "grand manner," on poor Chicago, though she did have to come West to hear her first opera; and Page, the raw schoolgirl, with her journal habit and her finicky neatnesses and great aspirations, and Aunt Wess —a photograph could define her no more accurately than her sole interest in the opera, gone over and over for days afterward "I can't think why he didn't marry her and be done with it." Even the gray cat which comes out at the close of the operations in the pit, the sun itself, and the pigeons which Cressler feeds with handfuls of wheat from the sample table are individuals and characters. No book which has yet been written has made so clear the technical complications of speculation. There are chapters and incidents throughout which would make short stories in themselves, and the conversations are true to life. Mr. Norris's style is not epigrammatic and does not lend itself readily to the gleaner of detached sentences, but there are whole scenes which could be detached and lose nothing by separation. There are vivid bits of description such as only Norris could conceive, and between and behind and around everything is the air of speculation. The wheat creeps into every episode. It comes between every promise and fulfillment; it is everywhere; it is a visible, tangible Force, which crushes everything and ingulfs Jadwin in the end as certainly as it did S. Berman in the "Octopus." While "The Pit" has more of the elements which go towards the making of a popular book than had "The Octopus," it is hardly likely to figure in the lists of "best selling." There is too much depth of thought to appeal to the rapid skimmers of light fiction. It will appeal more to men than to women and to the elderly rather than to the young. Like the others of Mr. Norris's books, its interest is not ephemeral. It will be as good ten or twenty years from now as in the year of its publication. Even should grain speculation and the cornering of markets become no longer possible, "The Pit" will still remain a valuable addition to literature as a picture of the life of its time. The Hysterical Marie Marie Corelli has been adding to the gayety of nations for lo, these many years, but never in greater degree than when she is most serious. She has managed to pick a quarrel with everything on the earth and a good many things elsewhere, for Marie is a sort of Carrie Nation in her warfare. She goes in for smashing, and she smashes right heartily, amid the cheers of her supporters and the jeers of the rabble whom she disdains. The French judiciary, who have been making such curious rulings concerning dramatic criticism, are following the footpath marked out by the British authoress, since she long ago denounced critics and reviewers and all their works, and declared that they displayed only ignorance and impudence in commenting on books—her books. And yet, Marie has taken it upon herself to act as general censor, and to protest and object and criticise, and run the kingdom generally. The wonder is that newspapers will continue to take her seriously, and enter into explanations and debates with her. Though she professes to despise puffery, and to be above advertising herself, everything she does is an advertisement. Authors generally are supposed to be of the modest and shrinking violet order, and Marie has represented herself as the most modest of all, but her recent calling to account of the Gentlewoman was enough to set all doubts at rest. Now she is at it, hammer and tongs, declaring that she is misquoted in making certain remarks about American millionaires. It is not going to change the species, one way or the other, unless Marie has her eye on some specific one, or is expecting a legacy which a repetition of her strictures might head off. It is waste of space to pay any attention to her, for like all hysterical ranters, what she really cares about is not the promulgation of her convictions, but notoriety.

Memoirs of a Countess

Another interesting contribution to Napoleonic literature is a volume entitled "Memoirs of Countess Potocka," a translation by Lionel Strachey. The countess was a member of the Polish royal family, and she was an enthusiastic patriot. She saw much of Napoleon and of many other famous historical characters with whom she enjoyed social intercourse, and she presents many of them from an entirely new viewpoint. Hers is a plain, frank tale and it is related without any affectation, or any attempt at style. The book contains a vast amount of valuable and captivating information regarding personages that figured in the history of Poland, Russia and France from 1798 until 1819. The pages are devoid of rhetorical flourish, but it is evident that the countess was a woman of keen perception. She has told her story in a simple, straightforward way that convinces the reader that the writer was imbued solely with a desire to relate occurrences as she had witnessed them. The Revival of Old Books

Complaint is being raised by some reviewers because they have discovered, too late, that Mrs. Atherton's latest book, "The Splendid Idle Forties," is only a revised edition of "Before the Gringoes Came." There has been considerable republishment of old books with new names, with no intimation that they were reissues, but in this particular instance, the Macmillans stated plainly enough for any one to understand, that Mrs. Atherton's book was just what it proved to be, so exception is taken without good ground. But what great matter does it make if reviewers are not perpetual publishers' catalogues? Who is hurt if they do treat a new edition as a new book? It is not likely that any of the world's masterpieces will be so unknown that mistakes will be made in regard to them, and for the others, a book must have had something in it when it calls for a reprint long after it has ceased to be current literature. Some books are written before their time. They fail to attract the attention that they should when they first appear. ..o one can remember even the names of all the books, much less their contents. Why feel aggrieved at not accomplishing the impossible? Why not treat a new edition of an old book, unless it be a classic which every one is supposed to know all about, precisely as one would a new book? Even in the case of some of the classics, they would be the better if some of the glamour were removed and a plain, up-to-date treatment accorded them. Some books enjoy a sort of fetich worship, a veneration passed on from generation to generation. No one reads them, but they have been praised and admired on the strength of their early reputation. "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and "Sanford and Merton" are examples. It is a brave spirit who will dare to look at them by the modern electric light instead of the old-time candle. Each new edition is spoken of with bated breath, and the attitude of the reviewers is that of mourners at a funeral. They walk on tiptoes and murmur the virtues of the deceased. If some one would throw open the shutters and let in the daylight, it might be discovered that there is only the empty coffin after all. The only reason for a book to be kept alive is that it has something to say to us here and now, not because it had or was presumed to have had a message to a past generation. Publishers issue reprints and new editions on the supposition that live readers want them. It is the business of the reviewer to make known what he finds, not to tell his clientele that their grandparents read this book with pleasure, profit or understanding fifty years ago. No honest publisher will stoop to the deception of pretending that his products are other than they are. If reviewers are too careless or indifferent to note the information furnished them, they should not constitute that a grievance against publishers.

There is not a library in the world big enough to accommodate all the books published in any ten years, and there is, likewise, not a library in the world which has any inclination to house them all. Not one in twenty of the volumes which issue from the press is of any real value, and there is no occasion for regret that the others cannot find permanent sanctuary. Our modern books are, for the most part, hastily put together, printed on cheap paper, intended "for the trade." It results in making books cheap enough for every one to own a library at small cost, but the books as well as their contents, are not liable to last long. The paper, ink and other accessories contain within themselves the elements which lead to their disintegration, and the prediction has been made that in fifty years from now there will be nothing to show for our accumulations but heaps of dust. At all events, there is so little probability of permanence that it is seriously being discussed, more particularly with reference to the volumes required to be deposited with the librarian of Congress for copyright purposes, and there is some likelihood that a special requirement will be enforced before long, obliging authors to have at least two necessary copies printed in enduring form, to withstand the ravages of time.

A Fruit Problem

There is an amusing little story in the December National Magazine, though the theme is somewhat hackneyed—the woman with a mania for hearing burglars at night. But this woman was a phenomenal young housewife, for she made currant, crab apple and grape jelly, besides other varieties unnamed, all in the space of a single week. What section of the country she lived in where she found summer and autumn fruit ripe at the same time, the author, James Raymond Perry, does not see fit to tell us, but we can do pretty well in California in the fruit line, and that is beyond us. It is like the description I once read of a "Washington's Birthday dinner," in which cherry blossoms and ripe fruit formed the basis of decorations and dessert, though the immortal George was born in February, when even under the most favorable of conditions, ripe cherries are three or four months in the future, not to refer to the difficulty of finding fruit and blossoms both available at the same time. However, it read nicely, and the designer probably pocketed her earnings from her idea without a thought of its impracticability.

Mrs. Fremont Older's socialistic novel will be out next month. —The Bookworm.

Other People's Ideas

From "Casa Braccio," by F. Marion Crawford:

"The perfection of love, while it lasts, is in that double certainty from within and from without, which, if once disturbed, can never be restored again. Singly, the one part or the other may remain as of old, but the wholeness of the two has but one chance of life."

"She had that rarest quality in women which commands men without inspiring love. It is very hard to explain what that quality is, but most men who have lived much and seen much have met with it at least once in their lives. There is a sort of manifested goodness for which the average man of the world has a profound and unreasonable contempt. And there is another sort which most wholly commands the respect of that man who has lived hardest. The cynic, the worn-out man of the world, the man whose heart is broken, all look upon the one as a weakness, and the other as a strength. Perhaps there is more humanity in the one than in the other. A hundred women may rebuke a man for something he has done, and he will smile at the reproach, though he may smile sadly. Another will say to him the same words, and he will be gravely silent, and will feel that she is right, and will be the better for it ever afterward. And she is not, as a rule, the woman whom such men would love."

Stefanie: "Study, study! What does it all conclude, this great study? Headache. For a flask of wine you have the same thing, and the pleasure besides."

Lord Redin: "A man who has not even a vice is a very lonely man."

Annetta: "Words are not pennies. The more one wastes, the more one has."

"A kiss in which all other kisses seemed to meet and live and die a lingering, sweet death."

"The passion of a strong man is loving and taking, and the passion of a good woman is loving and giving."

"It is a great mistake to think that the people who think and talk of suicide will not take their own lives. On the contrary, statistics show that it is more those who speak of it the most frequently who ultimately make way with themselves. The mere fact of contemplating and discussing death familiarizes man with it till he does not even attribute to it its true value, which is little enough, as most of us know."

lost his temper, and said to Osborne's banter:

"I'll tell you what it is, Osborne, the Almighty has been very equal in the distribution of His gifts. He has given you a tongue, and He has given me a leg. Now, the next time you use the tongue, I'll use the leg."

Wit Not Always Kind

Osborne was an officer of the Twenty-first Regiment. One day, when his colonel, his wife, and the officers were lunching, it fell to Osborne's lot to carve a pigeon-pie. He had a grudge against the colonel, whose name was Pigeon. Turning to Mrs. Pigeon, and offering to help her, he impudently said:

"Do you like Pigeon? I don't."

The audacious subaltern soon found it convenient to exchange into another regiment.

Later in life, he entered the House of Commons, became its "free lance"—the terror of all and the trusted of none. He failed, because Englishmen thought that a man of so much humor, and with such a saucy tongue, could not be a good legislator.

"Oh, S——," said he one day, to an intimate friend, "if you only knew how much my jokes cost me!"

They cost him his re-election to Parliament, and illustrated the compensating nature of the world.

Where Portraits are Valued

In India it is regarded as a necessity to impress the reality of the English raj upon the native mind by keeping the features of the Monarch well before them. Even the poorest of ryots possesses some sort of portrait of the Kaiser-i-Hind, and these portraits are hung out of the windows and lattices on all occasions of public rejoicing, just as if they were flags. In an Indian city on the day after the death of the late Queen, a crowd of people bent in attitude of reverence before a portrait of Her Majesty which was hanging on the lintel of the door of a native bazaar. It was a picture in many colors cut from a handkerchief, and it had been hastily stitched upon a background of black Italian lining. —The Raconteur

A Game of Bluff

When President Roosevelt said in his last message that it was not necessary to reach the trusts through the tariff; that they could be regulated and held in restraint by legislation, we predicted that the Administration would fail to "make good." We believed at the time that the Republican party was preparing to engage in that great game of bluff in which it has had great experience, and having observed the tactics of the statesmen at Washington, who are pretending to be eager to pass an effective anti-trust bill, we are quite convinced that the game is on. To a casual observer it appears that every other man in the Senate and House is anxious to be the father of the bill that ultimately passes, and each is disparaging the work of the other and charging bad faith. It is hard to believe that any of them is in good faith. In the seeming confusion of ideas and clash of interests it appears as though nobody hopes to accomplish anything, and that all are most concerned about the political capital to be got out of the controversy. Even the line of attack on corporations recommended by the President through Attorney-General Knox is believed to be without merit. His main purpose appears to be to promote and nurture, against corporations, competition by individuals. He does not ask that any restrictions be imposed on consolidation. Neither does he suggest how individuals are to be induced to compete against the trusts. It is evident that the Administration has some very vague notions on the subject. Meanwhile we are nursing so-called infant industries by means of a protective tariff, and only the other day the Administration confessed that it believed the Coal Trust would deal fairly with the public if the tariff were taken off coal. Isn't it fair to assume that a similar result would be achieved if other trusts were forced by the same method to meet competition? There is surely a suggestion of inconsistency in the attitude of the Administration. Perhaps the President is sincere but we are inclined to believe that he has been converted to the views of the capitalistic classes that have shaped legislation and that are responsible for the high tariff laws which give them protection and bounties. Perhaps he has come to the conclusion that he owes allegiance to his party rather than to the people who are demanding the smashing of trusts. That party is dominated by the capitalistic classes that enjoy privileges which should be regulated for the public benefit. Hence it is quite natural for the representatives of those classes to protest against tariff tinkering, and to invite legislation of a character calculated to hoodwink the public. Amendments to the Sherman law do not bother them. Laws to be effective must be enforced, and the courts are reluctant to enforce laws that might reduce the income of the Morgans and the Rockefellers. We are told that the economic system of this country is based upon the principle of free and equal opportunity to all, but we know that the capitalistic classes have a voice in the shaping of legislation, and we decline to admit that all are blessed with the same opportunities.

That Kipling Calendar

If Kipling does as he has a just right to do, he will sue the Ladies' Relief Society of Oakland for a sum sufficient to teach them a much-needed lesson on the subject of international copyright and the sanctity of a business agreement. Briefly, the Ladies had one of their periodical fits of philanthropy, and according to precedent, they looked about them for some scheme by which they could raise money without digging down into their own pockets. They hit upon the scheme of a Kipling Calendar, and without consulting the author they set to work to make excerpts from his writings. When they had completed their task they "thought it would be but courtesy to Mr. Kipling to ask his permission to publish these cuttings from his works." The courtesy amounted to a simple notification that they intended to do so, and they evidently had an idea that he would not dream of objecting, since for a mere writer to be recognized in any shape by a "society lady of Oakland" is an honor not to be lightly regarded. Unfortunately for the ladies, Kipling had a deep-rooted impression that he had some rights of proprietorship in his own writings, and besides, he had already granted the privilege of issuing a calendar to a publisher, under conditions which prevented his authorizing another. Whatever might be his private views with regard to the society ladies and their scheme, it is a hard and fast fact that business is not conducted on a basis of chivalry. "After you, my dear Alphonse," is not the rule, though the dear ladies seem to think it is. If it is true that Professor Charles Mills Gayley, Professor George C. Edwards and Professor Morse Stephens of the University of California encouraged Mrs. F. N. Wilson, who is doing the talking for her side, to persist in the publication of the Oakland calendar, it is ample cause for an investigation of their morals. If George C. Perkins and Isaac Requa gave them any such advice they, too, are in need of fumigation. Because this scheme had its inception in a so-called charity gives these women no more right to appropriate Kipling's writings than it would to levy on the salaries of the University professors or put their hands into the vaults of Requa's bank. Kipling lives by the proceeds of his pen. He has no interests or connection with Oakland or its inhabitants. It is not improbable that as an outcome of this encounter with the brains of the university and the wits of society, he may conclude that they are a community of lunatics at large,

Our Predatory Statesmen

The Legislature is now perpetrating its biennial raid on the State treasury, and the tax-payers are looking on with complacency. The small-fry statesmen from the cowpaths of the interior and the byways of the metropolis are a thrifty band of predatory tax-eaters. They conceive it to be their duty, upon taking their seats in the halls of legislation, to stimulate the circulation of public funds, and to that end they proceed to invoke the assistance of numerous co-plunderers whom they appoint to various positions created for the sole purpose of consuming public funds. Just before the Legislature opens its biennial session Sacramento becomes the Mecca of all the indigent politicians in the State, and as soon as the statesmen take their seats they stuff the government payroll with the names of the needy. Insignificant indeed is the political parasite who hasn't pull enough to get a job at Sacramento when the Legislature is in session. But there are other ways of frittering away the funds of the dear people. And our predatory statesmen are skilled in all of them. It is customary for the Legislature at each session to add to the cost of maintaining public institutions, and very often that is done by increasing the number of such institutions. California is now supporting five insane asylums and another is demanded. All the insane people in the State could be accommodated in two asylums, but five such institutions are desirable from the politician's standpoint, because they afford a large field for the political job-chasers. Many of the inmates of our insane asylums are people of sound mind who were committed to enable them to live at the expense of the taxpayers of the State. Many of them who are being supported by the State have relatives who are able to take care of them but who have been spared that task by kind lunacy commissioners in the several counties. These are facts well known to officials of the State government. Yet nobody considers it his duty to expose the mismanagement of State affairs. New, unnecessary and expensive institutions have been accumulating in this State for years, and though feeble protests have been heard from time to time, at each session of the Legislature measures for the promotion of extravagance are unblushingly presented. Governor Pardee has expressed himself in favor of an economical administration. He should not be content to conduct existing institutions economically. His purpose should be to abolish unnecessary institutions. There is a splendid field in California for a reform Governor, and if Pardee is really free from entangling alliances he should proceed to exploit it.

The Spectacular Philanthropist

From Texas comes the news that the Standard Oil Company has absorbed the oil fields of that State. Perhaps in a few weeks we will learn that Mr. John D. Rockefeller has presented another million to the Chicago University, and two or three millions more to the Methodist church. Standard Oil Stock is on the jump, and there is every reason to believe that Mr. Rockefeller will soon feel that he has enough spare cash on hand to persuade some reverend sycophant to intone a few hymns to his charitable instincts. The Standard Oil Company is the finest type of that incorporated combine of capitalistic interests known as the trust, which this country has yet produced. It is controlled by unscrupulous men whose business it is to destroy competition and to compel all competitors to submit to their dictation. It has succeeded by unconscionable business methods. It controls State and Federal legislative machinery, and it has debauched the highest courts in the land. Yet John D. Rockefeller, the head and front of this gigantic exponent of greed and corruption, is held up by college presidents and ministers of the gospel as a great philanthropist and a model Christian. This most puissant of our predatory plutocrats has so long conducted his rapacious enterprises under the guise of charity and silenced criticism by spectacular philanthropy, that people have ceased to regard him with the repugnance that his name inspired some twenty years ago. But occasionally one does hear him discussed in the proper light. Professor Bascom, of Williams College, recently said of him: "John D. Rockefeller's dollars have sealed the lips of every instructor at the Chicago University and that institution will never become a truly great place of learning. I know that he has done more to foster commercial immorality than any man that now lives. First Rockefeller gained much of his money by discriminating in freight rates. Then he squeezed the smaller fellows out of business. He deliberately ruined them when necessary. Now what are we to think of money that is gained in that manner? Rockefeller daily causes untold misery and trouble. A discriminating beggar would not accept a penny from Rockefeller if he could get one anywhere else." There are not many college professors in these days of plutocrat patronage who have the courage to denounce smug hypocrites of the Rockefeller type. It would be a matter of congratulation if there were. College professors have been spending a deal of their time of late in fawning upon wealth. The country and its institutions need a little more of the sort of courage that Professor Bascom possesses. Philanthropic endowments are good things, but not when they buy commendation of chicanery, dishonesty and oppression.

The Unreliability of Statistics

There is a story going the rounds of the newspapers to the effect that in questioning the children of the Chicago public schools it has transpired that there are a hundred thousand of the coming generation who do not know a rose from a violet and cannot name a buttercup or dandelion when they see one. If this is the case, it is in order to ask what good has resulted in side-tracking the essentials in order to give the right of way to nature study. It is only what was to be expected, however, and it is not even new. Dickens pointed the moral long ago in "Hard Times," when Sissy Jupe, child of circus performers, and living all her little life with the "show," was unable to define a horse according to Gradgrindian rules, while the glib Bitzer, star pupil of the school of facts, could reel off

"Will you join me?" "Well, yes, in a drink of Chapin & Gore."

"Quadruped, grammivorous," and a half-score more of ponderous polysyllables. No doubt the young Chicagoese can, in like manner, recite, "endogenous, polypetalous, reticulate," and much more, beside the purpose. But the Chicago schools seem to have been pinched and nipped to demonstrate their susceptibility to pain; their eyes, ears and throats have furnished statistics, and every other kind of foolishness has been practiced upon them, not with any idea of ultimate benefit to the children, but simply and solely in order to furnish statistics. Any one but an educator by profession would begin to suspect the soul-weariness of the pupils. Those who deal with children in wholesale lots are well aware that children, and especially young children, are extremely obliging. They love to please their elders, and in their desire to do what is expected of them they are apt to lose sight of all else. And, too, when the same question is put consecutively to each child in the class, it is not at all surprising if they note the answer which gains the approval of the inquirer, and repeat it when their own turn comes. It is preposterous to assert that there are a hundred thousand children in the United States, much less in the single city of Chicago, who have never seen a rose. It is not in the least unlikely that the collector of statistics indicated in some way that he was desirous of a negative answer to his query, or at least, interested in negatives, and the children simply did their best to come up to expectations. Had he asked how many had never seen a hog or a horse, the results would have been just as surprising. A child asserts that he never saw a rose, but what proof is there that he is telling the truth? He pretends that he cannot distinguish a rose from a violet, but who goes back of the assertion and tests his knowledge? Instead of revealing a "heartrending condition" in Chicago, amongst the little people, it is much more likely a revelation of the credulity and gullibility of the statistic monger.

The Kaiser and the Poem

As this is a close season in literary affairs, anything at all is made to answer for a peg on which to hang a paragraph, so it is not surprising to find discussions of what modification Emperor William's opinion of Kipling has undergone, since the sympathetic telegram he sent to English author a few years ago on the occasion of his serious illness, and the "return" made by Kipling in his latest poem. Fortunately the Emperor is much more sensible and level-headed than the editors and sensational writers. He has more serious matters to occupy his attention than they have, and while they are exercising their wits to conjure up "situations" he goes calmly about his business. After the Coghlan incident, the newspapers would have had us believe that ultimatums were being prepared to be launched, hurled or presented to our government in some way, and we were to be ready for indemnity, apology or war. And what Emperor William did do, when he finally heard the story, was to enjoy a hearty laugh. Most of the news which reaches America concerning the peculiarities of the German Emperor comes by way of England, and it is just as well to make allowance for national jealousy. It is really a family matter, and perhaps it was quite natural for John Bull to resent the position of William, Emperor of a great nation, while Uncle Edward was kept in the background. William has been severely condemned and criticised for a vague and indefinite "unkindness" to his mother, but a little common sense would make it evident that he had no choice. Queen Victoria was an imperious old lady who never relaxed her governing hand. She never abated jot or tittle of her authority, and her children were expected to govern themselves and their affairs according to her wishes. When William acceded to the throne he was a dutiful son, but he soon discovered that in listening to the counsels of his mother, the Empress Frederick, eldest daughter of Queen Victoria, he was indirectly taking the advice of his grandmother, and that in conceding to her he would be giving to Great Britain the long end of every wishbone. It was his solemn duty to be Emperor of Germany and to do his best for his own people, not to make his kingdom a dependency of the British throne and govern it as a viceroy of his grandmother. One example is as good as a score, and will serve to show the "long arm." It is one of the laws of the German Empire that no one afflicted with incurable disease or mentally unsound can succeed to the throne. It will be remembered that during the last illness of William I his eldest son and natural heir, Frederick, was also sick unto death. It was a serious question whether he would survive the Emperor. The German physicians pronounced his ailment a cancer of the throat, incurable, and shortly to prove fatal. This would have been sufficient reason to have passed him over in the succession, and to prevent his wife from enjoying the privileges and emoluments of a dowager empress, but Queen Victoria despatched Sir Morrill Mackenzie to Berlin, and he disagreed with the savants, holding that the disease was but an ordinary throat affection and amenable to treatment. Queen Victoria had her way, Frederick became Emperor of Germany, and ninety days after he succeeded to the throne he died—of cancer of the throat. Had he been a madman or an imbecile it is easy to see what endless troubles would have ensued and to understand why it became necessary for William to intimate to his mother that she should refrain from meddling with the policy and diplomatic relations of the empire. As to what he will do about Kipling's poem, the probabilities are that as soon as he has time he will read and enjoy it.

The Saunterer

That Sensational Elopement

There was one feature of the Parrott-Whitney elopement the other day which escaped the attention of the dailies. I refer to the pursuit of the lovers by the girl's mother. It was a most dramatic incident. Now that the young people are happily married all parties concerned are inclined to discuss the affair in a way to create the impression that it was unconventional merely by reason of the circumstance of the mother of the bride refusing to give her consent. There were other elements, however, that made the elopement truly sensational. When the young people accompanied by the groom's friends emerged from the hotel at Geary and Van Ness, where the Parrotts reside, Mrs. Parrott followed them bareheaded. She was in tears, pleading with her unruly daughter to renounce her fiance and return to the parental apartments. But Daisy Parrott, the eighteen-year old debutante, was steadfast in her resolve to wed the man of her choice. Up Van Ness avenue toward Sutter they went, Mrs. Parrott accompanying them, trying to persuade them to postpone the marriage. She did not leave them until they boarded a Sutter street car, and the parting scene was pathetic. Such an occurrence was indeed a shock to the family pride of the Parrotts. There is nothing that approximates the unbending aloofness of the Parrotts, and yet here was an occasion when motherly love precipitated a street scene that must have been most embarrassing to all concerned.

As to the Match

Ordinarily one should think that a marriage between Daisy Parrott and young Parker Whitney was a consummation devoutly to be wished by relatives on both sides. At any rate I am quite sure that there is not another debutante's mother in California who would not rejoice if her daughter made the match that has warmed the heart of Daisy Parrott. Young millionaires are not to be snared every day, and even though they have nothing but their millions to commend them match-making mammas are quite willing to overlook their shortcomings, whatever they may be. But the misgivings of a true mother were aroused in Mrs. Parrott at the prospect of her impulsive young daughter's marriage to the harum-scarum scion of the house of Whitney. There is nothing wrong with Parker Whitney, however, except that he occasionally gives rein to the spirit of bonhomie and up to date has declined to take a serious view of the responsibilities of life. But he is young yet and marriage may have a corrective influence. It is the wild, untamed youth that is often metamorphosed into a model husband.

The Parrott Clan

As Mrs. Parrott became reconciled to the match after the knot had been tied by an Episcopalian minister, I should not be surprised to learn that a second ceremony is to be performed in the near future, for the Parrotts are closely identified with the Catholic church. No woman has been more generous to the Catholic church here than Mrs. Abby Parrott, and the Catholic church edifice in San Mateo, the stronghold of the Parrott clan, was erected through her bounty. Mrs. Parrott, the head of the family, comes of Irish stock. She was a Maher of Maine, a farmer's daughter, and it was when a teacher in a Catholic ladies' seminary in Maryland that she met the banker whose second wife she later became. Her family proper consists of six children—John Parrott, Mrs. Robert Y. Hayne, Mrs. A. F. Payson, Mrs. Joseph A. Donahoe, Mrs. A. Douglas Dick of Scotland and Madame Auguste La Lande of France, with their respective families. Then there are the three children of Christian de Guigne, whose beautiful and gracious wife was Mrs. Parrott's daughter and for whom the family is in mourning. There is also Mrs. Tiburcio Parrott, whose husband was the offspring of John Parrott and a South American lady. She (Mrs. Parrott) was Therese Tably of Carson and she does not exactly figure in the Parrott clan though she is a most estimable and clever woman. Both John Parrott Sr. and Tiburcio Parrott made romantic matches, and Daisy evidently inherited her spirit from the founder of the clan. Though Mrs. Louis Parrott is now the most popular of the Parrott family her marriage with Louis, the nephew of John Parrott, did not evoke the enthusiastic approval of his relatives. Louis Parrott made his money in coffee in Central America, and it was on a trip to Pennsylvania that he met and wooed the mother of Daisy Parrott. She was a village belle.

The Whitney-Graydon Romance

The announcement of Miss Beryl Whitney's (daughter of Mr. Parker Whitney of California, now of Boston) engagement with Mr. Thomas H. Graydon, the Harvard athlete, comes as no great surprise to those "on the inside," for young Graydon's attachment to Miss Whitney after their unconventional little romance last November is well known in the smart set. The escapade which brought the lovers together reads like a Pinero comedy. Miss Whitney, accompanied by two girl chums, both the daughters of millionaires, had gone out without a chaperon from Miss Ely's school in New York. This aroused the wrath of the stern preceptress, and the "three little girls from school" were rusticated in a country village under the guard of a chaperon. While in this plight Miss Whitney telephoned to Mr. Graydon that she was a polite prisoner and urged him to come to her relief. He came, foisted himself off on the unsuspecting chaperon as Miss Whitney's brother, and in the guise of a relative enjoyed the girl's company during her rustication.

All Made Love to Parker

This reminds me, there is a streak of dare-deviltry in the Whitney blood. This came out last year at the Spreckels bal masque when young Parker Whitney, who is a small man, went disguised as a girl. The mysterious creature in feminine skirts caused quite a flurry among the men, and Whitney's skirts were in the lead of a procession of men all the evening. Even Mr. Frank Goad, Mr. Whitney's bosom friend, did not recognize the hoax, and he was the warmest in his demonstrations of affection toward the presumptive soubrette. The men imagined that the mysterious little stranger was a woman from the half world who had drifted in unawares, and Whitney took no pains to disillusionise them. She (or he) followed the men into the refreshment room and drank all to a standstill until Mrs. Spreckels was horrified at the scene and exclaimed, "It is easy to see that you are no lady, but I wish that you would remember that there are ladies here and conduct yourself accordingly." Mrs. Spreckels little knew how true she spoke when she accused the unknown of being "no lady," but when, a few minutes later, she found the same person on the stairs in the warm embrace of Mr. Jack Spreckels explanations were in order. It was then that it came out that the bad little interloper with the warm-hearted way with the men was Parker Whitney.

When Gladys Marries

No elopement or "secluded" home wedding is to be that of Gladys Merrill and Harry Bates. All their friends will be bidden to the marriage ceremony, in the First Congregational church, and a large reception will follow at the Merrill home in Washington street. Pretty Ruth Merrill will be her sister's maid-of-honor, and the four bridesmaids will be Marie Bull, Norma Castle, Ethel Dean and Zelda Tiffany. Charlotte Evans Thomas was to have been in the wedding party but her own sudden marriage with young Ben Thomas interfered. Alfred Bates will be his brother's best man and Tom Van Ness, Charlie Pringle, Ralph Merrill and Paul Jones will be the ushers.

Revolution in New York Society

What dictator shall henceforth presume to rigidly mark the bounds of irreproachable society, now that the golden ramparts erected by that grand old patriarch, Ward McAllister, have been ruthlessly broken down by that daring new leader, Harry Lehr. With his usual sang froid Mr. Lehr kicked down the society fences at Mrs. Astor's ball the other night in New York and admitted one hundred and fifty additional guests among the original four hundred exclusives in that holy of holies. Mrs. Astor gave him carte blanche to make out the invitation list for that annual swell affair. Very promptly he announced that it was "time this four hundred tyranny should cease and more of the right kind of people be recognized." Mrs. Astor has signified her intention of supporting Mr. Lehr in his startling annunciamento. The spirit of the indignant Patriarch McAllister may appeal for consolation to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, but certainly he will get none from either Mrs. Astor or Mr. Lehr. Mrs. Astor's wish in New York society is like the nod of Imperial Jove on Olympus. In Newport she is Society's sole and undisputed head. Ambitious women have tried, from time to time, to supplant her, but so far without success. Whom the gods destroy, etc., is a trite saying, but what may not yet happen in that wing of New York society where a pert and sprightly champagne drummer rises to be the grand vizier of the high priestess and signs its gilded manifesto with the sacred fountain pen with which only yesterday he ticketed orders for wine!

Miss Frivol—When I get married it will be an elopement. If I don't run away to be married I will never be married at all.

Miss Seeryus—What is there to run away from?

Miss Frivol—From all the hollow mockery of a fashionable wedding; from the patronizing curiosity of the women and the significant smiles of the men. The man I love must have a soul above mere empty show.

Is Mistaken for Her Sister

The identity of the woman for whom Archduke Ferdinand Leopold of Austria renounced his rank and prerogatives, at the time he fled with his sister, the Crown Princess of Saxony and the French teacher, has been sadly muddled, according to a member of the consulate of that country. Wilhelmina Adamowicz has never been an actress as published. She was a saleswoman in a glove store in Brunn, and it was while selling gloves to the Archduke there that she made his acquaintance. She was educated to become a governess, but did not find a congenial place and in consequence took a position as saleswoman. She has a younger sister, "Gusti," who is a variety actress and it is this girl who has been mistaken for her and whose picture is appearing in all the papers. At present she is appearing in one of the minor music halls in Berlin. The two girls are the daughters of the present postmaster of Brunn. They have an elder sister, Leontine; she is married to a tobacconist of the name of Chedan at Graz. Wilhelmina, who ran away with the Archduke, is a remarkably handsome girl and well educated. She is entirely different both in intelligence and manners from Marguerite Stubel, for whose sake Archduke John in the same way renounced all his imperial honors and prerogatives and sailed away to South America.

Zelie Is Steadfast

Once more have the despatches informed us that Zelie de Lussan was about to take unto herself a husband. And once more do we learn that it is a millionaire planter of Brazil who is to lure the charming Zelie from the footlights' soft glare. It was some ten years ago that Miss de Lussan first took us into her confidence in relation to her matrimonial plans, and she has ever since been reawakening our interest in those plans at intervals of two years. But she is the most consistent prima donna that I know of, for she is always going to marry that same man of millions in remote Brazil. She is not so fickle as other women of the stage in the matter of engagements. She is faithful to that Brazilian millionaire, whoever he is. Lillian Russell has had half a dozen husbands since Zelie de Lussan first announced her engagement, and Calve has been engaged to three men in the same period. Perhaps Zelie is waiting for her Brazilian lover to get a divorce.

Called MacDowell a Foreigner

The Music Teachers' Association of California, once a flourishing organization, is about to perish from inanition. It has been petering out for quite awhile and after one more concert it will collapse. In the years agone it was customary for the members to exploit their pupils in public, but in the course of time enthusiasm died out, dues became delinquent and teachers ceased to take any interest in the affairs of the society. Some days ago there was a meeting of the half-dozen members in good standing and they decided to disband, but as there was seventy-five dollars in the treasury a question arose as to how it should be dispersed. This was a serious problem. One teacher suggested that it be used to hire Mr. Edward MacDowell to deliver a lecture to the teachers. One lady promptly demurred, saying that she objected to "giving our funds to a foreigner."

"He isn't a foreigner," exclaimed the mother of the suggestion, "he was born in New York."

"Well, he's foreign to us," was the retort.

A third lady moved that the money be donated to a charitable institution. The motion failed to receive a second. Indeed it was pooh-poohed! Then the lady who had pronounced the great American composer a foreigner moved that the money be spent in giving a concert. This motion was carried but not unanimously. The society will go out of existence at a concert at which the pupils of two of the teachers will have the opportunity to display their talents.

Dining on Poison Foods

The government's experiments in feeding poisoned foods to twenty-four volunteers is attracting widespread attention both here and abroad. The daily prints are beginning to comment on the work. They will certainly give pages to the matter when the results are made known. The men who have subjected themselves to the task of digesting the poisoned food are nearly all employed in various Federal bureaus. They are all hale, hearty young fellows and their fears of any deadly outcome have been allayed by the promise of Dr. Wiley that under no circumstances shall they have to endure any sufferings. All they get in return is good board for six months, puffs in the papers and the glory of having helped science. But incidentally they may be doing an immense amount of wholesale good for the experiments are going to furnish data showing up the effects of the various food adulterations on the human system. For instance, these poison eaters are now dining on borax and salicylic acid, both of which are largely used as preservatives. In due course of time the volunteers will be fed formaline and the sulphites, both extensively employed in canned and other foods. Bi-sulphite of potash, which is put up in tablets for brewers to mix in their beer, will also be tried on these cheerful eaters. So will salts of copper and zinc, which the food jugglers use to "green" certain vegetables. Aniline dyes are put into preserved meats as well as into butter and jellies to give them the proper colors and these twenty-four martyrs to science will try these adulterants in capsules and Science will watch the effects.

After the Food Adulterators

The government experimenters have introduced several novel effects to safeguard accurate results. For instance the poison eaters don't dine on poison at every meal. The twenty-four are divided into four squads of six men each. Twelve men are resting their systems while the other twelve tackle the poisons at the "observation" table. Of this latter group only six eat poison at meals. To put it exactly, only five eat the poison. When the six take their seats each finds a capsule beside his plate. The government has arranged it so that one of these capsules contains some harmless substance like starch or sugar. By this arrangement each man of the six hopes that he is swallowing the harmless capsules and thereby his imagination is not haunted with the dread that he has gulped something injurious to his system. So his lugubrious fancies do not affect his bodily health. The experimenters are feeding the same poisons in larger quantities to various animals and the pathological results are being carefully noted. At the end of six months, when all the data is drafted, there is bound to be a bill sent into Congress that will create consternation among adulterated food manufacturers and joy in plebeian home circles deluged with impure foods.

A Rustic's Objection

I heard a pretty good one on an up-country groceryman's views on Del Monte which I think ought to be printed for the benefit of a few of Colonel Watterson's "too smart set." It seems that the swain was married to a little Spanish girl of his own home town, and when they went off on their bridal tour they told their friends that they were going to Del Monte to have a "real swell time." About ten days passed and the up-country grocer and his blushing bride returned to their home town.

"Did you have a good time at Del Monte?" asked a lounger when the bridegroom took his old place behind the counter.

"Del Monte's all right, I guess," said the grocer, "but there are lots of things in which it's a good bit out of date. They set a right smart table and I ain't got no kick coming about the way the rooms is kept. Everything was lots sweller than anything we ever had in this town—swell clothes, swell rigs and automobiles, swell horses and swell talk. Why, even the waiters was swell. I liked the air, too, and the view was grand. But there was one thing about the hotel that was strictly on the punk, and that was the proprietor. I don't know what was the matter with him. What do you think he did? Why, me and Minnie was in that hotel a whole week, walking up and down the halls and parlors and doing our best to make ourselves at home with the rest of the swells, and here stood that blamed gump of a proprietor looking right at us and never so much as offered to introduce us to nobody!"

The Savages of Boston

Dr. Minot J. Savage, the Unitarian clergyman who, on a Boston lecture platform, declared that "there are not four hundred religious men in New York," is well known in California, having visited here many times as the guest of the four hundred more or less churchly people in San Francisco. Dr. Savage is a brilliant talker, and as such was called some years ago to New York to take the richest and most fashionable pulpit there. It was in this capacity that he got a good chance to study the ungodly of Gotham and to prepare his scoring which he took back to Boston with him. Dr. Savage is one of the founders of the Society for Psychical Research and was at the head of the organization for years, and during the last years of his tenure of office he was somewhat criticised by the opposition because of his leaning toward spiritualism and its spooky tenets. But it was as the father of the poet, the late Philip Savage, that Dr. Savage was in every Boston mouth a few years ago. About that time Philip Savage, who was as well known in Bohemia as in church circles, met and loved Ethel Reed, the artist. She was then famous as the originator of the poster craze in America. Her work was not only new, but it was very beautiful, more so because she drew herself into many of her pictures, and she could have found no more beautiful model in New England. These poster portraits are now out of print and are highly prized by collectors. Well, she didn't marry Phil Savage. His enemies say that it was because his person was as unkempt as his genius. At any rate she broke their engagement and went abroad in the same steamer with a former lover whom she married in France. She has suffered the fate of talented wives and dropped completely from public life.

The Theatre Bounder

The rudeness of concert-goers, on which I commented last week, is not more distressing than that of the theatre-bounder whose boorish obtrusiveness is always in evidence in local playhouses. The late-comers are not more offensive than the commuters who rush for a boat and the hungry men and women who are intent upon getting a table in some local cafe. One night last week two women seated in the front row of the Grand donned their hats and wraps and noisily footed it out of the theatre during the soliloquy of Macbeth in the last act.

The Rector of St. Stephen's

The death of the Reverend Edgar J. Lion means a great loss to St. Stephen's parish, in which he had so long labored. His death was sudden, and came at the close of a week-day service at the church. He burst a blood-vessel in the head, and his death ensued quickly. Mr. Lion was a clergyman of the sort that is rare nowadays. He never cared for notoriety and did not preach sensational sermons or pose for the newspapers. His was a striking personality. His father, who I have heard was a Jew, had another career in view for his son, who took his religious ideas from his mother. Mr. Lion was a cultured man and very fond of music, in which art he had his three children thoroughly educated. He married some years ago Miss Carrie Holmes, a beauty of the Spanish type, and their union was one of perfect harmony.

Ben Wheeler's Plaint

President Wheeler of Berkeley says that the California newspapers garbled his biennial report; that they used a single paragraph as a basis for accusing him of leaning toward tuition fee charges whereas he has always been opposed to such charges. "However," adds President Wheeler, "I consider it not worth my while trying to vindicate my actions in the California newspapers. I feel that I have been unfairly treated through the press ever since I have been in California." Perhaps President Wheeler is in bad odor in newspaper offices, and perhaps it would be useless for President Wheeler to try to vindicate his actions in the newspapers. Occasionally a man is unfairly treated by one or two newspapers in a community, but when you hear a man complain of being unfairly treated by the press of the State in which he lives, if you investigate you will find that there are two sides to the story.

One of Mrs. Hearst's New Year gifts that she prizes highly is the book of patches, containing specimens of needlework by the co-eds in the sewing class at the university, established by her bounty. The little samplers are beautifully done, and Mrs. Hearst was much pleased to think the young needlewomen had accomplished such fine work.

Monticello Club Losing Members

There have been many resignations from the Monticello Club of late, and somebody has started the report that it is a case of the rodents deserting a sinking ship. The Monticello Club is an organization which came into existence in the heyday of the political career of Gavin McNab when that now defunct boss was running in double harness with James D. Phelan. Together they undertook to make the Democracy of the State an exclusive organization. The Monticello club-rooms in Kearny street became the headquarters of the Democratic elite. The membership was drawn principally from interior towns, for McNab proceeded upon the theory that to properly reform San Francisco it was necessary to secure the co-operation of job-chasers from Modesto, Santa Rosa and other points. The club thrived for a time, but since the defeat of Lane the rooms have been deserted. Save for the occasional whispering of Gavin McNab and the sotto voce responses of Barney Murphy the echoes are never awakened. When Mayor Snyder, the pink whiskered Executive of Los Angeles, comes to town he is lured to the Monticello rooms, for McNab looks upon him as "available timber" in a gubernatorial race. But lately the bar-keeper has to mix drinks for himself to keep his hand from losing its cunning.

The New Movement

The Monticello membership began to fall off shortly after Mayor Schmitz made his new appointments. The Monticelloites promptly sat up and took notice that there was "something doing." The news was soon bruited that McNab had no hand in the distribution of the Democratic patronage. Gradually it dawned upon them that a new Democratic organization was coming into existence. Presently it leaked out that James H. O'Brien, a representative of the old school of Democracy, was leading a movement to take the control of the machinery out of the hands of the plush-chair warmers. And then the resignations began to pour in.

Schmitz's Patronage Deal

Anent the appointments of Mayor Schmitz, I am reminded of the sensational revelations made some days ago regarding the patronage deal negotiated for him by his astute mentor, Abe Ruef. It appears that the Mayor has given the labor organizations that elected him to office what is known in vulgar parlance as the "double-cross." But I am not surprised; neither are the readers of this paper who are familiar with all that I have written about the present municipal Administration, and the lightning-change poses of the flexible fiddler. When Mr. Schmitz was elected to office it was understood by his constituents that he would do all in his power to remove Chief of Police Wittman from office. The labor leaders who objected to going into politics were induced to do so when it was represented to them that a Mayor of their choice could take the police department out of the hands of the people who controlled it during the teamsters' strike. Eugene Schmitz promised to do that for them. The question of the reasonableness of their demands is not to be considered at this time. The fact is that instead of carrying out his promise Mayor Schmitz entered into a compact with representatives of the Employers' Association whereby he removed the one representative of the labor unions from the Police Commission and appointed thereon an ex-member of the Employers' Association. This was done in pursuance of an agreement with the Chief of Police, the man he was expected to remove, and with the two commissioners who are the friends and supporters of the Chief.

It Points a Moral

In other words, Eugene Schmitz is found playing into the hands of Commissioners Howell and Newhall of the Employers' Association, his sole purpose being to obtain control of the patronage of the Health Department. No doubt there are many people who are well satisfied with the management of the police department by Commissioners Newhall and Howell, and unquestionably there are many who think that Wittman is a satisfactory executive. I have no criticism to make of them at this time, my only desire being to call attention to the shiftiness of the man who was elected Mayor of this city by the labor organizations. I believe that his conduct points a moral regarding the danger of trying to carry water on more than one shoulder. The Mayor explains that he is simply interested in getting the bubonic plague Board of Health out of office, but the whole affairs savors very much of a patronage-grabbing scheme. The Mayor will have a hard time trying to convince his constituents that he made the deal by which he increases Wittman's tenure of office solely in the interest of the dear people.

Casey Greeted by Nierney

Admiral Casey ended his last voyage as an executive officer of the navy last Sunday afternoon, when the New York steamed into the bay and dropped anchor off Broadway wharf. Admiral Casey goes on the retired list on February first and then Rear Admiral Glass takes command of the squadron. Though the Marblehead and Albatross were in port when the New York anchored, the first officer to pay his respects to Admiral Casey on his arrival was Captain Nierney of the Marion, the training ship of the naval militia which lies alongside Folsom street wharf. It is about time, by the way, for our representatives at Washington to exert themselves in behalf of the naval militia, who are badly in need of a ship in which they can put to sea without the aid of a tug. An old tub like the Marion is a disgrace to the service. Though there has been a great deal of talk in Washington recently of the advisability of fostering the naval militia, and bringing it into closer touch with the navy, it continues to be somewhat of an opera bouffe organization. Men cannot be expected to become enthusiastic members of a naval institution that provides them with a ship that is unfit for sea service.

Irwin's Coming Libretto

The Philippines are to be the scene of the opera the libretto of which is being written by Wallace Irwin, and I predict that it will have more of the Gilbertian flavor than anything that has been written in recent years. Clever librettists are exceedingly rare in these days, and though Irwin has not hitherto essayed anything in the libretto line, his work shows that he is possessed of the creative genius that weaves quaint plots and amusing situations, and I doubt whether there is a man in the country capable of writing better lyrics for comic opera. I hear that he is being assisted by Lieutenant Harry Howland of the Thirteenth Infantry, who spent three years in the Philippines, and who is now stationed at Fort Mason. He will supply the local color and atmosphere, and Mr. Irwin's nimble wit will do the rest. Lieutenant Howland, by the way, is handsome as well as literary, and he is quite a popular beau.

Hoffman's Marine Gun Play

Ogden Hoffman, who returned from Honolulu on the Korea, is said to have had quite a thrilling experience on the high seas while en route to the islands. He made the trip on a sailing vessel, and his friends are circulating the story that he proved himself quite a hero. When the ship was a week out, so the story goes, the captain informed all hands that he purposed stealing the schooner, and with that object he proceeded to steer for a foreign port. Mr. Hoffman, after the manner of a melodramatic hero, resolved to upset the plans of the bold, bad captain. He drew a revolver, a weapon that is always essential to the success of a man with heroic intentions, and pointing it at the captain's head, commanded him to sail for Honolulu. Under such circumstances it is usual for the villain's factotum to rush on the scene with a belaying pin or a marlin spike or some other familiar marine weapon, but in this instance Mr. Hoffman held the centre of the stage without interference. And with the pistol at the captain's head the schooner sailed into Honolulu. Whether Mr. Hoffman had an understudy to hold the pistol when he grew tired I do not know, but it was surely a thrilling adventure.

Men May Mask

The edict having gone forth that men may mask at the Art Association's next Mardi Gras ball, the affair will no doubt be less stiff and freezingly proper than the last one. Our Mardi Gras balls of the last few years have been just a wee bit merrier than a church social, the reason being that men were not permitted to masquerade. The directors of the Hopkins are great sticklers for the proprieties, and they feared that some bold and festive club man might take undue advantage of his disguise. They therefore held the carnival spirit in check, but this year they hope to see the ball go with a swing and elan.

"Miss Electricity" May be There

There is a possibility, by the way, of Ethyl Hager's appearance at the Mardi Gras ball in her wonderful electrical costume with which she startled people at the Greenway function. At the solicitation of some of the Sisters of Charity, Miss Hager has consented to wear the dress at a festival given by the children of the school. She will not sit in state like the peeress of England who posed in her coronation robes for the benefit of sweet charity, but will lead the children's singing. One of the electricians who carried out Miss Hager's idea of a "Miss Electricity" costume tells me that he and a capable assistant worked an entire week on the electrical end of the gown. The difficult problem was the distribution of wires and batteries so that they would not show and spoil the effect. As the electrical appliances used weighed eighteen pounds it was no small achievement to arrange them literally under the rose—the artificial ones that decorated the gown. The cost of the electrical work on the costume was two hundred dollars, a sum which few society girls would have cared to spend for the pleasure of "shining" just for one night. There was a great flurry among the ladies' maids in the dressing-room at the Greenway ball when Miss Hager appeared with a young man instead of the ubiquitous maid. At first they thought she had adopted the mode of a ladies' valet but Miss Hager explained to them that he was not a valet but an electrical engineer skilled in the art of "pressing the button." They were much mystified until he turned on the lights in her costume.

A Military and Naval Ball

They are having lively times this winter at Del Monte. He Saved Stockton's Credit

There has been a [illegible] in the city of Stockton [illegible] I called attention to the urgent necessity of a few first-class funerals in that erstwhile silurian burg. I told of the penuriousness of the leading citizens and especially of the bankers who were too mean to stimulate commercial activity, and who wouldn't erect decent buildings for their own institutions. Now I am informed that both the San Joaquin Valley Bank and the Stockton Savings Bank have purchased property for the purpose of erecting suitable buildings. And Stockton has had at least one first class funeral, for H. H. Hewlett, President of the First National Bank of Stockton, died the other day. Hewlett was a close-fisted chap who always had an eye on the main chance, and he was regarded in Stockton as a niggard for he was exceedingly frugal and penurious, but he had many good traits and was even charitable in a quiet way. It is a fact not generally known that Hewlett saved the credit of Stockton during the period of commercial depression some ten years ago. A panic threatened and he supplied sufficient money to all the banks in Stockton to enable them to meet their obligations. He left an estate valued at over a million dollars, and there is some likelihood of a contest over it.

Great Expectations

The banker's death has stirred up a deal of curiosity concerning his will. It is not too much to say that every man and woman who knew Hewlett is on the very tiptoe of expectation about that. Mr. Hewlett had an assortment of relatives to inherit his million. His widow who is a niece, through her mother, of J. B. Haggin, was about thirty years the junior of the aged financier and is still a young and handsome woman and devoted to her relatives. But there was no love lost between the banker and those relatives. There are close relatives of the banker through a former wife who may expect to inherit a slice of the million, but there is no love lost between the widow and those relatives. Then there is a good-looking and rather sporty young nephew who is a Hewlett and who cherishes expectations.

Romance of the Cogswell Estate

A marriage of somewhat romantic interest will take place at Grace church next Thursday. On that day Miss Elizabeth Robley, a maiden lady of mature years, will be united with Mr. W. W. Richards, secretary and treasurer of the Semper Virens Club and Fish and Game Warden. The lady is a niece of the late Mrs. Cogswell, widow of Dr. Cogswell of freak fountain fame, and Richards, who is the junior of his fiancee though in the forties, is the latter's cousin. He has been regarded as an irretrievable bachelor. His aunt bequeathed ten thousand dollars to him and she left a much larger sum to her niece, Miss Robley, who lived in a Massachusetts village and who was believed to be quite poor. When the estate was about ready for distribution Richards went East in search of his cousin, for he was intent on putting her in possession of her legacy. Much to his surprise he found that she was a very wealthy woman. She returned with him to this city, and evidently while talking over the affairs of the estate they fell in love, for now they are to be married.

BORJES & BENSON, [illegible] Market Street corner of Sixth, carry more than the Finest Imported and Domestic Wines and Liquors. Polite treatment, quick service, fine goods and popular prices have made this house one of the favorite resorts of the city.

McDonald was His Mentor

Immediately after Mr. Hermann Oelrichs departed for the East, Mr. S. G. Murphy boarded a train and followed him. Mr. Murphy is the banker of the Fair estate, and his friends are betting that no nickel of that estate will escape if he can prevent it. Mr. Murphy, by the way, was educated in the banking business by that oily old hypocrite, "Vinegar Bitters" McDonald, who ran away from San Francisco at the time of the disgraceful collapse of the Pacific Bank. It is said that he learned all the tricks of the trade from McDonald.

Scrutinized His Bumps

Mrs. B. F. Fowler, widow of the man who acquired national fame for his skill as a bump reader, is once more in town. When she was here some time ago she had among her paraphernalia a map of the brain, and she said the soul was located in a certain little blue spot. She prided herself on having made that discovery. At that time she was reported to be in the sixties. She is now accompanied by a black-haired, black-bearded little man of forty and he is her husband. They are perfectly congenial for she examined his bumps before marrying him.

The Latest Journalistic Wrinkle

With such frequency do the members of New York's smart set shift the matrimonial cut these days that women are no longer designated in the social items in the newspapers in the old-fashioned way. For instance, in referring to the birth of a child to Mrs. Henry Clews Jr. recently, one paper mentioned the young mother as Mrs. Henry Clews Jr., nee Morris divorcee de Frederick Gebhard.

Another Engagement Broken

A marriage that was recently scheduled for solemnization at Trinity church has been indefinitely postponed. All arrangements for the function had been made, the groom had the license, the bride her trousseau and the friends of

VIENNA MODEL BAKERY.

One of the points of interest at the Centennial Exhibition of 1876 was that of the "Vienna Model Bakery and Restaurant." In fact it did not require a very brainy board of judges to decide that the "Vienna Model Bakery" was a decided addition to the enterprises of this country. And when, after a discussion of the pros and cons in the case, in which the inner man's opinion was a decided factor, the Gold Medal and Highest Award were bestowed on this venture without a single dissenting vote. One year later, in 1877, the Vienna Model Cafe and Restaurant was opened in this city and from the start made a hit. It has always commanded the highest class of trade, in fact never encouraged any other. During the luncheon hour one sees the smartest people in town headed for the corner of Post and Kearny streets. Drop in and you will be perfectly at home with your surroundings. At one table a matinee luncheon is being given—another table is graced by the judges of the Superior Court, who always make it a point to lunch at the "Vienna." But with increased prosperity has come a trifle of inconvenience to the restaurant's patrons, for they are sadly crowded for room. The management therefore now announces a move where the restaurant facilities will be more than doubled. About January thirtieth they will occupy the premises at 222 and 224 Sutter street, next to Goldberg, Bowen & Co.'s, where they will be in position to properly welcome their patrons. After twenty-five years of continuous catering to the public, they believe they are in position to serve it better than their many imitators; for, like all business successes, they have copyists. However, somebody said "imitation is the sincerest form of flattery," so remember that after January thirtieth the Vienna Model Cafe and Restaurant will be found at 222 and 224 Sutter street.

both their invitations to attend, but there will be no marriage. The supposition is that it was declared off on account of the illness of the man, but whatever the cause it has occasioned considerable comment, especially in the British colony, many members of which had expected to attend the ceremony. The man who caused the disappointment is Allen Stewart, a wealthy tea merchant who recently came hither from China to visit his brother, Charles A. Stewart, a California street commission merchant. He met and wooed a handsome young woman from a northern city. Immediately after it became known that they were engaged, the discovery was made that the groom-to-be was a very sick man. Dr. D'Evelyn pronounced him a victim of nervous prostration, and he was promptly hustled off to a Sutter street sanitarium and placed under guard. The wedding was to have taken place last Monday, and a few days before Stewart was visited by his fiancee. He begged her to send for a Justice of the Peace and have the ceremony performed then and there, but she preferred the church function. Stewart appeared to be in sound condition at the time, and she was quite confident that he would be on hand on the following Monday. But he wasn't, though he had left the hospital. It is said that he has gone away, and that his brother is well pleased that the marriage did not take place.

She Scribbled Herself

Miss Bertha Runkle, the author of "The Helmet of Navarre," who is now in the city, had an amusing experience with a local "authoress" shortly after her arrival here. It seems that Miss Runkle had occasion to go to the Public Library to look up some references. While she was among the books chatting with one of the librarians about some point a busy female of middle age and strange apparel trotted up and spoke sharply to the librarian.

"I am a very busy woman," she said, "I am looking for data on California missions for my next book, and if you are too deeply engaged in conversation I should like you at least to show me the shelves where I can find the books."

The bookman betrayed a becoming humility, showed the lady the shelves, and after he had found the books for her attempted to "put her wise."

"Do you know who that young lady is whom I was talking to?" he asked.

"Do you know who I am?" she inquired in return.

The librarian betrayed his ignorance.

"I am the author of 'Little Mamie's Picnic Party and Other Stories.'"

"Oh, if that's the case," said the librarian, "you won't be at all interested in small fry like the author of 'The Helmet of Navarre.'"

She Impressed the Prince

Prince Maha Vajiravudh, the future King of Siam, has determined to make another trip to this country. He has written to a friend in this city stating that he will return on official business as soon as his father returns from England. He wrote that he was especially desirous of spending some time in San Francisco for the people were the most unconventional that he had ever met. The news will no doubt interest some of the people who met the Crown Prince at the De Young and King homes, and who probably have never boasted of their unconventionality. And by the way, I have heard that his royal highness was very much impressed by one fair Californian. I refer to Miss Kate Robinson whom he met at the Homer King reception. When he subsequently accepted an invitation to dine at the De Young home, he requested that Miss Robinson be invited. No doubt when the Prince learns of the publication of his love letters written to Mabel Gilman, he will deem it advisable to eschew the Caucasian female in the future. After Miss Gilman got all the notoriety possible out of the publication, her friends induced her to testify in an interview for the press that she was not guilty. She blamed it on her press agent, accusing him of having stolen the letters out of her dressing-room. How plausible! But dear Mabel forgot to tell us the name of the infamous wretch. Didn't she think it worth while exposing a scoundrel who would not only commit such a theft but also hold her up to obloquy and expose the private affairs of the unfortunate Oriental?

A Sensational "Call Down"

If all musical artists had the courage of Rose Relda the bad manners of people who strut up the aisle in the middle of a number or engage in conversation during a song would not so frequently occasion complaint. Miss Relda was singing the other day, at a luncheon in the Palace hotel, given by Mrs. Joe Loewe, when one of the guests began to chatter in a lively way. Miss Relda stopped in the middle of her song and announced that she would resume when the lady (mentioning her name) finished what she had to say. It was a sensational "call down" and is causing almost as much discussion in Jewish social circles as the faux pas of Mrs. I. W. Hellman Jr. on the occasion of a recent luncheon when she seated the prospective mother-in-law of two young people whose engagement was broken off a few months ago.

The Martin Family

The golden spoon of the Walter Martins' girl baby has proved to be too heavy for that fortunate little damsel and her father has had to apply for guardianship over her valuable birthday gifts. Peter Martin will doubtless have the opportunity to do likewise, for the stork is winging his way. Mrs. Eleanor Martin can be counted upon to do something equally handsome for the expected addition to her family and the Oelrichs connections ought to prove as generous as the Scott family.

Richest Man in the World

Very few Californians know, perhaps, that Alfred Beit, "the only billionaire in the world," who is reported to be dying in South Africa, has part of his universal grip on our mother lode up in Mariposa county. Such is the fact, however, and Herman Bonn, his representative, told me a lot about this unique personage the other day. Beit may not be a billionaire, he explained, because fortunes in such bulk are almost impossible to calculate with exactness, but he is certainly the richest man in the world and that means the richest man in history. His Mariposa holdings, although they are rich, are among the smallest pennies in his pocket. He owns a very large share of the biggest gold mines in South Africa, besides gold and silver mines in Siberia, Korea and South America, a big interest in the Anaconda mine and controlling interests in electric railway systems in South Africa, Mexico, Chile and Portugal, big copper interests also in Rhodesia. He is the biggest owner of diamonds and diamond mines in the world. Since the death of Cecil Rhodes he is practically the whole De Beers company. In 1895 he had only a part of these vast holdings, yet even then he was accounted one of the richest men in the world. At that time the Boer war came along and sent his fortune jumping by the millions. He studied that situation from a speculator's standpoint, and of all the men in the world he was in the best position to take advantage of it.

Known as "The Silent Man"

To look at Beit with his soft blonde hair, mild gray eyes and gentle appearance, one would never suspect that he had the brain capacity, the resourcefulness and the physical force to win even an entrance to the great contests where he shines so conspicuously. His small frame of medium stature makes him appear almost insignificant. This impression is increased by his shy and diffident manner. Among his associates he is known as a silent man, for he won't talk unless it is absolutely necessary. He carries his fifty years well. His great fad is art. His picture gallery in his London residence is ranked as one of the very best private collections in the world and the collection of Louis Seize furniture with which the house is appointed is conceded to be unequaled.

His Aladdin-Like Career

As in the case of his remarkable partners, Rhodes and Barnato, the fate that led Beit to Africa reads like a paragraph from the Arabian Nights. He was about twenty-two years old at the time and was holding down an office stool in the small store of his father, who was struggling to build up a trade in mining machinery with South Africa. One day the toe of a naked Hottentot kicked up a shining pebble on a desolate field in Griqualand. It was the first diamond found on what afterwards proved to be the richest and biggest diamond fields in the world. A little while after this event young Beit was pulled off his stool by his father and despatched to Griqualand to poke up such mines as were delinquent in paying their bills for machinery. Like the rest of the procession going that way in 1875 he trekked behind an ox team into Kimberly. But he was an astute lad and he quickly realized that out of the chaotic conditions in mining then existing great returns were to be had. Diamonds were thrown on the market hap-hazard by the reckless miners and prices quickly tumbled. Beit saw that the glutted market must be properly handled. Rhodes came along about the same time and worked on the same scheme. Both men were business rivals for years but in the day of the great combination they went in together on the big De Beers company, with its forty million dollars capital, paying six million dollars in annual dividends, besides princely salaries. That great consolidation was in fact the beginning of the vast fortunes of Beit, Rhodes and Barnato. Once those fortunes were assured they began to drift apart, each one following his singular career. Barnato's led to suicide from the deck of an ocean steamer; Rhodes began to crystallize his dreams of empire-building and started the Boer war, and Beit, being a business man purely, went determinedly on piling up his colossal fortune. Of all the astonishing things that fecund South Africa has furnished this world, not the least is the trio of remarkable characters, Barney Barnato the speculator, Cecil Rhodes, the empire-builder, and Alfred Beit, the fortune-builder.

This cold weather, grip is warded off by taking Chapin & Gore's whiskies.

He—I hope you are not thinking of getting married.

She—No. I think a woman can have a much better run for her money when absolutely free.

The Bishop's Step-Son

A young officer, well-known at the Presidio where he was stationed, and who is now cutting a wide swath in Washington society, is Robert Stirling Clark, the step-son of Bishop Potter. Lieutenant Clark has millions in his own right and was a great pet with the McKittricks and General Shafter, who always gave him soft berths. When Mrs. McKittrick and General Shafter were in the East last spring they were guests at the Clark-Potter wedding. Young Mr. Clark gave a small entertainment in Washington recently that cost thirty thousand dollars.

"How do you account for the recent unprecedented rush of gay bachelors to the altar?"

"Modern man has a longing for creature comforts, and he knows no better way to achieve them than by offering himself as a willing victim at the altar."

Oelrichs Escaped Him

Captain Ward Jackson, of the Imperial Yeomanry in Great Britain, is rumored in New York as being engaged to one of the Ogden Mills twins. He has been entertained a great deal by the Mills family and encourages the report. Captain Jackson was out here about three months ago and brought letters to many prominent people. Downey Harvey entertained him and introduced him to his friends, but Hermann Oelrichs fled from him day and night. He knew that Captain Jackson had letters to him and no one could induce him to walk on the same side of the street with the Britisher for fear the latter would present the letters. The British officer remained but a few weeks and was not overwhelmed with attention.

The Cheyneys are Happy

The Samuel Cheyneys have a baby and they are very happy. Mrs. Cheyney was Bessie Wall, the pianist, and when she married Mr. Cheyney, the mining man, everybody said it was a brave thing for her to do, because of the breach-of-promise case in which the bridegroom had recently figured. But Miss Wall married him in spite of it, and has not regretted the step.

The Woes of Kipling

Mr. Rudyard Kipling is having a lot of trouble lately. He aroused the indignation of the members of the Ladies' Relief Society of Oakland because he would not grant them permission to use his verse in compiling a Kipling calendar. True, he explained why it was impossible for him to grant such permission, but as there is no such word as "impossible" in Oakland dictionaries, Mr. Kipling was misunderstood and denounced. But the indignation of the Oakland ladies concerned the poet much less than did a decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, which decided against him the other day, in a suit against a publishing firm for "infringement of copyright and trademark and unfair competition." The firm had purchased his works from his authorized agents and published them in a special edition, the volumes bearing on the cover an elephant's head enclosed in a circle. The author contended that this badge was his trademark. The court found that as he had not registered the trademark it could not protect his works, and then their Honors in obiter dictum rebuked Mr. Kipling for describing his works as mere merchandise. They said: "The proposition that an author can protect his writings by a trademark is unique and, at first blush, seems somewhat startling. It is certainly offensive to the esthetic and poetic taste to place such poems as the 'Recessional' and 'The Last Chantey' in the same category with pills and soap, to be dealt in as so much merchandise."

"Who is that richly dressed girl with the sunken eyes, the high cheek bones and the conspicuous mouth?"

"That's Miss Debutante, whose classic features are the subject of constant comment in the gush columns of the daily Hot Air."

Miss Morton's Luck

Many people in this city will be glad to hear that Levi P. Morton has at last decided to do something for his talented young Californian cousin, Charlotte Morton. Miss Morton's father was Joseph Morton, a cousin, and at one time business partner of Levi P. Morton. When the Eastern firm dissolved Joseph Morton came to San Francisco and engaged in the brokerage business. But Dame Fortune preferred to stay behind with cousin Levi P., and though Joseph Morton made charming social connections out here he could not handle his business affairs successfully and failed. He had married a Southern California girl and they had two children when the business crash came. Mr. Morton died shortly afterwards and his little family went to the grandparent's ranch in Southern California. Little Charlotte early developed a bird-like voice and was given all the musical advantages the South could afford. Later she came to San Francisco to study and sang in one of the churches here. People took her up socially, but she wanted a wider field than society affords, and like dozens of other ambitious girls went on to New York where she joined the Castle Square Opera Company. But her ambition is grand opera, and so she informed her rich cousin. Mr. Morton told her that his favorite singer was Madame Nordica and that she was his personal friend beside. He said Nordica's was the only opinion he valued and if the prima donna pronounced his young cousin's voice worth cultivating for grand opera he would send her to Europe and bear the expense. Madame Nordica was enthusiastic about Charlotte Morton's voice, so she leaves shortly for Paris with a snug check signed by Cousin Levi P. Morton to smooth out the wrinkles in her venture.

Another "Perhaps"

Therese Morgan had scarcely set foot on San Francisco soil when the gossips had her engaged to Norris Davis. Before she left for Paris, it was Jack Wilson, the freshly made grass-widower, with whom her name was coupled. Before that, when Miss Morgan was taking painting lessons of Theodore Wores, They said she was engaged to the artist. It takes only a smile and a bow from a girl to a man nowadays to make them "epris" if not "engaged." Norris Davis is a nice boy and about Miss Morgan's age. He is a son of Horace Davis and his grandfather was Thomas Starr King, the famous Unitarian divine. Miss Morgan is a wholesome looking girl, tall and blonde and well built. She is rich, too, her father, the late W. P. Morgan, having amassed a fortune in trade.

Too Much Meddling

By his interference in Utah's Senatorial election President Roosevelt established a bad precedent. There is a tradition which inhibits the President from interfering with the prerogative of a State to elect its representatives in the Senate. Yet it appears that he was not only opposed to he election of Reed Smoot by the Legislature of Utah, but sent a message to that gentleman to the effect that there was no objection to him personally or to his religious faith, but that the election of an apostle of the Mormon church would arouse opposition and inject an unfortunate question into national politics. The President also sent word to the Republican caucus advising against the election of an apostle to the United States Senatorship. Mr. Roosevelt is doing too much meddling. Perhaps Smoot should not have been elected, for though not a practicing polygamist he is a high officer in the Mormon church whose influence encourages polygamy. Nevertheless the Senate is the judge of his qualifications, and the principle of non-interference by the President in a Senatorial contest is one that should not be violated.

Hillis's Latest Sermon

Rev. Dwight Hillis is having his fling at the outpouring of books. He has to do something sensational to hold his job, for the kind of congregation that patronizes Plymouth church needs plenty of pepper and spice in its pulpit discourses. Rev. Hillis predicts that in the near future books can be bought for fifteen cents. "Then God help us! I sometimes think that the only hope for society is to get all the authors in a corner and shoot them for a generation, till we could assimilate what we already have." As Hillis has published a number of books himself, there may be a flavor of sour grapes in his utterance. On the supposition that people must buy printed sheets, independent of a preference for what they contain, if other authors were out of the way his own productions might, in his estimation, stand a better chance; or perhaps he is thinking that when books in general fall to fifteen cents, his own particular contributions will need the gift of a diamond ring or an automobile to make them go at all. So far as all this sentimental regret of lack of time to "assimilate what we already have" is concerned, it is a simple question of inclination. If people want to read history, biography, science, exploration, poetry, or even select fiction, there is no reason why they should not do so. No one is under the least obligation or necessity to attempt to read all the fiction that appears in the course of any day, week, month or year. No one is so foolish as to make the attempt. There is more need today to offer up fervent supplications to God to save us from irreverent, sensational and egotistical pulpit-pounders than from books, even the worst of them.

He Collected Rare Jades

Heber Bishop, who died in New York last week, had the finest collection of jades in the world. He was one of New York's best known art patrons and an active trustee of the Metropolitan Museum. A few years ago at Tiffany's was shown the fine green cylindrical vase that Mr. Bishop bought from the Heard collection. Mr. Heard, a Boston tea merchant, secured it on a visit to China. It is one of the largest pieces of jade ever seen in this country and was designed as a lantern. With a taper within the jade it varies in hue between green and white, showing deep carvings of Oriental garden scenes. Mr. Bishop's specimens of the rare "cabbage green" jade are beautiful and cannot be duplicated. He had a craze for jade and visited auction rooms and private sales with view of adding to his collection. In the Metropolitan Museum, in a Louis Quinze room copied faithfully in detail after the drawing-room in Mr. Bishop's house, are kept his jades.

Thought the Ring Significant

Mabel Cluff departed for Europe just as the gossips were beginning to speculate as to when her engagement with Mr. Avery McCarthy would be announced. Somebody discovered that she was wearing a seal ring which had formerly ornamented one of Mr. McCarthy's digits, and thereupon it was remarked that their devotion to each other warranted the suspicion that an engagement was on the tapis.

The Combination Nuisance

It was a great shock to the ladies of the California Club to be told the other day that they beg patronage for musical and elocutionary trivialities instead of doing things that people want done; also, that begging is a career with many of them, who practice philanthropy in the hope of achieving social position. Yet there was a great deal of truth in what was said to them. We could tolerate the philanthropic beggars who crave social prestige if they refrained from doubling up with the perpetrators of the musical and elocutionary trivialities. The trouble is that frequently when the social climbers undertake to raise money for sweet charity they invoke the co-operation of the ambitious amateurs who otherwise would find it difficult to exploit their mediocrity.

Mrs. Atherton's Prediction

Gertrude Atherton is not satisfied with being merely a clever novelist. Ever since she sat in the gallery of the Senate at Washington to see the legislative wheels go round and incidentally to gather a few pointers for a story of life at the capital, she has longed to discuss political questions and familiarize herself with topics of interest to statesmen. In a recent issue of Harper's Weekly there appeared a letter from her in which she says: "That our eighty millions of population—who will not be long in reaching a more formidable figure still—with their millions of foreigners and negroes, their increasingly complex national character, their genius for unexpected developments, will in the course of a few years compel an overhauled Constitution, is as sure as that the old order of Presidents came to an end with McKinley." Evidently Mrs. Atherton thinks that it is an easy matter to mutilate the Constitution. There are other people who appear to entertain the same opinion. They have lost sight of the fact that the United States Supreme Court is doing business at the old stand.

Her Anomalous Costume

When little Mrs. Jack Spreckels went to the dinner dance given for her Monday evening last she wore one of the most beautiful chiffon frocks ever seen in this city. It was a symphony of white lace, chiffon and shirring, and in her hair waved a white beplumed aigrette fully six inches long. It reminded one of the feathers that women wear when they are presented at the British court. In view of the sumptuousness of the frock the wrap was somewhat of a sartorial solecism, especially as she is the bride of a millionaire-to-be. It was a short full gray cloth coat extending scarcely below her waist, and she carried in her hannds the pretty squirrel muff of which she is so fond.

One More Obstruction

The proposed Safety Station to be erected by the Merchants' Association in front of Lotta's Fountain will certainly be an ornament to society, as the old lady said of Niagara Falls. It is of course the plain duty of the United Railroads to run their cars on flexible tracks so that the gripmen could turn into the curb whenever a citizen waved a green cotton umbrella. But since the haughty octopus scorns the flexible rail, the Merchants' Association, wherein is the concentrated wisdom of our commercial community, deems it advisable to increase the number of obstructions at Kearny and Market streets. It has been the popular impression that the fountain and the turn-table were quite enough, but the Merchants' Association insists on having another.

A Young Widow

Colonel George Macfarlane's flying trip from Honolulu was made, I understand, with view to talk business with Edward Macfarlane's young widow, who lives at the California hotel. Their romantic marriage, with the sad sequel of the bridegroom's death in Chicago when the honeymoon had scarcely begun, will be remembered. The Honolulu courts made the widow a good allowance pending the settlement of her husband's estate. In a few years, when the estate is entirely settled, Mrs. Macfarlane will be a rich woman.

Her Inevitable Luck

A rather odd accident happened to Mrs. John Stroufe Merrill and her baby the other day, and it was only a kind fate that averted more serious injury. Mrs. Merrill had been to call on her mamma-in-law with her little one, and was waving good-bye from the carriage window. Without warning the door, carelessly fastened, blew open and mother and child were precipitated to the sidewalk. Olive Snider always had the gift of doing everything quickly and gracefully, and she picked herself and baby up before Mrs. Merrill Sr. could fly to the rescue. It was found that save a trifle of damage to the young mother's gown and baby's coat nothing serious had happened.

A Typical Bohemian

Though every one predicted that Orrin Peck would stay in Mexico indefinitely, the dolce far niente being his ideal of an existence, he is back in town again. Peck is almost as indolent in his art as Joullin and paints only when stern necessity beckons. I have heard that three years ago he started to paint the portrait of a society woman, and that the work is still in embryo.

After the Ball

Though few of the legislators' wives, daughters, sisters, cousins and aunts extracted any enjoyment from the inaugural ball, toward morning another set of dancers had a much more jovial time. As gray dawn peeped in at the doors, and the crowd thinned out, the colored waiters invited their dark-hued friends. All the darktown belles and beaux rollicked and danced and consumed the remains of the supper. They enjoyed themselves hilariously and the inaugural ball, which opened in the usual dull way, certainly had a lively ending.

Miss Church's Engagement

Miss Gertrude Church, whose engagement with Charles Francis Jackson was formally announced this week, is a young woman of rare mental culture. When she made her debut, eight odd years ago, she did not care for the social whirl and soon dropped out of it. It was shortly after her return from Europe that her engagement was announced with a Boston man of lineage and wealth, but this affair was later broken off. Miss Church is a half-sister of Miss Edith Buckingham, who is one of the active workers in the First Unitarian church. Aurelius and George Buckingham, both of whom married heiresses of the city, are their brothers.

At the Knickerbocker last Wednesday, a tea was given by the Misses Mary and Louise Harrington, complimentary to Miss Keith, sister of Mrs. Daniel H. Kane. There were about fifty guests.

Well Fitted by Experience to Write

Miss Fanny Reed, who has written a book about Americans abroad, is not the "American girl in Paris" that Madame La Bavarde fancies her. At least, she may only be called a "girl" by a wide stretch of courtesy. Miss Reed is a maiden of discreet years and is a sister of the late Charles Reed of California and Mrs. Paran Stevens, who up to the time of her death was a social arbitre of New York. There are few women so competent to write about Americans abroad as is Miss Reed, who in her capacity of chaperon and coach in London, Paris and Vienna has met with all sorts and conditions of her countrymen and women. Her social influence brings her in a good income. At first, I am told by a San Franciscan lately returned from Paris, Miss Reed accepted only jewels and bric-a-brac for her services in introducing moneyed Americans to the elite of European capitals. Later on, however, she agreed to accept cheques instead.

Mackay's English Fortune

I am told that the English court officials were sadly disappointed over the estate left by J. W. Mackay in "the right little, tight little island." Over there, you know, the government gains a revenue by imposing a death duty on all estates. It seems the Exchequer employes figured that the wealthy Californian would leave within their reach an estate worth at least twelve million five hundred thousand dollars. Instead of that all that was sworn in for probate was seven thousand six hundred and eighty-five dollars, gross in the United Kingdom, and three hundred and fifty dollars real and personal in the United States. The remainder of his estate was stated in his will to be the community property of Mrs. Mackay and himself. All of which has led this "Exchequer man" to remark, crabbedly, that the claims of wealth made by the rich men in America are very much overestimated. "In fact, common report about other people's money is curiously untrustworthy. The credulity of people generally about stories of wealth is unbounded. So far as a careful student of wealth statistics can form an opinion, the number of people in the United States worth five hundred thousand dollars each is not likely to be greater than the number of those in the United Kingdom worth the same sum each. Figures in American fortunes greatly inflate in crossing the water to this side." Shades of Morgan, have our trust magnates stopped working long enough to give the people on the other side of the pond time enough to catch up?

"She appears to be at ease in society."

"Yes, her manners certainly have the repose that marks the newly rich of San Francisco."

The Haunted Blythe Building

The artists and musicians who have occupied studios for many years in the Blythe building, at the corner of Grant avenue and Geary, have had to move. The big building having been leased by a Market street firm, all the tenants were given notice to quit, and they were not long in vacating the premises. Some years ago many representatives of San Francisco's bohemian element made their headquarters in the building, and they imparted to it a little of the atmosphere of the Parisian Latin Quarter. One of the last studios to be deserted was that of Miss Eleanor Connell, the well-known vocal teacher, who when she was not engaged with her pupils frequently entertained with chafing-dish parties. Some of the old tenants recall that a ghost once infested the old building. It was the ghost of an artist who was somewhat of a recluse and who disappeared in one of the dark corridors and startled a young woman. After that frequent were the reports of the reappearance and the vanishing of the alleged spirit.

Our Historic Homes

What an interesting article could be written on the vicissitudes of some of the older and, in their time, the handsomest homes of San Francisco's early day elite. Take for instance the one known as the Barnes house in Sutter street. When it was built by James Otis, a former mayor of this city, it was regarded as one of the most imposing in San Francisco. The entertainments given therein ran the gamut from "small and early" dances to brilliant balls and gorgeous banquets given to visiting dignitaries. It was at one of the Otis dances that the engagement of Major Jared L. Rathbone and Miss Alejandra Atherton was announced. A dinner was given to celebrate the betrothal of Mr. Otis's niece, Helen, and Mr. S. G. Bigelow. After the Otis regime the house was the home for many years of General W. H. L. Barnes and family, but now it is being utilized for offices of doctors, lawyers and other business men. Another old home replete with interest to the old set is the one in Harrison street where the family of Thomas H. Selby resided, as far back as 1854. It boasted the first ballroom attached to a private house and was the scene of many gay functions. Iwakura, the Japanese Ambassador, was entertained there with his party, and there took place the wedding of Mr. Selby's daughters—Clara with Jackson Ralston, and Cornelia with Captain (now Admiral) Louis Kempff, U. S. N. Perhaps the saddest change is in the old home of California's first Senator, William M. Gwin, in Jackson street near Stockton. It was one of the finest homes in the city while the Gwins held high revel therein, and even later when Dr. H. H. Toland and his family resided there. It is now a Chinese wash house.

At every smart function, a Manila correspondent writes, are present Lieutenant and Mrs. Roosevelt. They have hosts of friends in the Island capital. Mrs. Roosevelt was Eleanor Morrow. She is the daughter of Judge Morrow and her marriage with President Roosevelt's cousin was an event of about two years ago.

Merely a Reminder

Now that the dailies are having conniption fits over the efforts of Mr. Hill to divert the transport business from San Francisco to Seattle, I should like to remind them that when they rejoiced some weeks ago over Mr. Harriman's alleged victory in the contest with the northern railroad man, I endeavored to demonstrate that it was Mr. Hill and not Harriman that scored the victory. Recent developments have borne out the view expressed in these columns regarding the strategy of the Northern magnate.

The Poet

Oh, the night was so perfect, the music, the flowers,
The nooks that we found and the nymph laden bowers,
With Cupid to smile, and Bacchus to grin
And we kissed and we kissed and we reveled in sin.
When the morn came I reeled in debaucher's despair
To the door left unbarred, just one whiff of the air
And the hay scented fields I was off and away.
(Yet) afar down the road I paused by the way
(The sun had peeped up streaking gold through the skies,
The owl out all night in great shame closed his eyes.)
God must have smiled at my poet's assurety
As my soul sang an ode to the goddess of purity.

A Curtain Raiser

Eugene I—What means this treason on the part of Caitiff Casey?

Prime Minister Abe—My lord, I know not why he kicked over the traces. Perhaps he thought we should have consulted him before making that deal with the Chief of Police.

Eugene I—Ignoble ingrate! Zounds, why did I appoint such a man to office?

P. M. Abe—To please the Labor Unions, my liege.

Eugene I—And who are they?

P. M. Abe—Dost thou not remember them? They were thy constituents once.

Eugene I—A plague upon them! A plague upon Casey! Ah, woe is me, that I should ever have sought to win their wretched favor. But I must have the patronage of that Health Department, and to that end I'll mow down thorns that would annoy my feet.

P. M. Abe—My lord, we must go slow or else the people will discover our purpose. We have conspired with the enemies of Labor in a deal whereby we hope to achieve much political profit and other things. We must pretend that we are actuated by a high civic duty. Therefore we should not goad the Casey to anger.

Eugene I—True, Abraham, I did forget. The deed should appear meritorious. Thou art a cautious knave, my brave counselor. By the way, didst get permission from the Supervisors to move the Franklin fountain?

P. M. Abe—Thanks to thy knightly offices, yes, my lord.

Eugene I—Fie on thanks from such a noble subject who didst skill me in the arts of the crafty politician. If thou shouldst want the copper dome of this City Hall, good Abraham, thou shalt have it.

P. M. Abe—Perhaps I shall yet remind my liege of that promise. Meanwhile I am content, for my gracious sovereign has invested me with unlimited power wherewith I have much fattened my purse.

Eugene I—Ours has indeed proved a valuable partnership. But dost think we are fooling all the people?

P. M. Abe—All of them?

Eugene I—Yes, all of them.

P. M. Abe—Nay, my lord. not all of them.

Why She Hesitated

It was a great shock to Ernest who had always regarded Miss Recluse as an unsophisticated maiden. If he were not a confirmed bachelor he would have thought of her for a wife. She was somewhat unconventional and always merry with a dash of dare-deviltry in her nature, but he had always regarded her as a mere child, and she had known him so long that she looked upon him as a guardian. It was therefore quite natural for her to discuss with him the subject of her engagement to Romper. He listened with much interest, and he really regretted that such a pure, innocent creature should bestow herself upon a hardened man of the world. He knew that Romper was a man of many love affairs; that he was the gayest blade in the Bohemian Club, but he didn't like to appear as a knocker. He suggested that a man often turned over a new leaf when he married.

Miss Recluse sighed. "Oh, I know he loves me," she said, "but some men have habits that inspire one with antipathy."

"If he loves you," said Ernest, "you could persuade him to stop drinking and smoking. And if you love him you can tolerate misdemeanors."

"Some things are intolerable," she said with a sigh.

"Of course a moral blot cannot be overlooked," Ernest admitted.

"It isn't a moral blot that I object to," she hastened to remark. And she blushed so deeply that Ernest enthused over the chaste picture.

"I should like to advise you," he said. "But you must confide in me."

"I want to, but—" and she blushed again.

"Surely you are not afraid to confide in me," he urged, placing his hand tenderly on her shoulder.

"I dislike to tell you," she faltered, and her big blue eyes had a shy expression. "But perhaps you know whether it is possible to cure such a habit."

"What habit?" he asked.

"He snores in his sleep."

Ernest collapsed. —The Rounder.

To the Rescue

[illegible] ing places of the art students of San Francisco, but morally the quarter is much cleaner than any college town—which is contrary to public belief. Certainly the average art student lives in the hallucination that he is a very wicked person indeed, but fortunately it is merely hallucination. Those moral man-traps of the fables, the models, are very ordinary females in this Quartier. But this is a tale of exceptions.

Ford and I occupied one of the most picturesque, that is to say, dingy, studios in the district. He could draw but I could not, which fact I realized later.

The Pup moved into the studio opposite. I called him the Pup because he was an extremely self-satisfied youngster and I dubbed him from the first. Du Maurier was his bible and he was not contented with the make-up alone, as most of our art students are; he wanted some genuine iniquity. This is easily found anywhere.

In a few weeks' time the studio had another occupant whom I cordially disliked. She was the most attractive of the models who posed in the Quartier. When Ford heard of this scandalous proceding he said that something must be done.

I agreed that it was unpleasant to dwell beside a crying indecency (I grinned over that expression), but said also that I declined to take up rescue work for worthless little puppies who made fun of my drawing.

Ford became serious. "I know his people," he said, "and this thing must be stopped."

"Have them arrested as public nuisances," I suggested.

"I wish that you wouldn't be an imbecile." Ford was becoming annoyed.

"I tell you that I must stop this thing, for his people's sake."

"For the sake of which member of his family?" I inquired, watching his face narrowly.

Ford blushed, and that blush was eloquent. I whistled and he called me names.

"Well, if you insist," I began, "in spite of the most indelibly true axiom that 'a fool must follow his natural bent'—"

"Yes, I do insist," Ford said decisively.

"This is the best plan I can devise, then," I said. "The Pup is a vain little beast and he don't care a rap for 'Rox' (that was her name, an abbreviation of peroxide). She must be decoyed over here for a few days. Then the incident will be closed."

"Will you do the decoying?" he asked, to my amazement.

I drew myself up in virtuous indignation, but he only laughed. "I can't. There is a feud between Rox and me," I replied.

He knitted his brows for awhile. "Well, I suppose I will have to be the victim," he said with a sigh. "You can find a place to stay for a few days, I suppose."

"Of course. But remember that it is unwise to interfere with a fool. 'He must follow his natural bent.'"

"Oh, go away," he said, and I went to Pete's. Pete painted fish until they became odorous, then he cooked them, consequently I was very much pleased when Ford came for me three days later.

"Is the rescue effected?" I asked.

"Yes. Confound the whole business. Come home."

I said good bye to Pete and we went back to our studio together. Rox had not yet been requested to depart—that pleasant task Ford reserved for me—but she was temporarily absent. There was a letter for Ford under the door and he tore it open. I went to the other end of the place so that he might read it in peace. When I returned his face was a very rich shade of gray and he was staring at the bit of paper with wild eyes.

"What is it?" I gasped in alarm.

He laughed, a grating laugh that frightened me. "A letter of thanks," he replied, and passed it over to me.

I read, "I have been mistaken in you. I never want to see or hear of you again." This was signed "E. H.," and written on tinted paper from which I could evolve some clew to the author. It was extremely concise for a girl's letter.

"The miserable pup! The contemptible little cur!" was all that I could say at the time.

Ford shrugged his shoulders. "You were right in the first instance," he said, "'A fool must follow his natural bent,' and it is unwise to interfere."

"Can't anything be done, or explained?" I asked, hopelessly.

Ford's laugh was terrible to hear and I saw the horribly grotesque impossibility of the thing.

"At any rate," I thought, "there will be an atom of satisfaction in giving Rox her walking papers and I would kick the Pup when I met him."

"You'd better go back to Pete's," said Ford, abruptly.

"I am not going to leave you alone, now," I said resolutely.

"I want to be alone," he said quietly.

"What do you mean?"

"Rox," he said, shortly.

I gave vent to my feelings in words that cannot be written.

"When a man is in the quicksands, he feels a desire to rush beneath the surface as rapidly as possible," observed Ford, unmoved.

"Quicksands!" I cried with all the scorn I could put into my voice.

"Well—muck, then," he admitted. "'A fool must follow his natural bent,' you know."

"I won't let you," I said firmly.

"I don't see how you can prevent it," he said, in an aggressive tone, and I knew that it was final.

As I walked toward the door there was a patter of feet in the hallway and Rox brushed past me as I strode indignantly through the doorway. I hurried down stairs into the clean, open air.

Love Resurgent

Forth from the ashes of Hope,
  Girded with strength like the hair
Of the Samson, arisen to cope
  With chimeras of Death and Despair,—

Mount, Love—like a militant star
  Burn with pale glare through thy night!
The clouds that bemantled thee are
  As shadows dissolved by thy light.

Winged by the Soul and the Mind,
  Spurred by the stroke of the Heart,
Where shalt thou seek or where find
  Thy mate—thy counterpart?

Thou art a fragment from Heaven;
  Thou art a spark from its flame;
Thou art all Life and its leaven—
  And God is thy holiest name!

"Credit Where Credit is Due"

The story of the serpent has a moral rarely preached,
Though we know he did much evil (which was really very sad)
Yet he taught Eve to be modest, for she made a gown of leaves,
Which goes to prove that none of us is ever wholly bad.

He Had Enough

"What's your hurry; don't you know there's another act?" he asked, just as his friend started to leave the theatre.

"Yes, that's why I'm going," was the reply.

Comic Opera Once More

The Tivoli has returned to comic opera and the music lovers of San Francisco should be grateful for that. It is refreshing after a protracted diet of musical imbecilities to be regaled with caviare of the genuine blown-in-the-bottle Gilbert and Sullivan brand. Tivoli patrons have been gorged with musical comedy of the style that the harrysmiths of New York reel off on industrious typewriters for the delectation of the effete Johnnies of Broadway. They are nothing more than a conglomeration of horse-play gags and jingle tunes. They are satisfactory to the unregenerate of Gotham who go to the Metropolitan when they want to hear music and voices and to the Casino and kindred playhouses when they want to see the heroines of the latest scandals and the sweethearts of the Wall street brokers. As San Francisco has not a sufficient number of frisky brokers to constitute a paying clientele for a well regulated playhouse the Tivoli should stick to legitimate opera. That its patrons rejoiced in the return to old favorites was evident Monday night, when the audience remained to applaud after the fall of the final curtain. And yet the Tivoli has given much better performances of "The Mikado." The management having permitted the company to fall to the level of "The Idol's Eye," could not be expected, immediately upon the revival of comic opera, to be equipped for a production equal to some of the historical achievements that have made the Tivoli famous all over the country. Yet the audience Monday night was so enthusiastic over the revival that it wotted not of tradition. They were once more in the Gilbertian atmosphere, and they listened to the Sullivan music which so artistically blends with the Oriental theme, and they thought not of other Ko-Kos or of other little maids. The production is an elaborate one, and the stage pictures are as charming as ever. The Ko-Ko of Edward Webb was too much of the farce comedy type to please Gilbertian enthusiasts who are quite sure that Gilbert's ideas cannot be improved upon. Oscar Lee, the Nanki-Poo, has such a charming speaking voice that it is to be regretted that he did not content himself with giving the minstrel song as a recitation. He tried to sing it and failed. Carrie Roma's Katisha from the vocal standpoint was an artistic feature as was also the Pooh-Bah of Arthur Cunningham. Ferris Hartman confined his efforts to the role of the Mikado, presenting himself in a remarkable make-up that gave him the appearance of an affluent shopkeeper from the New York Ghetto. Annie Meyers was the most vivacious of the little maids.

French Farce at the Alcazar

The work of translating Carre and Bilhaud's farce "My Daughter-in-Law" has been so well done that all the Gallic lightness and crispness have been retained. A large audience laughed itself into the best of humors over the amusing dialogue on Monday night and applauded the not less amusing situations. While I still hold "Never Again" the banner French farce of Alcazar history, "My Daughter-in-Law" is quite as clever in its less rollicking way. It is more on the society order, the scenes being laid in French flats, and the plot hinging on the entrance of a new daughter-in-law into a family circle dominated by a tyrannical mamma-in-law. Marie Howe plays the mother-in-law with amusing emphasis, and George Osbourne is the timid husband. Ernest Hastings as the husband is strikingly French and thoroughly enters into the farcical spirit. Albert Morrison, Clifford Dempsey, Walter Bacon, Frank Bacon and Adele Belgarde all have character parts which they carry out excellently to the detail. Oza Waldrop is the vivacious little maid and is charming, except as to her skirts; this pretty little soubrette looks better in long petticoats. Alice Treat Hunt, the new leading lady, quickly succeeded in pleasing the audience. She grasps the spirit of the role, the daughter-in-law, as a born comedienne. She was fully at home in her new surroundings, and her easy, natural manner, beauty and grace at once impressed. So seldom does a new addition to a company succeed in pleasing on her first appearance that Miss Hunt's success is the more noteworthy. Her part, of course, is a light one, but old actors say that it takes more experience and intelligence for a French farce part than for a heavy emotional one. The spirit of French farce is vivacity and rapidity of speech, combined with distinctness so that the wit will not be lost. One of the cleverest scenes in this farce is where the young wife is enjoying a supper solo when her husband enters, followed at intervals by all the mother-in-law's guests. It is in this act that the possession of the true farce spirit in the actors asserts itself.

A Juvenile Prima Donna

Though Columbia patrons are familiar with "Princess Chic" they were interested in the new prima donna, Vera Michelena, daughter of Fernando Michelena, the once popular tenor. It is unusual for a sixteen-year old girl to assume the leading role in a company of experienced adults. But Vera Michelena has beauty of face and form and budding talent. Youth, radiant and peach-blowy, is hers and it is refreshing to see so young a girl as prima donna, for a change. As youth and experience do not go together we cannot expect to see a finished actress at seventeen, but with the splendid opportunity Miss Michelena enjoys, as leading woman, we can expect to see her talents develop wonderfully in a few years, for she has plenty of life and sparkle. She sings intelligently, her voice is sweet and it should gather strength with added years. Her sister Beatrice played the soubrette role Estelle on Tuesday night, for the first time, and without a single rehearsal very successfully. She, too, is very pretty and graceful and is only nineteen. Her voice is stronger than her younger sister's and she gave as much promise of success. Walter Lawrence as the duke was interesting. His voice is a fine baritone which he used artistically. Joseph Miron and Fred Bailey were amusing in comedy roles.

At the California

J. C. Crawford as the telescope man is one of the best features of "A Night on Broadway" at the California. He has absolute control over his muscles, and keeps the automaton idea up for fully fifteen minutes without moving an eyelash. This automaton idea has had many imitations since "La Poupee" introduced it to Broadway. It will probably go on for a year or so more until worked out. Some of the songs and dances in the Murray-Mack musical farce are good. The animatoscope idea in one of the ballets is finely carried out, the flickering lights making the spectator as giddy as if looking at the real moving pictures.

Barrymore's Last Scenes

A letter from a friend, who has just visited poor Maurice Barrymore at Amityville, is full of the pathos of his last lines. He is close to the last curtain, and at times, when semi-lucid, he appears to realize his condition. The last days of the brilliant actor are indeed pitiable. He constantly pleads to be taken to Broadway "just for a stroll," and to the Lambs' Club "for one more good time." "Give me another chance," he says, "to see dear old Broadway once again and the women and the good fellows—just once more, before I die."

Injudicious Booming

That Prince of Prevaricators, the merry theatrical press agent, has once more been goldbricking the dear, gullible public. This time he introduces to our notice Miss Theresa Maxwell of the Louis James and Frederick Warde company who, he says, was one of artist Gibson's models for a series of Life pictures. After telling how the artists of New York raved over her beauty he springs an alleged autobiography of the lady in which she expresses the hope that she may live down her studio past and achieve fame as an actress. The easiest way to live it down, I should imagine, would be to prohibit her press agent from writing about it. Nobody in San Francisco knew that she posed for Gibson, so if she preferred to impress us with her talents rather than her shape, why were we told about her experience as a model? Incidentally we were told that she is Mary Anderson's successor. No doubt the press agent flatters himself that he has been earning his salary, but I submit that he should be fired for writing such a palpable fake. Instead of booming Miss Maxwell, who may be a very beautiful and capable actress, he starts her before the San Francisco public with the presumption against her that she has to depend on that sort of coarse work. If she is a talented woman her press agent has done her an injustice.

The Disgruntled Daniels

Little Frank Daniels left town in a very disgruntled mood, vowing that he would never return, and all because of the indifference of Columbia theatre patrons to the charms of "Miss Simplicity." It is a dire and disturbing threat, that of Mr. Daniels for he is really a good comedian notwithstanding his monopolistic tendencies as a star, and his disinclination to share the laughs and applause. But I think we shall see Mr. Daniels again, for it becomes exceedingly monotonous touring the Middle West, and the fact is that he is not a success in New York. "Miss Simplicity" struck a greater frost on Broadway than it encountered in this city, and I have distinct recollection of his making the same complaint in an interview about New Yorkers as he did to Mr. Stevens about San Francisco theatre-goers. For instance, he said that the people of New York came to the theatre when they were filled with a cheap table d'hote dinner, and then refused to be pleased. As Mr. Daniels insists upon being the whole show I should advise him to take to vaudeville and become a monologuist.

McIvor-Tyndall Lectures Attracting Much Attention

There seems to be a sort of "psychological wave" sweeping over the world at the present time. It has struck San Francisco with full force. Every one you meet is talking about "the subconscious mind"; the "dual personality of man"; "thought-waves" and that sort of thing. The peculiar part of the matter is, that these discussions really are carried on with some degree of understanding of their import. Time was—not so long ago—when such expressions as "thought-waves" meant about as much to the average person as does a Chinese puzzle. Since Dr. McIvor-Tyndall arrived in San Francisco, however, there has been engendered in the hearts of the uninitiated a desire to know something of the theories of the "New Thought." Dr. Tyndall's lectures are attracting large audiences and he succeeds in expounding his théories in a manner graspable by the average intellect. Next Sunday night he will give one of the most interesting of the series of his lectures on these subjects. He will talk on "The Power of Thought"; and in accordance with a universal demand, he will supplement the talk with demonstrations of his remarkable power of receiving thought-waves. The following Sunday night he will give an illustrated lecture on "Palmistry as a Science." Tyndall has collected the palmographs of many of the world's best known men and women and these, with the hands of various abnormal types, will be thrown on the screen with a stereopticon. Among some well-known local hands shown will be those of Governor Pardee and Mayor Schmitz.

A Bit of Portuguese History

One of the pictures shown at Burton Holmes's lecture on "Portugal" was that of a female skeleton dressed in royal robes; by its side a living King, and all about them courtiers bowing to the corpse. The story connected with this picture, as Mr. Holmes told it, is an interesting bit of Portugese historical romance: Don Pedro of Portugal, heir to the throne and afterward called "the Severe," loved a beautiful maiden, Inez de Castro. She was not of royal birth and the King had other plans for his son's future. Dom Pedro, however, loved Inez so passionately that he refused to be parted from her. He bought a luxurious home where they two could live for each other, far from the intrigues and troubles of his father's court. In the garden, o'ershadowed by wepping willows, was a tiny lake whose banks were a favorite resting-place of the lovers. One day when Pedro was absent three men, sent by the King, fell upon Inez as she waited for her lover by the lake and cruelly murdered her. When Dom Pedro learned of the murder his rage knew no restraint and he determined to collect an army and march against his father. Finally, dissuaded against this step, he did nothing to avenge his beautiful Inez's murder until coming to the throne, six years later. As soon as his father died Pedro had the murderers of Inez de Castro tortured in the most fiendish manner. The day he ascended the throne he had Inez's body brought from the tomb, dressed in the robes of state, and seated in the Queen's chair beside him. All the nobles were forced to kneel before the skeleton and kiss the bony hand as though they were paying homage to King Pedro's consort. And this after Inez had laid in the tomb for six years. Their tombs at Aberfaca are facing each other, so that when the trumpet sounds on the judgment day, Pedro and Inez will see each other first of all.

The most delightfully blended whisky known to the human palate—"Jesse Moore"—the standard for over fifty years.

Is Culture a Fad or a Permanency?

It is somewhat of a riddle, by the way, to understand the reason why these Holmes lectures have drawn such packed houses this season. The lectures given in connection with the Henry Miller performances at the Columbia, in 1900, drew but sparse attendance. And I remember the time when lectures by the lights of the Eastern and European platform were delivered to such scant houses that after awhile they ceased to include San Francisco in their itinerary. When Garritt Serviss, the distinguished Bostonian, gave his illustrated lectures the house was only sparsely filled on each occasion. The motion pictures could not be the only drawing card to Mr. Holmes's lectures, for we have the animatoscope at the Orpheum, Chutes and lesser theatres. Nor can the speaker's personality be the magnet for, admirable lecturer as Mr. Holmes is, some of his predecessors had more magnetism, not to speak of wider fame. Yet society people as well as the church and college element, have been present at all the Holmes lectures, with other auditors who as a rule only patronize the lighter theatrical and musical attractions. Perhaps with our added population has come a wider intelligence, a deeper desire for knowledge.

John T. Sullivan, who will shortly greet us at the Orpheum, is well known here, having last visited us with Rose Coghlan, I believe. He has been leading man with Rhea, Booth, Barrett, Mrs. Fiske and other stars. In 1892 Mr. Sullivan organized a company consisting of Charles Coghlan, Rose Coghlan, Robert Tabor, Aubrey Boucicault, Robert Fischer, Thomas Whiffen, Frederick de Belleville, Mrs. D. P. Bowers, Effie Shannon, Sadie Martinot, Maxine Elliott, Louise Thorndyke Boucicault and others of equal reputation. The play was Sardou's famous "Diplomacy" and the revival was very successful.

Amateur "Would-Be's"

Opportunity is everything in stage life, experience one thing and nerve another. It is reported that McKee Rankin is simply deluged with petitions from stage-struck girls, and that he has permitted one, a voluptuous brunette, to essay a role in "Judith." Nance O'Neil's success seems to have inspired more than the average number of "would-be's" to assail the managers. Only occasionally does one succeed in getting her desires gratified.

San Francisco's Rialto was supplied with an interesting bit of news this week by E. D. Stair of the theatrical firm of Stair & Havelin, when he announced that he had perfected arrangements with the Grand Opera House company whereby his firm will do the booking for that theatre seven months each year beginning season after next. Stair & Havelin have established a circuit from New York to this city.

Fay Templeton "takes off" Mary Mannering in the latest Weber and Fields burlesque, "The Stickiness of Gelatine." She has a new song, "I Never Loved a Man So Much as That."

Ned Harrigan, who has been playing in his own plays all his life, made his appearance in New York last week in "The Bird in a Cage," a new play by Clyde Fitch.

Albert Morrison of the Alcazar company gained his experience with Joe Murphy and other Eastern stars. He is a son of Charles Morrison, a local newspaper man.

Edwin Milton Royle and his wife, Selina Fetter Royle, have revived "Friends" this season, and in Salt Lake City the play and players were awarded an ovation.

A full brass band of female musicians will take part in "Hoity Toity" at Fischer's when that burlesque goes on after "Barbara Fidgety."

Aubrey Boucicault is playing in "Heidelberg" a play he adapted from the German. Minnie Dupree and Augustus Cook are in the cast.

Dr. Skidmore is said to be one of the heaviest financial sufferers by the Frawley-Neill company's Manila failure.

George de Long will be at Fischer's in "Hoity Toity." He will have the role Fritz Williams played at Weber & Field's.

Features of Next Week's Bills

A notable production, and one that will attract the critics as well as the public, will be the first production on any stage in English of the great Biblical drama, "Judith," by Nance O'Neil at the Grand tomorrow night. The part of the Israelite maiden who delivered her people from the tyrant, Holofernes, was a favorite of Ristori, and Nance O'Neil is expected to give a powerful portrayal of the part. The costuming and scenery will all be faithful to historical details.

There will be a large house at the Republic tomorrow night to greet Ralph Stuart in the Don-Caesar-de-Basan romantic drama "The Master at Arms." Mr. Stuart is said to be a handsome and clever actor who played two years at the Murray Hill theatre in New York, one year at the American and one at the Republic (now the Belasco). He has brought his own company with him—Frank Camp, who was out here two years ago as leading man with the James Neill company; Edward Poland and Priestly Morrison, late of the Frohman forces, Joseph Eggington, Charles E. Inslee, Mary Horne, Eleanor LaSalle, Celeste Jadwin and Elizabeth Woodward.

The reappearance of Warde and James as twin-stars will mean crowded houses at the Columbia during their engagement. "The Tempest," too, has all the virtue of a novelty. It is one of the Wagenhals-Kemper productions and that means lavish mountings, magnificence in scenery and costumes. Norman Hackett is with the company and the cast as a whole is said to be more than adequate. "Francesca da Rimini" will be the second week's bill.

For the second week of Alice Treat Hunt's engagement at the Alcazar she will appear as Glory Quayle in "The Christian," Ernest Hastings appearing as John Storm and Agnes Ranken and the other members of the company in support. "The Christian" has been given in San Francisco more than once, but it will be interesting to see in what manner Mr. Hastings takes the character of the fanatical lover. "Peaceful Valley," an old favorite, will follow.

"The Mikado" will go another week at the Tivoli, to be followed by "Patience."

They cannot take "Barbara Fidgety" off yet at Fischer's. The piece has too many laughs in it yet. But when the public does tire of it, "Hoity Toity" is ready to go on.

Richard J. Jose has been engaged for another week at the Orpheum, and will sing "Belle Brandon," "With All Her Faults I Love Her Still," and "Sally in Our Alley," in addition to "A Little Boy in Blue," a late song success. The new people will be headed by Filson and Errol in "A Tip on the Derby," a sketch full of action and smiles. Hill and Silvainy will come with a new bicycle act even more thrilling than their former stunts. Sim Collins and Lew Hart, eccentric comedians, will make their San Francisco debut in "Two Strong Men." Morrissey and Rich in "A Breach of Promise," the Garrisons in "A Bit of Nonsense," Fields and Ward, rapid fire talkers, Les Frasettis and the Scotts will be on the bill.

"Down the Flume" is proving a great attraction at the Chutes and every day the boats carrying passengers are taxed to their utmost capacity. —The Playgoer.

Truly Shattuck Queen of Song

When Truly Shattuck concluded her first song at Teddy Marks's Sunday night concert at the New York theatre there was a perfect wave of applause, for her voice had burst upon the big audience as something of a revelation. Two or three years ago Miss Shattuck was widely known as an exceedingly pretty girl with a sweet voice. Sunday night those who had not seen her in a year were surprised. They realized that the pretty girl had developed into a woman of queenly beauty and that her voice had taken on volume, sweetness and expression. It rang in a perfect flood of melody to the farthest part of the theatre, and the roar of applause which swept over the house at the conclusion of the first number nearly swept the singer off her feet. She was trembling like a leaf when she reached the wings. "Hurry back, Truly," said Teddy Marks. "Good heavens, I didn't know it was in you. Why, you've developed into a great lyric prima donna. Give 'em 'Eileen Alana.'" At the conclusion of Miss Shattuck's last number Marks hurried to her to congratulate her and to ask her to sing again at the same theatre on the night of February ninth. On Monday Miss Shattuck will begin a week's engagement at Cleveland. The Eagles, who take a benefit next Sunday night at the New York, are trying to evolve some plan whereby Miss Shattuck may appear prior to her departure for the Western city.—New York American.

The program of the Forum Club Wednesday afternoon was enjoyed by a large audience. Mrs. S. B. Cheek gave a talk on Siam which was very interesting. Mrs. Helene Stone Bishop, a dramatic reader of prominence, was warmly applauded for her masterful rendition of Browning's "Herve Rial." Mrs. Bishop has the necessary qualifications for a successful reader; looks, temperament and magnetism.

An Investment where the Principal is Guaranteed and the Interest Assured

The best investment which while conservative has enormous possibilities, that has made its appearance here in a long time is being offered by the "Gold Producers Trust Company of San Francisco," whose offices are in the Mutual Savings Building, 708 Market street. This new Trust Company was incorporated by well known moneyed men for the purpose of financiering profitable mining propositions, as well as conducting a general banking business, and the opportunity is now offered to secure a limited number of the preferred shares at par, one hundred dollars. What makes this chance worthy of the close investigation of investors is the guarantee in the shape of a ten year bond of one of the oldest, most conservative and best managed Life Insurance companies in America that goes with each share of preferred stock. Contrary to the usual custom, the Gold Producers Trust Company guarantees the principal of subscribers. We should suggest interested parties calling at their office or dropping a postal to the company, when they will receive full and detailed information.

MUSIC

Kopta the Bohemian

Wenzel Kopta, the Bohemian violinist, will give his concerts at Steinway hall next Tuesday night and Friday afternoon, the latter date having been especially selected in order to give the musicians occupied at the theatres an opportunity of hearing this great player in works rarely played and only by the greatest virtuosi on account of the extreme difficulty of the compositions. At his Tuesday night concert Mr. Kopta will play Tartini's sonata, "The Trill of the Devil," Ernst's Hungarian Airs, Paganini's "Witches' Dance" and other interesting numbers, and Miss Gertrude Wheeler, contralto, will sing songs by Secchi, Nevin, Blumenthal, Fisher and Chadwick besides a composition of a young local writer, Mr. Lyle C. True, called "Love me if I live" and composed especially for Miss Wheeler. At the Friday matinee Mr. Kopta's program will include Paganini's Second Concerto with its wonderful "La Campanella," Laub's Concert Polonaise, a group of Sarasate's Spanish Dances and a group of shorter but important works. The vocalist will be Mrs. Belle Haralsan, a dramatic soprano who will make her San Francisco debut on this occasion, and whose numbers will be the aria from the fifth act of Verdi's "Don Carlos" and songs by Chadwick and Lamar. The sale of seats is now open at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, prices seventy-five cents and one dollar, the concerts being given under the Greenbaum direction.

Gabrilowitsch the Russian

When a manager of the standing of Daniel Frohman takes hold of a musical attraction it is safe to consider it a very important one, as the manager of so many large companies and theatres would scarcely bother with it otherwise. Mr. Frohman has thus far handled only two such attractions, the violinist Kubelik, whose tour was the most successful of any ever made in this country, and the young and talented Russian pianist, Ossip Gabrilowitsch. At the concert with the Thomas orchestra in Chicago, the young artist was encored no less than ten times. Mr. Greenbaum has arranged for three concerts in this city, to be given at the Alhambra theatre on Tuesday and Thursday nights, February third and fifth, and Saturday afternoon, February seventh. The theatre will be well heated and made perfectly comfortable. The programs will include many novelties by the new school of Russian composers such as Arensky, Glinka-Balakireff and numbers by the artist himself. The complete programs may be obtained at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, where the sale of seats opens Wednesday morning, January twenty-eighth, at prices from one dollar and a half and one dollar to seventy-five cents. Following Gabrilowitsch comes Zelie de Lussan in song recital.

The Heavyweight Contra Tenor

Richard J. Jose, who is the greatest contra-tenor in this country, came to the Orpheum for a week. His song "The Brotherhood of Man" caught on with such vim that the management has induced him to stay another week. We have heard Jose very often in San Francisco. He has been here in "The Old Homestead," with minstrel companies, in a quartet and by himself in vaudeville, but his voice which is as sweet as ever is always welcome.

After the closing of the Blythe building, Miss Eleanor Connell was compelled to look for a new studio. She is now pleasantly located at the Roosevelt, 546 Sutter street.

Kocian will be here soon under Rudolph Aronson's direction. The Chicagoans gave him an enthusiastic reception.

Rose Relda's Concert

A very large audience greeted Miss Rose Relda on the evening of January sixteenth. There was a great deal of friendly expectancy, as so much has been said of the singer's artistic ability. Her first song (from Lakme) was ill-chosen. It is one of the familiar tests nowadays for a coloratura soprano and Miss Relda's voice has evidently not been trained for florid execution. Moreover, her high notes are very strained and thin. Hence her selections from "Lucia" and "Mignon" were also ill-chosen. Her voice was pleasing in a number by Kjerulf and in two by Bemberg. It is a voice of good quality and Miss Relda produces her tones, except the high ones, intelligently. She has much to learn yet before she will be able to please an audience of musicians in a long recital. Her voice does not exhibit that degree of cultivation one should expect in an organ that has been developed by foreign tutors.

Dr. H. J. Stewart has been fortunate in securing some of the best local talent for his concert at Steinway hall on Tuesday, February third. The following will participate: Sopranos, Miss Alma Berglund, Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup, Mrs. Lily Roeder Apple, Miss Bowen; contraltos, Mrs. J. E. Birmingham, Miss Ella V. McCloskey, Mrs. C. L. Parent, Mrs. M. Fitzgibbon; tenors, Messrs. J. F. Veaco, C. Henley, T. G. Elliott and H. M. Fortescue; basses, Messrs. S. Homer Henley, C. L. Parent, C. B. Stone and Walter Kneiss; violinist, Mr. Nathan Landsberger. With such talent Dr. Stewart's compositions should be heard to advantage.

The fifth musical service at Trinity church will be given tomorrow evening, at eight o'clock. Gaul's oratorio "The Ten Virgins" will be rendered. The soloists will be Miss Millie Flynn and Mrs. Max Warshauer, sopranos, Miss Gertrude Wheeler and Mrs. Nelson Lawrence, contraltos, Mr. Frank Onslow, tenor, and Mr. Otto Wedemeyer, baritone; Louis H. Eaton, organist and director of the choir.

Notwithstanding all the misfortunes that Mascagni encountered since coming to this country he may yet be seen in this city. He signed in New York last week for twenty-five concerts, from New York to this coast.

The next Zech symphony concert will take place at Fischer's on next Thursday afternoon. The program will be: Overture, Coriolanus, Beethoven; Mozart's symphony in G minor; Siegfried Idylle, Wagner; Russian suite (for strings), Wuerst; Miniature overture, Tschaikowsky. —The Music Critic

Quarterly Report from Jos. Greven's Operatic School

In preparation is a complete performance of "Lucia" in historical costumes, scenery, make-up, etc., to be accompanied by well trained amateurs, young ladies and gentlemen of Mr. T. D. Herzog's school orchestra. The stage is under the direction of Mr. J. de Witt, for three seasons stage manager of the Tivoli grand opera company. The operatic performances will take place in the Alhambra or any other available theatre. Every solo part will be studied by two or three pupils of Mr. J. Greven for alternating or substituting purposes: Lucia, Mrs. Lenore Greven and Miss Florence Walbey; Alice, Miss Edna Riecker and Miss Lillian Beanston; Edgar, Mr. John Beatty and Mr. Herman Vockel; Arthur, Mr. J. E. Ericson and Mr. A. J. McAllister; Henri, Mr. Fred Huber and Mr. Joseph Tucker; Raimondo, Mr. E. V. McGinty and Mr. Aug. Meier. These performances will be prepared carefully and directed personally by Mr. Joseph Greven. Miss Zita Fahey and Mr. E. V. McGinty, two advanced students of Mr. Greven, will have an invitational song recital of varied high class concert, sacred and operatic music with Mr. Greven at the piano, in Heine hall on Wednesday, February eleventh. At Steinway hall on Tuesday, February seventeenth will be given an invitational concert by eight young ladies (double quartet): first soprano, Mrs. Lenore Greven and Miss Florence Walbey; second soprano, Miss Edna Riecker and Miss Mabel Jackson Christes; first alto, Miss Zita Fahey and Miss Annetta Godfrey; second alto, Miss Maude Crabtree and Miss Grace Burmeister. These ladies are pupils of Mr. Greven, who will preside at the piano. The Presentation Convent has begun preparations for the performance of the favorite comic opera "The Chimes of Normandy," the solo parts, with one exception, being in the hands of present and former pupils of Mr. Greven. The young ladies of Plymouth Congregational church are planning and preparing for the last two months the melodious cantata, "Esther, the Beautiful Queen," the title part to be sung by Miss Lillian Beanston, a pupil of Mr. Greven.

LETTERS

Another Edition of "The True Napoleon"

Guy Carleton Lee, the well-known critic and literary editor of the Baltimore Sun, mentions in his yearly review that " 'The True Napoleon,' by Charles Josselyn, continues to find favor both with the critics and the reading public." This must be very gratifying to the author, especially when it is remembered that the subject so ably handled by him was one to which much of the greatest literary talent of the nineteenth century had been attracted. In fact, it was deemed well nigh impossible for any one to present the Great Emperor to the world in a new light. Josselyn has gleaned with the keen instinct of the born historian, and bound together in a most attractive volume, in fact an edition de luxe, all that possessed historical value in the life of "the little Corporal." The demand for this notable and popular book has been so great that the first edition is well nigh exhausted.

The "Most Popular"

With a view to satisfying curiosity as to what kind of books are most popular, so far as the holiday trade could be made to act as an index, a canvass was made amongst the large dealers of one of the Atlantic cities. Nothing unexpected was disclosed. In fact, the same conclusions could have been arrived at by scanning the returns of a circulating library, or keeping tab on the books seen in the street cars mornings and evenings. Historical works, as distinguished from historical novels, seem to be in demand, but that may be attributed to other causes than an improvement in popular taste, the impending reopening of schools, for example, or the replacing of worn-out volumes in public libraries. The latest novel was found to be in good demand, and also books about children, which has been rather hastily assumed to indicate an awakening of interest in the young generation, "especially by fathers." Much more likely it is due entirely to the excellence of the stories themselves. Josephine Dodge Daskam, Mrs. Martin, Eleanor Gates and some others of the newer short story writers, have been writing of real, flesh and blood children, such as exist in our world, not the morbid little prigs and pharisees of the older period, and the natural result of so much wholesomeness is to find a market. Editions de luxe are a matter of course in Christmas sales. It is the time for the expensive and showy editions de luxe of books which are anything but de luxe in other respects than sumptuous bindings and expensive paper, and are brought out especially for the holiday sales. Reprints were also in good demand this year, which may indicate either that older folk were made glad by sets of the favorites of their earlier years, or that the younger generation "ought to read" the standard authors and might do so, were they the possessors of the books. Poetry was not in demand, neither the old nor the new, though time was when a volume of poems, any one's, and of any quality, was supposed to be as fitting a gift for Christmas as holly and mistletoe are for decorations. A decided preference was indicated for short books, and that, too, is in line with modern ideas. One may see in the public libraries, any day in the week, patrons who have no preference in the matter of author or subject, but want only "something to read," examining book after book, apparently becoming interested, turning to the last leaf, and on noting the number of pages, returning the volume to its place and searching out something shorter. The inquiry into the book selling trade has not revealed any material difference between holiday sales and sales of the rest of the year, and like most such questions, has ended about where it began.

The "Previousness of Periodicals"

Annie Nathan Meyer has a timely paper in the current Critic on the subject of the "Previousness of Periodicals," in which she calls attention to the haste of publishers in rushing their special editions on the market weeks in advance of their date, so that in the race to be first they are as untimely as if they were eleven months behindhand instead of one month early. Some twenty-five or thirty years ago the same mad race was gone through with every month, and it was a conservative, not to say slow publication which was not to be found on sale at least two weeks before the nominal date of its issue. The inconvenience and absurdity of the course of procedure finally struck publishers and there was a halt and readjustment, and an agreement that magazines for any specified month would appear on the first day of that month unless the first should chance to be a Sunday or holiday, when they should be on sale the day previous. For a good many years this plan was adhered to, approximately at least, but of late the day of issuance has been traveling backward until one expects, as a matter of course, to find the book stalls supplied any time after the middle of the month.

A Literary Dude

An Italian paper inventories D'Annunzio's wardrobe as follows: "Shirts, 72; socks of all kinds, 12 dozen; socks of quiet-tinted silk, 2 dozen; hats, evening suits, smoking coats, shooting jackets, innumerable; gloves for walking, 48 pairs; gloves for evening, 24 pairs; mufflers of beautiful silk, 3; walking sticks, 12; umbrellas of violet hue, 8; parasols, green, 10; handkerchiefs, 20 dozen; cravats, resplendent and varied, 150; waistcoats, 10; shoes for walking, 14 pairs; slippers, 'soft, silent and tremulous,' 2 pairs. Also a very fine carbine, three revolvers, a dagger, a Venetian box of perfumes and a lap-dog." The list may prove useful to those who imagine that success in literature is attained by using the same fountain pen or typewriter as some successful writer, or it may act as a stimulus. All these and more, too, are to be yours if you write successful books.

Ellen Glasgow is at work on a new novel of Virginia life, which, it is given out, is to be in no sense historical. In one way of looking at the historical novel, Miss Glasgow's two best known volumes, "The Battleground" and "The Voice of the People," are not "historical," since they do not bring in the names of well-known politicians or soldiers, nor wrap themselves around some event in history. In another sense they are the best kind of historical novels, since they deal with the manners and customs, and the lives of people, and preserve a picture of their times. It takes more than a phantom glimpse of Washington or Lee or Grant, prancing on horseback in the dim background of a love story, to make an historical novel worthy of the name. Ellen Glasgow, by the way, has recently published a volume of poems which is receiving high praise from reviewers.

The Book Beggar

An English author of some repute, who wisely does not disclose his name, is telling, without pride, of a request recently made of him by the librarian at Paddington for a donation of his books, to be placed on the library shelves. The request was not, of course, couched in terms of "stand and deliver," but the complimentary phrases which hedged about the demand were not sufficient to bring about the desired result. This is not the first time that the thing has been done. It is the ordinary method of procedure whenever there is the ghost of a shadow of a benevolent scheme back of a library foundation. People who work up a reputation for charity and generosity on the strength of what they can make others contribute seem to have an idea that authors are the sole owners of their books and that they can hand out single volumes or whole sets as easily as a carpenter can donate the odd bits of board and scantling that he saws off to even his work. The Paddington librarian seemed to think he was offering more than an equivalent in giving the author such an opportunity to get his works into the hands of readers, but the author in question, like most writers, took the opposite view. As it seemed to him, if people wanted to read his books and could not borrow them they would be compelled to buy, to the material increase of his income. The late Frank Norris is the only writer of any importance who thought libraries were a good thing for writers. Mr. Norris took the profession of literature seriously. He had no patience with pot-boiling, scamped work, or rush to take advantage of a market or imitate a fad. The pecuniary profit is the smallest part, in his estimation, but for every man to do the best that is in him and stand by his work when he knows it to be good, whether it pays in dollars or not. Instead of counting every library borrower a purchaser lost, Mr. Norris thought the fact that libraries were themselves large purchasers counted for considerable, in addition to which people were learning the habit of books through them, and eventually they would not be satisfied with public conveniences, but would want to own their own books as they do their own toilet articles. There are few who look so far into the future, however, or see the whole design, in their intense scrutiny of the little thread which they themselves are weaving into the fabric. And after all, when we see how communities beg whole libraries, perhaps we should commend the Paddingtonians for their moderation in asking for a few books only.

Mrs. Catherwood, who died during the last week of the old year, was engaged on a book which she expected to place in the hands of a publisher in March. She was one of the first to make history a groundwork for romance, and though her novels are not usually classed as historical, they contain quite as much, if not more history than those which have appropriated the title. It is a wonder that, between her popularity as a writer, and the rage for dramatizations of books, no manager took note of her earliest novel, "The Romance of Dollard."

They are utilizing "sandwich men" to advertise the "Confessions of a Wife" in London. If the sandwich men themselves have wives, one wonders what they would think of the imaginary woes of the well-fed, well-clothed and comfortably housed Marna. Most likely, in the picturesque vernacular of the cockney, they would agree that had Dana "give her what for" in the first place, she would have had something else to think of besides morbid imaginings, tears and journals.

We have had a good many jokes about the "unknown husbands of well-known wives," but the Critic goes one better in libeling Prince Henry of Pless, now on a visit to the United States, as "the husband of the lady who was first accused of being the author of 'Elizabeth and her German Garden.'"

Horace Howard Furness, Jr., the son of the well-known Shakespearean scholar and editor of the Variorum Edition of the plays, will shortly publish his first volume and contribution. While the elder Furness is still giving his attention to the Comedies, the son is devoting himself to the historical plays. "Macbeth" is the first to be completed and he is now at work on "Richard III." —The Bookworm

LETTERS FROM MISS TRILBY MILLIONS TO HER BOSOM FRIEND

January 10, 1870.

Dear Toodles,

I'm the happiest girl that ever lived. The papers all say I'm a beauty and as my mirror reflects the same sweet flattery, I am willing to let it go on its merits. At my debut-tea, I had twenty bouquets, twelve more than the most popular bud received. I have met a real live Lord, and he seemed taken with me—or my dot?—so mamma is all swelled up, fancying herself related to a pedigree and a castle in Scotland. Can't tell you what he looks like, for I never observed him closely. I am just going in for enjoyment, dancing chiefly. If a man knows how to dance, I don't give a rap whether he's an eligible or a non. Let anybody mention a new dancing man, and I say "Which is he?" and have him hustled to an introduction P. D. Q. No, dear, I'm not unnecessarily and forcibly slangy. I can sling the cultured gab with anybody in my set, but with you, my dear, I'm always comfortably negligee. No, no, Toodles, I shan't marry this season, nor get engaged, either. I've plenty of solitaires of my own, and an engaged girl is simply out of all the fun.

Your devoted, —Trilby.

June 16, 1873.

Sweetest Toodles,

I'm man-mad, though I'm not anxious to yoke myself after three seasons out. But I've cultivated a fad for conquering the other sex. A new "Who?" means to me just another victim. It's the zest of society life, to make men mad over one, and then—drop them. I'm getting a great reputation as a coquette. They call me "The Heartbreaking Heiress." Mamma can't be consoled because I let a German baron, a mining magnate and a Prince from God-knows-where go away with the willow well displayed. She says it's shocking that after three seasons your devoted chum is not willing to settle down to domesticity. But, you know, Toodles, that your Trilby cherishes a high ideal. I know what I want, and when I see him I'm willing to help Cupid along a bit. He must be as handsome as Apollo, as wise as seven serpents, as tender as a Richard Harding Davis hero, and absolutely faultless in character. Until He comes, I shall always be

Your single-hearted chum, Trilby.

August 30, 1878.

Dear Toodles,

What an age it seems since I wrote you my first Woman letter. Fancy—eight years ago I came out, and eight years have passed by and I'm Trilby Millions still. With age I have grown ambitious. I don't care for masculine beauty any more, not as beauty, but I crave a husband of social prominence. I simply envy Lady Curzon, the Countess of Craven, the Duchess of Marlborough, Countess Castellane and other Americans who have wedded great titles. Penniless German barons, French marquises with empty titles, and that sort of thing won't do. Why didn't Hobson the hero drop along when my passion was for heroes? Why didn't Admiral Dewey wait awhile? I want to marry somebody who is; somebody who wouldn't be suspected of seeking a dot, but who would be absolutely sure of loving me—Trilby Millions. I'm better looking than when I debuted. I have gained flesh and style. I no longer belong to the frivolous set. But I'm bored to death—dancing, flirting, even eating is a bore. Can't you look me up a hero or a rich title? I'll have no common man.

Lovingly, Trilby.

January fourteenth, 1903.

Dear Toodles,

You and I are growing old. I feel it more every day. Why, my aunt had the temerity to ask me to chaperon her second daughter at a box-party the other night! I am, as the thoughtful writers say, at woman's most fascinating stage. But—well, I heard a woman say to another the other day: "There's that passe Miss Millions. With all her money, she's single still." Yet, were I less well dowered financially, I'm sure men would seek me still and woo as warmly as before. The men of our set, however, the unmarried, are worshiping newer goddesses. Heiresses are as thick as peas in a pod this season. It's only a question of look and take your choice. I, who feel that now is the time when I would be willing to live a quiet married life, am no longer sought after. Those I could care for are looking elsewhere. The good, the great, that I amused myself with ten years ago, now pass me by for my younger sisters in the swim. Why is it, Toodles, that what we once lightly valued now seems priceless? Is it because it is out of our reach? Mamma says we must go abroad. I may agree—yet as I think of that weary round of European capitals that I once enjoyed so much, I feel that rather would I stay here all my life—and chaperon my aunt's second daughter.

Always affectionately, Trilby Millions.

—The Matchmaker

Jenkins—I hope you are not broken-hearted over being jilted by Miss Flirte.

Hopkins—On the contrary, I'm congratulating myself over having escaped a union with a woman who is so lacking in taste as to fall in love with such a cad as Jones.

A Question

Why is it, when the morn has come,
My joy has flown away?
Why can't I feel as merry now
As I did yesterday?

Why is it, when the night has fled,
My light heart's vanished, too?
Last night I had a high old time—
Today, I'm sad and blue.

Why is it that when wine is out,
My spirits, too, have sped?
All that remains of last night's joy
Is this sore and aching head. —The Soak.

AINSLEE'S FOR FEBRUARY

The leading novel in Ainslee's Magazine for February is entitled, "Money and Matrimony," by Josephine Dixon, and presents a vivid and witty picture of life in Washington. A most original contribution and one that is bound to excite discussion is, "Confessions of a Playwright," which, naturally, appears without any signature. Undeniably this is a bona-fide statement, because the interviews and letters it contains are from such people as Charles Frohman, Daniel Frohman, Mrs. Fiske, Mrs. Patrick Campbell, and many others equally celebrated. Morgan Robertson, most famous of American sea writers, has a humorous story of life on a battleship, "A Hero of the Cloth." Dorothy Dix has a short essay about "The Man Flirt." Gelett Burgess offers a short, sentimental dialogue on "A Game of Chess." "Romance in the Thirties," by Caroline Duer, is an interesting little play of modern society. The translation in Ainslee's for February is from a story by Paul Hervieu. These are only some of the features, the contents page containing about thirty-five items of prose and poetry from the foremost authors of the day.

With the Money Makers

United Railroads' Bonds

Although slightly foreshadowed by rumors that Brown Brothers, of New York, would not take up their option on the bonds of the United Railroads of San Francisco, and by some of the "wise" subscribers of the issue endeavoring to unload before they were called to take up their pro rata on delivery day, and before the listing of the bonds, the sudden slump of some ten points in the value of these securities came as a marked surprise in local financial circles. The depreciation in New York is reported as bad as here, and the reason given out by some for the sudden decline is attributed to the stringency of the money market in the Atlantic metropolis. While that may have had some effect upon the securities there, local financiers are strong in their opinions that the slump was caused by Brown Brothers, who it will be remembered consummated the deal and who hold an option on the remainder of the unsold bonds, which holds good until February, having refused to take up their option, and that this action has naturally scared subscribers, who are making a wild scramble to unload, accepting almost any figure they can get. Along the street rumors have been numerous, and while some of the statements have doubtless been exaggerated many have been accepted by the conservative element. The statement generally believed is that the syndicate made an over issue of bonds, or issued more than the property in hand justified, and in excess of what either the sinking fund or the natural earnings of the road warranted. It soon became evident that enough money would not accumulate in the sinking fund to meet the liabilities of the separate roads taken over by the syndicate. Some $4,000,000 of outstanding bonds of the Market street system will mature in 1904 and must be met. Other liabilities falling due at different times will absorb the possible earnings and accumulations before enough can be placed in the sinking fund and the road would either have to borrow money to meet those obligations or liquidate such debts by an exchange of old for new bonds. The refusal of Brown Brothers to take up their option quickly lent color to these statements, especially when it was known in whose possession these bonds were, and what capitalists and estates would demand their money on maturity. That not more than $5,000,000 of the entire issue was subscribed for by local investors did not strengthen these securities, especially when money is most abundant in San Francisco, and seeking investment. It will be remembered that a year ago the bonds brought 92 1-2 and interest while early this week any quantity could have been obtained at 83 flat.

Pencilings on 'Change

The week's transactions in stocks and bonds has been of very fair volume and the steadiness with which prices have been maintained evidences the confidence with which investors generally regard the market. There has been rather more attention devoted to sugar stocks than during the preceding two weeks, but whether this is caused by the slightly lower prices which have been ruling or merely for the reason that after the holidays, purchasers became more liberal in their orders to buy, cannot be determined, but from whichever point the situation may be viewed the fact remains that the conditions are indicative of a substantial and well sustained market. The effect of last week's flurry in the

To disparage the vintage of a glorious clime,
Is wanting in judgment, and 'tis safe to opine
He pays for the label and not for the wine;
For the soil of California and climate combine
In all the essentials for a vintage fine.
So seek not the label of foreign design,
But a Grower's product your taste confine:
Drink to the "OLIVINA" (Olive and Vine),
And regale and rejuvenate while you dine.

price of shares of the German Savings Bank has entirely passed away and the price, $2,150, is the same figure which ruled prior to the advanced rate. In reference to the bid of $3,000 per share for the stock of this bank there are several rumors current on the street, one of which is that a well-known capitalist sought to get control of a certain number of shares, and to accomplish his object commenced offering liberal advances on prevailing rates until the bidding price was up to $3,000. Whether he secured the stock he sought cannot now be stated, but some of those who pretend to know assert that he did not. This stock is held in few hands and scarcely any of the holders would care to part with a portion of his holdings. In the matter of sugar stocks there is a general increase of interest. The reports from the Islands in almost all instances show the plantations to be in a more satisfactory condition than ever before in the history of the industry. The fact that the Islands are now American territory also imparts a good measure of strength to values and makes investors feel that this class of security is on a much safer basis than ever before. Alaska Packers has again advanced to its normal figure. The decline of a few days ago was caused by rumors that the company's sales of the last season failed to produce the substantial results expected and the stock weakened accordingly. The issuance of the company's annual statement, however, showed upon careful study that all such rumors were without foundation, for the statement showed an increased reserve fund with an appropriation set aside insuring a continuance of the present monthly dividend of $1 per share for the next twelve months. Giant Powder Stock weakened considerably and the offering of a number of shares by small holders only tended to further depress the market. This weakness was of short duration, however, for the price has again advanced, as there are ready buyers for all offerings at $67.50. The annual meeting of the company will be held on the 28th instant and it is reported on the street that shareholders are being approached and asked for proxies for the purpose of electing Henry J. Crocker a member of the board of directors. Whether this indicates the formation of new controlling interests cannot at this time be stated.

The statements of the nine savings banks of the city showing the condition of affairs of the institutions on December 31st have recently been filed with the Bank Commissioners. A study of the leading features of these statements combined makes a showing of which San Francisco may well be proud. The total resources of these banks is $154,762,790.48, a gain of $11,237,794.09 during the year. The total amount due depositors is $144,295,034.57, which is a gain of $10,864,551.80 during the year. Estimating the population of San Francisco at 400,000 people, the savings deposits in these banks show an average of over $360 per capita for every man, woman and child. San Francisco has nineteen commercial banks, with an aggregate in resources of $109,294,865.96, which is an increase of $19,109,099.23 for the year, or more than an average of $1,500,000 per month. The funds in these commercial banks to the credit of depositors on the last day of the year were $67,853,182.53, a gain of $12,307,634.81 on the corresponding date of the preceding year. This shows an average gain in deposits of more than $1,000,000 per month.

By the Way

The weakest of women, if she has a "way" with her can drive strong men to distraction.

The strongest of men will succumb to the wiles of a woman, if she throws herself at his head, and feeds his vanity.

The weakest of men becomes strong in the presence of a woman who has revealed her passion for him.

The strongest of women will unbend to a man who seizes the right moment to press his advantage.

The Apology Grande

A prominent official at Tabreeze, Persia, had an altercation with an English gentleman, and repeatedly called him a liar to his face. The Englishman, who seemed not to be acquainted with Oriental character, sent him a note, demanding either an apology or that he should accept a challenge to fight. The Persian was not a coward—few Persians are poltroons—but the idea of risking his life because he had called another man a liar seemed to him preposterous.

"I fight!" said he, "what shall I fight for? I only called him a liar, and now he wants me to fight him. Never was anything more absurd!"

"Well," said the gentleman who took the note to him, "he says you will have to fight him. There is no way of getting out of it."

"But I say I won't fight," replied the other.

"Then you must apologize."

"Apologize! What does he mean by apologize?"

"Why, take it all back, and say that you are sorry you called him a liar. That is what it means."

"Is that all?" replied the Persian. "Of course I'll apologize. I'll say whatever he wishes me to say. I lied when I called him a liar. I am a liar, the son of a liar and the grandson of a liar. What more does he want me to say?"

Tall Stories from Home

Some of the early settlers of New England sent home curious accounts of the strange land to their friends, whom they evidently enjoyed hoaxing. "Hereabouts," says one of them, "if you sow barley it comes up oats." Another tells of the "lions that prowl about Cape Ann." A third, in 1663, says that the frogs of Massachusetts "sit up on their breeches a foot high, and some are as big as a child that is a year old." The present frogs of that State are degenerate, but the babies of Massachusetts are now certainly bigger than frogs.

The Venezuela Incident

There will be serious disappointment in more than one newspaper office if the United States and Germany do not go to war over the Venezuela incident. Some of our aggressive editors, fired with patriotic devotion to the Monroe Doctrine, are intent upon provoking trouble, and they appear to have the sympathy of several of our belligerent statesmen in Washington. But really there was no occasion for the display of hot temper over the action of a German warship in destroying a Venezuelan fort. The Germans were maintaining a blockade pending negotiations leading to the submission of the main question at issue to arbitration. A Venezuelan fort fired on one of the warships engaged in the blockade, and naturally the fire was returned. Why shouldn't it have been? It was a case of the Venezuelans getting gay, believing no doubt that the Germans had been intimidated by the interference of this country. If the warship had not returned the fire it would probably have been blown out of the water. However, the jingo editors stormed at the insolence of Germany, and called upon the authorities at Washington to take some decisive action before any further aggression could give the Kaiser the impression that we were not prepared to defend the Monroe Doctrine. Evidently the jingo editors would like the President to declare that the theory of the Monroe Doctrine is that the South American republics can do no wrong serious enough to provoke the resentment of a European nation. Instead of seeking to enlarge the scope of the Monroe Doctrine we should be very glad to accept the interpretation which merely enjoins European nations from seeking to acquire territory on this continent. As a profession of chivalrous devotion to our feebler brethren it is superficial and insincere. It is a selfish policy promulgated without a precedent of any sort for a pretext, and when we acquired the Philippines it became an impertinence. Nevertheless, as we believe it essential to the peace and quiet of this country we should enforce it strictly, but it is unjust, arbitrary and unreasonable to set it forth as an excuse for attempting to browbeat a foreign power. Assuming that Germany is desirous of forcing an opening for herself in South American affairs, yet we are not justified in charging her with violating the Monroe Doctrine merely because she retaliated when attacked. The jingo editors assure us that it is an open secret that Germany is after a new area, full of untouched resources, capable of great development, etc. Perhaps she is, but she has done nothing as yet to indicate a purpose to grab Venezuela in the face of the Monroe Doctrine. On the contrary, she appears very anxious to cultivate the friendship of the United States. Baron Speck von Sternberg, who is about to come here as German Ambassador, says that Emperor William desires him to do all in his power to promote friendly relations between the two countries. And there are wise statesmen in Europe who believe it is to Germany's advantage to be on good terms with this country for the very reason that her interests in South America are vital to her commercial expansion. They say that in order not to retrograde she must have great commerce, but that it is not necessary for her to colonize. She is not successful with the colonies she already has, and she can expand her commerce by encouraging her people to build up interests in South America. It would be absurd for her to menace those interests by picking a quarrel with the United States.

The State Library

The question of the advisability of moving the State Library from the Capitol at Sacramento to the University of California at Berkeley is now being agitated. If the library were across the bay, in a suitable building, it would be easy of access to many thousands of people. It is now in a comparatively isolated part of the State, and consequently only a small number of people avail themselves of the privilege of research among its volumes. Most of those that do visit it are prompted merely by curiosity, yet it is a library rich in works of reference, historical and scientific. It contains many Spanish documents relating to the early history of the State, and legal documents bearing upon land titles. These are too far removed from the people who have occasion to consult them most frequently. Moreover they are in cramped quarters, unsuited to the purpose and unsafe by reason of the character of the building. However there is likely to be powerful opposition to the proposition to remove the library, for the politicians of Sacramento are influential chaps, and they would never sit idly by while a measure for the withdrawal of one of the city's attractions was under discussion.

Judges and Their Salaries

The bill to raise the salaries of judges should be passed. The compensation of the judiciary should be large enough to tempt the ablest lawyers to desert private practice. The bench should be occupied by the brightest and most learned men in the legal profession. The honor is sufficient to tempt some, while others seek judicial position because though they are learned in the law they have not the temperament essential to success at the bar. But they make competent judges, and there are many men on the bench eminently equipped, morally and mentally, for the duties of the jurist. However, if the compensation were adequate fewer of the incompetents would achieve elevation to the bench, for then many of the more desirable element of the profession would seek judicial office, and the shysters who are occasionally permitted to become jurists for experimental purposes would be crowded to the wall. The so-called "dignity of the bench" is now merely a fiction in this city because we have been in the habit of making judges out of men who are incapable of appreciating the solemnity of a judicial officer's duties. The fact is that we are frequently denied the opportunity for proper discrimination in the selection of judges because of the limited number of competent men among the candidates.

The South Shocked

President Roosevelt appears to have set the South by the ears by appointing a negro named Crum to the position of Collector of Port in South Carolina. Moreover he has incurred the displeasure of many of his friends in the North by stirring up the negro question. The New York Herald, which has for months carried Roosevelt's name at the head of its columns as "the people's anti-trust candidate for 1904," has dropped it and taken sides with the indignant whites of the South. The appointment of Crum is said to have been made because there are more negroes than whites in South Carolina, but whatever his reason was the President blundered in experimenting with miscegenaation in a typical Southern city, in which there is not only the old race prejudice, but the constant dread of attempted negro domination. He could have shown his friendship for the negro by selecting a more favorable locality in which to bestow office on representatives of the colored race. Such is the indignation of the whites in South Carolina, and also in Mississippi where the Postmaster-General suspended a postoffice because the citizens forced the colored postmistress to resign, that there is actually talk of secession once more. There is also wild talk of negro persecution, and boycotting Northern products. It is absurd but unfortunate, for it was not long ago that the spirit of brotherly love between the North and South was being fostered with the prospect of all the old sores being healed forever. However, it was the duty of the President to take some action to show his disapproval of the Southern movement to shut out negroes from all political influence and from all offices. He should have exhibited more tact in giving official recognition to the negro element, but Roosevelt is an impulsive individual and he has always advocated drastic measures.

Personal Journalism

Flaneur, the well known paragraphist of the Toronto Mail and Empire, the most dignified, conservative and widely read of the Canadian dailies, had this to say in a recent issue:

> Town Talk, of San Francisco, is one of the best papers of its kind on this continent. When I say "of its kind" nothing detrimental is meant. Town Talk is a paper largely given to personal journalism; there is a not at all unreasonable prejudice in some quarters against this kind of journalism, but that it is generally popular no one can deny; it is here and will last, and the most sure way to kill off the worst kinds of such papers is to encourage the better. Town Talk is in the front rank and well worth reading.

From a conservative Canadian cousin this is high praise indeed. Canadian journalism is ponderous in its dignity and impressive in its solemnity. It takes life in all its phases seriously. Affairs of state supply the only lively topics for discussion in the columns of the sedate and severely proper journals of our colonial neighbor. It is surprising that Flaneur would even apologetically approve of personal journalism as conducted across the border. However we sincerely appreciate the compliment of his generous verdict. And we quite agree with him that the prejudice "in certain quarters" against personal journalism is reasonable. The people prejudiced against honest personal journalism are either knaves or fools, and neither care to have the white light of truth beat upon them. Their prejudice is constitutional and it is justified. The political crook, the mercantile fraud and the social bandit are the most vociferous shouters in the chorus that bawls against personal journalism. Of course there are two kinds of personal journalism, and it is a notable fact that those who are the most deeply prejudiced against both are the most generous supporters of the dishonest variety. They advertise to buy immunity from criticism in the journals that thrive by that sort of business. When they are properly exposed in the honest journal they rush off to the office of the dishonest one and purchase a little fulsome flattery by way of a salve to their wounds. Personal journalism, when conducted through honest motives, is a powerful influence for good in any community. Recognition of that fact is becoming more general every day. Perhaps in the near future it will reach Canada, and who knows but that Flaneur will become the Labouchere of Great Britain's territory on the American continent?

Why Marriage Becomes a Failure

A compassionate daily comes to the aid of the married women workers with the assertion that it is because they need money that they become job-chasers, and it is not only unchivalrous and ungenerous, but brutal to set obstacles in their way. There will always be a certain proportion of wives and mothers who are obliged to become the supporters of their households through the incompetence of their husbands. Putting aside the comparatively few cases where men desert their homes or are too indolent to exert themselves, there are illnesses and unavoidable accidents which may disable the head of the household, either permanently or temporarily, and the wife must do double duty, in maintaining the house and looking after the home. But for the vast majority of the women who seek outside work there is no such compelling need. The necessity for a larger income is an artificial one, and results from a false standard. Gradually, but rapidly, the old idea of a home is passing away. Men still cling to it, more than do women, but amongst those who like to regard themselves as the "better class," home, as understood in the middle of the nineteenth century, is not a thing to be ardently desired. In those benighted times a girl looked forward to a home of which she was to be the mistress quite as ardently as she did to the possession of an ideal and perpetual lover. She took a pride in housewifery, and her linen, her china and her jams and jellies filled her mind until her first baby ousted them. But the modern miss is wiser than her grandmother. Her idea is a mansion with a retinue of servants to whom she is to issue orders. Common sense tells her that millionaires are rather less plentiful than blackberries, and as she is properly aware that "some things are ill to wait," she accepts her clerk, salesman, or small business man without the fortune. Has she a vision of herself in a print gown and check apron, spoiling her well manicured hands? Ask her! Since the mansion is not forthcoming, a suite in an apartment house, or at most, a high priced flat is the least that will content her. All the available funds go towards making a show at the wedding, the rest of which is managed on the installment plan with a future of canned housekeeping. Quite often to keep up appearances it is necessary for the wife to obtain employment and then a Japanese boy is installed to run the flat. It soons becomes evident to a man, under these conditions, that he is paying more and getting less for it than he did in his bachelor days, while the wife is likely to feel independent in other respects as she is financially. The next stage is a suit for divorce and a showing that wifie has had to support herself ever since her marriage. If she had begun, as her grandmother did, with a humble home of her own, made her share of the earning come in the management of the income and the saving of odd dollars and stray pennies, and taken a live interest in matters which concerned her welfare, and left the other vacant place for some girl who needed it, not one time in fifty would there be need of a separation. Encouraging married women to find interests apart from their husbands, and flattering fools with the idea that they are too intellectual to waste themselves on the duties of motherhood, are at the base of most of the unhappy homes of America. Instead of a maudlin sentiment which caters to female vanity in encouraging married women to forsake their homes in order to earn salaries, college professors, editors, preachers and others who set themselves up to lead thought, should turn their attention to how they can keep women at home. The work of the outside world can be done without them. That of the home cannot.

As to American Literature

M. Albert Schintz, a French professor in one of the Eastern minor colleges, is complaining of American literature, which, in his opinion, is without merit. He does not see any hope for us as a nation, since, according to his views, we have had too easy a time. We have had no Crusades, no great revolution, no great hardships of any kind, for we began our national life where the rest of the world left off. Women, according to this gentleman, do all the reading, and they will read nothing but fiction. The American man works too hard. He is too tired to read. We have "no literary public, but only the public." Magazines and periodicals will not accept serious articles of more than five thousand words, and they would rather have them cut to three thousand. They would't publish St. Paul's epistle to the Corinthians because it is too long. Perhaps it is all true enough, but we can claim our share in any of the great world movements with as good a grace as the French, Germans, or any other European nation. The Crusades were not copyrighted; neither was the Reformation, nor the circumnavigation of the globe. As to a lack of a "literary public," we have no coterie universally acknowledged to be the only judges of what's what, without whose approval nothing can claim to be "literature." We have, in every community, those who regard themselves as arbitres, but no one outside of their own circle takes them seriously. Neither have we an illiterate peasantry who never read anything at all, either through lack of knowledge of the art, or lack of interest in life. If we could run our whole population through a series of literary sieves of varying fineness, we should have as a final product a class of sublimated intelligence, just as large numerically as any nation on the globe, and our "seconds" and "thirds" would probably outnumber those found elsewhere, while the residuum would be much smaller and of better quality. Women have more leisure than men, and they spend a portion of it in reading, but any one who frequents a public library can testify to the fact that a large proportion of the patrons are men. As to a preference for short articles, the reason for that ought to be plain. If a scientific fact or social question is not of universal interest, all that can be expected to interest the reader not immediately concerned with it can be said within the prescribed space. If it cannot, then there are magazines or papers devoted to that or kindred topics in which it will not only find place, but the class of readers to whom it is addressed. "One grows tired of the parable of St. Paul and his Epistle." Were he living now the obviously proper course for him to pursue would be to have his epistle typewritten or printed, and sent through the mail. Times and methods change. We hear the same sort of argument about Luther and his brave defiance in nailing his protest to the church door, as if it were something unheard of before. In the days when there were no newspapers, all documents to be promulgated were nailed to the church door. As to St. Paul in search of a publisher, he would not be the only one, if he offered his writings to the Century, the Atlantic or the New York Sun. Milton, Dryden, Pope, and others of the literary gods would find their wares refused if they offered them at the wrong place. Does any one think the Harpers would attempt to publish "Clarissa Harlowe" as a serial with a view to pleasing subscribers? When foreigners come to this country and remain long enough to learn the language and find a good paying berth in some governmental office or educational institution, they invariably take it upon themselves to castigate us for our audacity in daring to differ from their beloved native land. Their attitude recalls the remark of a high and haughty English dame traveling in Italy for the first time. Having overheard a reference to her party as foreigners, she speedily set the ignorant natives right. "I beg your pardon; you are the foreigners. We are English."

The Gentleman and the Parvenu

When the news came from Washington some nights ago that a German warship had fired on a Venezuelan fort and that relations between this country and Germany were becoming somewhat strained, the Call sent out reporters to get interviews. One reporter went to the Palace hotel and interrogated Mr. Lewis Nixon, president of the shipbuilders' combine, relative to the progress that was being made on government war vessels in course of construction, and also as to the capacity of the shipyards of the country. Another reporter called on Mr. Henry T. Scott to get information relative to the progress that was being made on government vessels at the Union Iron Works. An hour later the two reporters met in the Call editorial rooms.

"What success?" asked the one who had been sent to interview the great exponent of Scott hospitality.

"I've got a good story," was the reply. "Nixon is an affable fellow. He not only told me all I wanted to know, but he sat down and wrote a comprehensive statement of the facts for publication. How did you fare?"

"Didn't get a line," was the reply. "That fellow Scott is the worst old boor I ever met."

"Wouldn't he talk?"

"Yes, like an ill-mannered parvenu. After meeting him I can readily understand why those Eastern people fired him out of the chairmanship of the Shipbuilders' executive committee. All that I could get out of him was that the newspapers knew more than he did about the Union Iron Works. Though I was in his own home I could have closed my eyes and imagined I was talking to a hostler in the stable."

The Two Types

This story of the experience of the two reporters is told merely to contrast the methods of representative men of affairs from both edges of the continent. Mr. Nixon is a college bred young man who has become one of the great captains of industry in this country. He recognizes the right of the people concerning the dealings of big corporations with the Government, and he vouchsafes them through the press the knowledge to which he believes them to be entitled. Moreover he knows that he can best subserve the interests entrusted to him by treating representatives of the country's press courteously. Mr. Scott typifies the pomposity of the far Western industrial magnate who belongs to a past generation and whose methods are now tabu. Men of the ill-mannered Scott type formerly abounded in the offices of our quasi-public corporations, and they have been crowded out by courteous young men from the East who have successfully demonstrated that politeness pays even in commerce.

A Question of Ethics

It is popularly supposed that lawyers do not concern themselves very much about the ethics of their profession. But they do. Nearly every lawyer worries about the ethical shortcomings of the other fellow. It appears that each lawyer has his own code of ethics with which he adroitly reconciles his acts, and another code with which he vainly seeks to reconcile the acts of other members of the profession. Ralph C. Harrison was retained the other day by Dave Jacks, the wealthy land-owner, to argue a case in the Supreme Court. The same case was argued just before the personnel of the court was changed by the recent election and while Harrison was one of the justices. Now it is being argued in the profession that it is a violation of professional ethics for ex-Justice Harrison to accept a fee in the case, because when on the bench he probably heard the views of his associates, and therefore will have an advantage over his adversary in the argument. A rara avis indeed would be the lawyer, in these degenerate days, who would shy at a fee under the same circumstances.

The Jury Farce

If to take an undue advantage over one's adversary in a court of justice be a violation of legal ethics, then objection should be raised to the methods of counsel in railroad damage suits. The jury system in our courts is such that there are many men in San Francisco who live by doing jury duty. They are on every panel. Counsel for the railroad has a list of them, and he knows how nearly every man summoned is inclined to vote on a verdict. He surely has a tremendous advantage over his adversaries. So well is this understood in the legal profession, that the attorney is hired by other lawyers to assist them in jury cases. He is not to blame for taking advantage of conditions for which the judges are responsible. It is the duty of the bench to banish professional jurors, for even though a juror be honest he is unfit for jury duty if the attorney on one side of a case knows that he is predisposed to view the facts in a certain light, and that his judgment may be swayed by certain methods unknown to the other side. The trial jury system of San Francisco has become as much of a farce as the Grand Jury which is usually drawn by a clerk noted for his dexterity in the manipulation of marked slips. It would be a very easy matter for the Presiding Judge to examine every slip and make comparison with the list of grand jurors before the drawing, and then lock the box and keep the key, but no jurist appears to think it wise to take the precaution. Yet the drawing of Grand Jurors has been a juggling game under more than one administration of the county clerk's office.

Polite Larceny in Clubdom

SOLD BY LEADING DEALERS

Examiner was banished from the library of that gilded home of the millionaire he subscribed for the paper, and it was left at his door every morning. Being a gentleman of leisure he does not arise early, but one morning he awoke earlier than usual and sought his paper. It was missing. He supposed that the carrier had forgotten him that day, but about an hour later when he opened the door his paper was there. In the following week he again arose early one morning and once more the paper was missing. McCaleb concluded that somebody was committing a species of petty larceny. He summoned a servant, and asked him if he knew what had become of his paper. "Oh, yes," said the man, "Mr. Platt whose room is across the hall borrows it every morning before you get up!" When the patriots of clubdom were inveighing against the Examiner for having pulled the fatal trigger at Buffalo, Mr. Horace Platt was the most enthusiastic advocate of the proposition to banish the paper from the Pacific-Union. Therefore, though McCaleb was at first very indignant that anybody in a gentleman's club should borrow his property surreptitiously, he thought it such a good joke when he discovered Platt was the culprit that he decided not to protest.

Newton on Dangerous Ground

Rev. Heber Newton, late of New York and now of Stanford, hasn't been with us very long, but he has been here long enough to start a religious controversy. Indeed, he has sown the seed of one, and it remains to be seen whether he combines the temerity and the self-confidence to essay the role of reaper. A week ago the Rev. Heber Newton appeared in the pulpit at Stanford University to discuss faith, hope and charity. Among other things he said: "It has been the hand of faith which has created the most tyrannous of tyrants, an Index Expurgatorius—a censorship of the press under which freedom of thought has been destroyed within the greatest church of Christendom." A remarkable utterance with which to start the echoes within the confines of the university whence Professor Ross was banished for having contended for liberty of speech! We should advise the Rev. Heber Newton to go slow. He may find it to his advantage to have a friend vise his sermons and blue-pencil them before delivery. He is no longer a free-lance pulpiteer, and if he wishes to avoid the fate of Ross he should refrain from smashing religious institutions with which he has only a bowing acquaintance. Father Yorke was quick to call attention to the blow-holes in the Newton sermon, and if the Stanford divine cares to reply he will no doubt be accommodated with a religious discussion, for the Catholic controversialist who is now a regent of Berkeley university likes that sort of thing.

By Way of Contrast

In this connection it is interesting to note that while the Rev. Heber Newton was bemoaning the tendency of faith to narrow the human intellect and stay the way to mental progress, Rev. Father Bell, a Jesuit priest of Santa Clara College, was busily engaged in the laboratory of that institution in experimenting with new apparatus by means of which he has made great strides in wireless telegraphy. Though there are many clergymen in the world today who devote all their time to the discussion of "higher thought" when they are not sneering at faith and those religious tenets that have safeguarded society and made civilization possible, there are others who are content with the old theology, and who in the cloistered seclusion of monasteries are making valuable contributions to literature, and achieving things scientific that are of incalculable benefit to the human race.

They Don't Take Tips

In Burton Holmes's lecture on Norway he took occasion to refer to the national aversion to tips and gratuities. Money greed has not yet invaded the Norse country and the peasants refuse extra compensation for services rendered, with an air of surprise. They can not imagine why anybody should pay them more than the stipulated price. The lecturer related that on one occasion he had to travel several miles to a station in order to catch a train at half-past seven in the morning. The landlord called him at four o'clock, cooked and served breakfast, harnessed up, and drove the traveler and his baggage over the mountain roads in time to make his train, and when offered fifty cents over and above his two dollar charge remonstrated, "Oh, no, sir, I can not possibly take all that money."

The End of Egry

Poor Paul Egry! Bohemian by birth and bohemian by nature, he cut out for himself a checkered career and followed it to the usual tragic climax that appeals to the artistic temperament. Euterpe presided over his birth but Egry soon drifted to the shrine of Bacchus, and paid homage to that god of the roystering crew, neglecting his art and giving reign to his rude passions until they drew him into the mire. Egry was a genius without a balance wheel. His command of his instrument was wonderful. He could make his violin sing, wail or rage. San Francisco has heard few better artists than the eccentric Egry. For two years Egry was absent from his old haunts here and those two years were big with adventure for the little Hungarian. In Honolulu, after living a bohemian existence among the natives, he was discovered by the smart set who made much of him as an artist. Pupils, engagements and shekels fell to Paul, and it was said that he longed for a Princess Chimay to give him Rigo-like prestige. From Honolulu, the gypsy wanderer went to New Zealand with the Josephine Stanton theatrical company. In time, and in rags, he returned to Honolulu as a stowaway from Auckland. He pawned a Cremona loaned him by a friend and got himself into trouble, and later he was found peeling potatoes for the ship's "Doctor" on the voyage to this city.

He Sneered at Ysaye

Egry was really a violinist of more than normal brilliancy, and had he spent more hours in the pursuit of art and fewer in the pursuit of pleasure he would probably have lived a life of honor. He was the son of a violinist of some distinction and he "bowed" a violin almost before he could walk. When he came to America some years ago he was engaged by the best managers in the country, but his fondness for the bottle kept him from any very long engagements. He first came West as a leader—or was it first violin?—for the Tavary Opera Company, but at Denver he was taken seriously drunk and was left behind when the company turned Eastward. Denver is an unusually musical city, and Egry, for a time, had small difficulty in making a good living as an instructor. Shortly after Egry's involuntary stop-over Ysaye, the world-famous Belgian violinist, came to Denver for a week's stand. The piece de resistance of the Belgian's program was a composition, the name of which I do not recall, but whose chief merit lay in its test of the performer's skill at difficult phrasing and brilliant fingering. Egry of course went to hear Ysaye, but when he heard the show number he scoffed audibly and boasted that Ysaye played the number like a beginner. The remark got around to Ysaye and caused so much discussion that the Hungarian was invited to give a concert on his own hook and show how the composition should be played.

The Sequel to the Concert

He bit at the chance, borrowed a Stradivarius from the collection of Mr. Josselyn, a local collector, and gave his concert a week after Ysaye departed. The hall was crowded, but those who came to scoff remained to praise, and even his enemies confessed that, in point of brilliancy, Egry had bested Ysaye in his pet piece. The concert, however, had a sequel, as most of Egry's achievements were bound to have. The priceless Stradivarius which the local collector had loaned failed to show up, and after some nervous weeks of waiting had passed he went to see Egry and demanded back his violin. Egry, after some threats and persuasion, at last confessed that it was at that moment resting on a pawn-shop shelf as a security for a small loan. The collector paid the premium, got back his instrument and very good-naturedly consented to keep the matter out of the courts and the papers. Soon after this Egry lost his grip in Denver, became a cafe performer, drifted West to California and was next seen in a beer hall orchestra in Los Angeles.

Touching the Toga Topic

Up from the South comes the news that Henry T. Oxnard has decided to become a candidate for United States Senator to succeed Thomas R. Bard. There will be a very lively scrimmage for the toga when Bard's term draws to a close. That unique statesman having had a taste of life at the Capital has become enamored of the social whirl, and has announced that he will be a candidate himself. As U. S. Grant Jr., the son of his father, who made one feeble though costly attempt to reach the Senatorial goal, is going to make another, there will be three opulent citizens from south of Tehachapi in the fight. As the toga, like other commodities, is affected by the laws of supply and demand, votes should come high in the next Senatorial battle. And though it is somewhat early to discuss the matter it is by no means irrelevant to call attention to the fact that there is a "dark horse" in Pardee's burg over the bay who is already proselyting for converts to the view that it is nonsense to concede to Southern California the right to name the next United States Senator. His friends contend that there is no reason why the whole region north of San Francisco should be ignored. That section, which is fully as important as the home of the carget-bagger, has not had a Senator since it was represented by Newton Booth. Senators Stanford, Casserly, Hager, Hearst, Miller and Williams all hailed from San Francisco. When Stanford and Hearst were the California Senators, San Francisco was the residence of both. Since their passing, the little bunch of villages south of the Tehachapi has had two Senators—Bard and White, while the remainder of the State has had Perkins only.

Pardee and His Policy

The Republicans of Alameda county declare that Senatorships are not matters of geographical distribution, and Governor Pardee who is now engaged in building up a new Republican machine is firmly of that opinion. But in other matters political the Governor is severely reticent. Nobody appears to know just what his policy is going to be. It is evident that he prides himself on his independence and his freedom from entangling alliances. Up to date he has not shown his hand and the politicians are at sea as to what he intends doing. However, it is quite apparent that he is intent upon administering some hard knocks to the Administration of his predecessor. He began his gubernatorial career by exposing the sham of Gage's record for economy. He has pointed out that the last tax levy was not large enough to produce the required revenue, and though he is preaching economy he will no doubt see that sufficient funds are raised to run the government while he is in office.

A Notable Engagement

The marriage of Mrs. Genevieve Green Hamilton and Mr. Garret W. McEnerney is to be an event of the post-Lenten season. The announcement of their engagement aroused more interest than is occasioned by the betrothal of representatives of the merely fashionable herd, for both have accomplished something by the exercise of their conspicuous talents. The achievements of Mr. McEnerney in the legal profession are not more praiseworthy than those of Mrs. Hamilton in the field of journalism. Mrs. Hamilton is the daughter of Will S. Green, the veteran editor of the Colusa Sun, who has held several important State offices and who is known as the father of irrigation in the Sacramento valley. She is a cultured woman and has for years been a regular contributor to the magazines of this country and England. Mr. McEnerney's connection with important litigation has been in the nature of a continuous performance for several years, and there is probably no man in the State with whom the public is more familiar. His success at the bar has been due to his reputation for integrity as much as to his exceptional ability.

A Familiar Type Classified

The "hen-minded" man is a new type discovered by Kate Masterson. She says: "You will meet the hen-minded man at the afternoon receptions of women's clubs, where he drinks tea and talks poetry and art. Frequently he has attainments in these directions, but his mental anæmia expresses itself in all his views. He lacks red blood." No doubt the hen-minded man is a useful individual. Women like to feel that their club functions are not stupid and inane, and the presence of a man or two lends verisimilitude to the fiction that they possess a virile interest. Men of the hen-minded species are especially adapted for the service. They look the part without playing it.

The Pedigree of a Beauty

Much is being written these days about the beauty of Miss Gladys Deacon who is said to have captivated more than one representative of royalty within a year. The progenitors of Miss Deacon made social history here in the old days, and many of her relatives are still here. Her grandmother Miss Tolfree was a beauty of the wax doll type with a profusion of golden hair worn in short fluffy curls all over her head. Her marriage to Captain Charles Baldwin of the United States Navy was one of the social events of the time, and during their residence here, and later when Captain Baldwin was in command at the Mare Island Navy Yard, their home was a delightful one to visit. Captain Baldwin was a handsome man, tall, dark and distinguished looking, courtly in manner and a charming conversationalist. Their only daughter Florence, mother of Miss Gladys Deacon, inherited the good looks of both parents. She grew up in San Francisco where her mother had a large family connection, and finished her education abroad. Among Miss Deacon's relatives in California are her uncle, Charley Baldwin, the Van Winkles, and her great aunt the widow of General Michler, U. S. A., who, as Miss Sallie Hollingsworth, was almost as great a belle in her day as her niece, Miss Tolfree. Mrs. Michler was a half-sister of the late Dr. Beverly Cole, and in that way his granddaughters, pretty Alma and Gladys McClung, are distantly related to the famed beauty, Miss Gladys Deacon.

An Incident of the Boom Days

The Rev. D. Charles Gardner was not quite correct, historically, when he said at the Stanford Memorial Dedication exercises last Sunday, "We begin today a unique experiment, to test whether a non-sectarian church can minister to the spiritual needs of a great university." The "beginning," to test non-sectarian reformations in educational development, "here by the western shore of the New World," began many years ago: before Dr. Heber Newton slipped his moorings from Eastern orthodoxy, or Mr. Gardner saw All Saints church at Palo Alto. But that is another story. The "non-sectarian" feature of the unique and interesting occasion, when the late Senator Stanford was so tenderly laid among the Saints, reminds me of an incident in the boom-days of Southern California. Back in 1887 a band of land speculators in San Diego conceived the idea of establishing a non-sectarian university and church A tract of cactus and sage brush land on the mesa above the new city of "Bay and Climate" was bought for a few thousand dollars, staked off in twenty-five foot lots surrounding the site of the proposed great university. The financial, religious and educational features of the scheme were engineered by a coterie of one-lunged boomers from Kansas and Nebraska. The president, faculty and minister were all but chosen. The plans were drawn and the corner-stone laid, while bright visions were conjured of non-sectarian glory and enormous land profits.

A Memorable Sign

A store in one of the streets of the town was rented for offices, and the entire side of the store was covered with a great plat of "University Heights," showing the buildings completed, and vast acres of corner lots for sale. Above it was painted this legend: "Site of the Home of the Only Non-Sectional College in America." Everybody admired the sign. Nobody appeared to notice the error until a joking lawyer came along and told the boss painter that the word was not "non-sectional." He said that as no women were to be admitted it should read "non-sexual." The painter changed the word, and it remained until the following day, a source of great amusement to every fun-loving boomer. The managers finally caught on after being guyed for some time. The word was painted out and "Non-Sectarian" at last painted in. The institution never rose above the foundation walls and a few years ago the land was donated to the State for a Normal school. The sign was long since painted out but the joke remains as one of the memories of the Southern California boom.

Where Utility Is Tabu

The Carey Friedlanders are to join the Russian Hill colony which has been growing rapidly of late. Though the site is somewhat inaccessible, the rare views it affords are luring home-builders who appreciate scenery. The Pauls and the Polks were the first to seek this aerie retreat on account of its picturesque features, and then followed Mrs. Mary Curtis Richardson, the artist, and other kindred spirits. Mrs. Richardson built and moved into one of the three peaked-roofed houses on the pinnacle of the hill. One day a philistine friend of the artist called. She was shown over the house. After admiring the view from front and back windows, and inspecting the fittings and furnishings, she was asked her opinion of the place.

"It's very nice," she said, "but I'm wondering how you get your coal in. I don't see any back door."

Why the Rector Married

There is a haughty Southern dame in reduced circumstances, I hear, who was not among those to send congratulations when Miss Susanne Hayes announced her approaching marriage with Reverend Burr Weedon. The haughty Southern dame was housekeeper for St. Luke's idolized rector some time since and after three weeks' experience he decided that he could dispense with her services. Over such matters as whether she was or was not to sit at his table when he ate his meals, and the like, they failed to agree. Then the haughty Southern dame sent in an itemized bill for services rendered. It included breakfasts at twenty-five cents each.

"What's this item?" questioned the rector, pointing his ministerial forefinger at a line in the account.

"Those, sir, are your breakfasts. I did not agree to supply your matutinal meals."

"Ah, but," returned the clergyman, "surely you did not think of charging me for breakfasts cooked with my own coal."

And now the Guild ladies say that it was his horror of salaried housekeepers that led the good rector to take a second wife. He was a widower in good standing when he came to his present fold, and the picture of his first wife adorned his desk. Sighing spinsters averred that nothing could shake his devotion to that memory, but they found out their mistake.

The Baroness Coming Home

The Baroness von Schroeder is expected soon to rejoin her husband and she will bring the three children with her. It was for the sake of giving her children the benefit of a foreign education that the Baroness expatriated herself so long. Notwithstanding her long separation from her husband she is as much in love with him as ever. She never took any stock in those stories that were a feature of the racy libel suit. The Baron, meanwhile, is quite in the swim again as far as he cares to be. He is the guest of the Walter Martins when in town. They are his connections by marriage, as Walter's Aunt Annie was the step-mother of the Baroness.

A Californian Knickerbocker

The dailies had little to say about William Knickerbocker Van Alen, who died last week, yet he was the only member of the clan Knickerbocker in this State. He came hither via the Isthmus in '49, and his arrival and the way he laid the foundation of his fortune were matters he was fond of talking about. When he touched land here, he had but a dollar in his pocket. He was hungry and he determined to eat his fill even if it took his entire fund, which it did. After enjoying his square meal, Mr. Van Alen looked about for work. He saw some pepper sacks stacked up on the sidewalk and made a bargain with their owner to try and sell them. At the end of the day he had forty dollars and with this capital he laid the foundation of the modest fortune which he subsequently accumulated. It was believed at one time that he was quite rich but he did not leave more than fifty thousand dollars. A brother in New York, living on the family estates, is his heir, I believe. The old Knickerbocker was a cousin of J. J. Van Alen, the Newport plutocrat. He was chairman of the finance committee here when James Lick erected the first Pioneer hall, in Montgomery street between Jackson and Pacific. For fifty-four years he lived here and in all that time was absent only eight months from California.

They Made Him Dance

Mr. Samuel Adams of McClure's magazine came to town some days ago, and fell in with several of the local literary lights. They decided to give him a dinner at the Bohemian Club last Saturday night, and he had a sensational experience that he will not soon forget. Instead of the conventional glad-hand function by which so many visiting lions have been honored, Mr. Adams was given what will probably be chronicled in the Annals of Bohemia as a Wild West ovation. He appeared at the club in the gladdest of glad rags, believing of course that expansive immaculate shirt fronts were en regle, but on this occasion they were barred. Gelett Burgess, the Irwins—Wallace and Will—Lieutenant Howland and the other chaps that write, burst in upon Mr. Adams with a cowboy whoop-la, and he beheld them with amazement, for they wore red shirts, sombreros and the other features of a plainsman's attire. They viewed the tenderfoot from the East with frowns of disapproval, and just as Mr. Adams began to feel that a clawhammer was the hallmark of our effete civilization, the swaggering Bohemians drew big revolvers and commanding him to dance began firing blank cartridges at his feet. Mr. Adams danced. The Bohemians knew the guns weren't loaded, but Mr. Adams didn't. The fusilade created a big sensation in the club, and several of the members started for home. The police were notified that murder had been committed and they tried to break in. They have had some very queer functions at the Bohemian Club, but the Wild West ovation marked an epoch.

Ethyl as Zaza

Once more did Ethyl Hager astonish the smart set. Fancy the stately Ethyl in the role of "Zaza"! Even Orrin Peck in rich Japanese drapery was a mild sensation in comparison at the Spreckels ball. Society "did itself proud" at that ball. It will be talked of for many a day.

Southern Blood Boils Over

It is generally believed that it is dangerous to make Southern blood boil, but President Roosevelt appears to be calmly indifferent to the heating of that rich fluid. It simmered ominously when he invited Booker Washington to break bread with him and it began to sing when he appointed negro Crum to a Federal job in South Carolina. But it boiled over in Washington the other day when several negro men and women attended a reception in the White House. My correspondent informs me that indignation meetings were held all day at the capital. The presence of the negroes caused several Southern gentlemen, nearly all of whom are members of Congress, to leave the mansion in a huff, and indignant interviews with Southern Senators and Congressmen were wired to the Southern papers. The negroes who attended the reception were office holders in Washington and members of their families. Though negro officials are always invited to State receptions they never attended before. The indignant Southerners say that President Roosevelt had sought to force the equality of the races by inviting the negroes, and that they responded on account of his attitude on the negro question. Senator Tillman gave a studiously insulting interview to a Southern newspaper. Among other things he said: "I never expect to go to the White House while the present occupant resides there." In view of the character of Tillman, as revealed by his public utterances, the President was no doubt pleased when he learned of the Senator's announcement.

Norry and Therese

The matchmakers who are watching Therese Morgan and Norris Davis may find that in the case of those young people the usual signs are not infallible. Therese and Norris have a way of keeping Cupid himself guessing. When "Norry" Davis was at college he was devoted to Alice Rooney, the cousin of "Virgie" Vanderbilt and "Tessie" Oelrichs. She was the prettiest and best dressed girl of her class, and it was rumored at college that she was engaged to young Davis, but after he graduated she was the object of another college man's attentions. Then Dame Grundy insisted that "Norry" Davis was engaged to one of the Cole girls, and indeed there happened to be a pretty substantial peg to hang that rumor on. But the Spanish-American war came along and young Davis enlisted in the navy, and romance went a-glimmering to all appearances, though the officers did find him turning a little seal ring pretty often that he acknowledged "She" had sent him as a charm. But who She was they didn't find out. And now the gossips have it that "She" is short for Miss Therese Morgan. But having missed their guess so often in both Miss Morgan's and Mr. Davis's case it isn't a prophecy to bank on.

Mrs. Older's Novel

Funk & Wagnalls, the New York publishers, have announced that "The Socialist and The Prince," Mrs. Fremont Older's novel of Californian life during the days of the anti-Chinese labor agitation, will make its appearance in February. The frontispiece is by Harrison Fisher and will be used for poster purposes. The book will no doubt be eagerly read by people who recall the exciting days of Denis Kearney, days of dramatic and tragic episodes. As Mrs. Older obtained her material from Kearney himself her story should have historical value. One of Funk & Wagnalls' professional readers informed me that each of the three men who passed upon Mrs. Older's manuscript pronounced the story "a good romance with strong situations."

A Late Bud

One of the interesting buds who has bloomed rather late this season is Miss Helen Pettigrew, niece of the Misses Callaghan. Miss Pettigrew has returned from Europe too late to take part in the first turns of the winter whirl. Her aunt, Miss Florence Callaghan, gave a luncheon the other day and the family will undoubtedly entertain extensively for her as they have unlimited wealth. At one time all the Callaghan sisters were teachers in the public school here, but a brother who is an engineer has made a fortune over the million mark in Australia and the sisters have all resigned their teacherships. Mr. Callaghan was connected with the Rothschilds in the Australian deals so the venture was gold-lined from the beginning. The Downey-Harveys and the rest of the Catholic wing of society have taken Miss Pettigrew under their feathers so she is bound to go everywhere, making her bow under such patronage.

In the War Swim Again

Jimmie Alphabet Archibald has bobbed up again. He is in Venezuela, doing special correspondence for Collier's. Jimmie has done all sorts of war correspondence stunts since he followed the paper chase in San Rafael and was reported the fiance of Miss Clara Huntington. He was in Cuba and South Africa, and now Venezuela will give him a new chance for fame. When Jimmy went to Cuba, fresh from the paper chase, it was his first appearance in the role of a war correspondent, but he exhibited wonderful familiarity with the tricks of the trade, for in his first letters he posed himself as a hero with just as much skill as that displayed by Richard Harding Davis and other fanciful writers at the front. Among other achievements that he wrote about was the capture of a whole regiment of armed Spaniards that had sought refuge from the Paper Chaser in a church. He commanded them to lay down their arms and they did. No doubt they also fell on their knees and begged for mercy but Jimmy didn't humiliate them by telling about it.

(At the concert) "What would you call that voice?"

"I believe she belongs to the church choir class of contraltos."

"What do you mean:

Hubby was Her Manager

Poor Clara Morris, sick and financially embarrassed, is to have a benefit! Who that remembers the once famous actress in the heyday of her starring career does not feel his emotions stirred in reflecting upon her sad plight! But she is to have a benefit and as Bishop Potter, H. L. Havemeyer, William C. Whitney and other rich men are to assist in raising funds for her, no doubt her spirits as well as her fortune will soon be revived. Incidentally one F. C. Harriott will also be cheered up. I believe it was Ellen Terry who once remarked that the husband of an actress is invariably a parasite. Mr. Harriott is the husband of Clara Morris. He said in an interview the other day that the actress suffered reverses because she knew nothing of business. "She was devoted to her art," he said; "I always managed her." It would be interesting to know whether it was under his management that she played into the hands of the process servers, and whether having landed her there he now expects to share in the charitable donations. I am inclined to think that though the actress's sympathizers are working solely in her interests, the benefit will be most appreciated by her managerial husband.

"There's a woman in this town that knows 'something' on a man, and so far she has kept it a secret," says the Fort Scott Monitor.

"Wonderful!" says the New York Evening Sun.

Perhaps not. Perhaps the "something" involves the woman, too.

He Wasn't Mentioned

There is great indignation among the millionaires of the Pacific-Union Club, as well as among those members that worship wealth but have it not. Some time ago when Horace Platt decided to go East to make Chauncey Depew look like thirty cents at the New England Society's annual banquet at the Waldorf, he tried his speech on his admirers at the club. They agreed that it was the greatest ever.

"It's full of uppygrams," said one old chap.

"It's a regular bonmott," said another.

If Mr. Platt had been summoned from the plough to direct an Empire the club could not have been prouder of him. He went East, and made his speech, but the New York papers failed to mention it. Mr. Platt was not even mentioned as "among those present." Hence the indignation.

Oratorical Fireworks

A fine brand of oratory was uncorked at the Pacific-Union Club the other night on the occasion of the banquet given by the Scotts to their employer, Mr. Nixon, of the Shipbuilders' trust. The rules of syntax floated away on the hot-air zephyrs with which Mr. Nixon was fatuously fanned, and even the waiters blushed at the indecent spectacle of singular nouns holding illegitimate intercourse with plural verbs in a feverish struggle to beget bastard sentences. Mr. Henry T. Scott was the presiding genius of the banquet, and he undertook to recite the history of the Union Iron Works from the days of the Donahues down to the builders of the Oregon. If Mr. Nixon should take it into his head that Mr. Scott was as raw a hand at shipbuilding as he is at postprandial speaking he would discharge him before the end of the week. The event of the evening was contributed by Mr. T. C. Van Ness, a lawyer who hailed Mr. Nixon as a trust magnate. The Van Ness gem warranted the suspicion that the speaker had been retained by the defense to prove that trusts constitute the greatest blessing of modern civilization. Strange to say, his argument failed to arouse enthusiasm even in the Pacific-Union Club, though somebody suggested that Mr. Van Ness should have filed a brief. The jester of the evening was that inimitable wit, Mr. Claus Spreckels, who jocularly flouted the railroad, evoking a felicitous response from that versatile gentleman, Mr. E. O. McCormick, who is always interesting and who is gradually succeeding in making the Southern Pacific popular.

VIENNA MODEL BAKERY.

One of the points of interest at the Centennial Exhibition of 1876 was that of the "Vienna Model Bakery and Restaurant." In fact it did not require a very brainy board of judges to decide that the "Vienna Model Bakery" was a decided addition to the enterprises of this country. And when, after a discussion of the pros and cons in the case, in which the inner man's opinion was a decided factor, the Gold Medal and Highest Award were bestowed on this venture without a single dissenting vote. One year later, in 1877, the Vienna Model Cafe and Restaurant was opened in this city and from the start made a hit. It has always commanded the highest class of trade, in fact never encouraged any other. During the luncheon hour one sees the smartest people in town headed for the corner of Post and Kearny streets. Drop in and you will be perfectly at home with your surroundings. At one table a matinee luncheon is being given—another table is graced by the judges of the Superior Court, who always make it a point to lunch at the "Vienna." But with increased prosperity has come a trifle of inconvenience to the restaurant's patrons, for they are sadly crowded for room. The management therefore now announces a move where the restaurant facilities will be more than doubled. About January thirtieth they will occupy the premises at 222 and 224 Sutter street, next to Goldberg, Bowen & Co.'s, where they will be in position to properly welcome their patrons. After twenty-five years of continuous catering to the public, they believe they are in position to serve it better than their many imitators; for, like all business successes, they have copyists. However, somebody said "imitation is the sincerest form of flattery," so remember that after January thirtieth the Vienna Model Cafe and Restaurant will be found at 222 and 224 Sutter street.

When He was Baptized

Captain and Mrs. Percy Kessler left on the sixteenth for Fort Flagler, after a short visit with Mrs. Kessler's mother, Mrs. Cunningham. While here the Kesslers had their eleven months old baby christened. When the clergyman put the water on the little fellow's head, the infant looked up into his face, laughed and cooed "Good."

A Great Sire's Progeny

Although the Jesse Grants with their daughter, Miss Nell Grant, have come from San Diego to San Francisco to live permanently, they are not much spoken of in society on account of their being in mourning for Mr. Grant's mother, Mrs. U. S. Grant. They go absolutely nowhere, and on account of the sad event will probably not be seen in the gay world this season. The sons of the immortal General Grant, Ulysses S. Jr. and Jesse, inherit their father's profile and ambitions, but not a sprinkling of his genius. Jesse first came to public notice during General Grant's tour of the world. At that time "little Jesse Grant" was about nine years old, but despite his tender years was taken everywhere with his distinguished papa. Among other things he was introduced to the motherly Queen Victoria. Several times since his settlement in San Diego county he has entered politics in a small way and during the Bryan campaign he was subject to considerable ragging by reason of his having changed his political coat three times in as many months. Political success, indeed, does not seem to be with the Grants, as witness the consistent inability of U. S. Grant to get himself elected for anything. A few years ago he ran for Senator and was billed as a big gun, mostly on account of his wealth and his surprising facial resemblance to the Hero of Appomattox; but when it came to public appearances he failed to make good, as his voice was scarcely audible and his carefully prepared speeches fell flat. It is said that he intends to make another try for Senatorial honors next term, but the auspices are not favorable for his victory. He failed to nominate his man for Congress at the Republican convention at Sacramento last year and some of his best wires were snapped on that disastrous occasion.

Tit for Tat

It is a curious tendency of the times to place religious dramas on the stage just when the pulpit is resorting to all sorts of theatrical stunts in order to induce congregations to attend services. Within a very short period there have been presented the "Eternal City," "The Christian," "The Cardinal," "Ben Hur," "Quo Vadis" and "Mary of Magdala," in addition to the revival of the old miracle plays, "Everyman," "Bethlehem" and "Paradise Lost." The sensational preachers laid aside religious teachings on the supposition that if they treated topics of the times they would rival the playhouses and political meetings in the size of the audiences they would draw. The result was that the people went for their secular amusement to the places where by an inherited instinct they felt it should be furnished. Sunday night theatrical performances flourished and Sunday evening services were neglected. Anathema and denunciation did not affect results. Between paying a fixed price for admission to a good show at a theatre, and witnessing a poor one free, the preponderance of opinion was in favor of the legitimate performance. Now the theatres have turned the tables neatly, and it remains to see how the pulpit will like the innovation. A religious drama produced in a theatre by competent actors is decidedly more dignified and impressive than a political speech by a pulpit demagogue in church, set off by whistling solos and recitations "in costume."

Greenway's Latest Rival

Baron von Horst is treading on "Ned" Greenway preserves. Others have tried that before and have lived to regret. The baron is laboring under the delusion that he ranks any mere commercial man of the Greenway variety, and he is getting up the Bachelors' ball. And he has utterly ignored Mr. Greenway. But "our Ned" has no intention of being sidetracked by an interloper. Indeed I am told that he has decided to boycott the Bachelors' ball. However it is the women rather than the men who make the ball go, and the patronesses being of the front rank assure its success. In getting up his list of patronesses, the projector of the ball stole a march on Greenway, but it remains to be seen what sort of a crowd will attend, it being known that the support of society's leader has been withdrawn.

Why Masks Were Barred

Speaking of balls, I am reminded that it is to Dan Cupid we are indebted indirectly for the rescinding of the edict of the Mardi Gras ball directors against masks for men's faces. To go back to ancient history, after one of the Mardi Gras balls of the yester seasons, it was discovered that oil and water had mixed somehow. The vise committee were severely censured for allowing any loopholes, and there was a merry din about their ears. At the next Mardi Gras there were conspicuously few young society girls and among those guarded at home were the Hopkins girls, Mary Scott and Caro Crockett. As their fathers were on the committees it was considered an earnest of bad faith to have denied the ball the social prestige of these exclusive young women. When a certain papa whose daughters were not present was questioned he said, "Oh, well, it's all right enough to bring our wives but we can't really let our daughters come." Called upon to explain he said that what he meant was that it wouldn't be right to let their daughters dance with maskers who might not belong to their set. So the next season the masks were barred so that the society girls could attend without fear of contamination. Since then the girls whose social fortune was so carefully conserved have married, and hereafter masks are to be permitted.

The next bottle of whisky you buy resolve to try the "Jesse Moore." You've heard it was the best; prove it by practical test.

A Daily Question

How often a woman asks herself, What can I do to retain my youthful appearance without fear of criticism and injury to myself? For while all ladies wish to look beautiful, no woman can afford to use artificial means that would in any way detract from her refinement, as is the case by the use of powders and lotions which can not be put upon the face without being noticed.

Mme. Idaline's Face Cream is different from all other face preparations. It beautifies at once, preserves the skin, can be used without the slightest injury, and at the same time being invisible.

The Official Announcement

It has officially announced that the Mardi Gras ball will be held on February twenty-fourth and preparations for this important event in the social year have already begun at the Art Institute. The various Committees have been appointed. The Executive Committee which has general authority in the management of affairs consists of the members of the Board of Directors, Mr. Willis E. Davis, president of the Association, being chairman. Sir Henry Heyman has charge of the music, Mr. Edward M. Greenway is chairman of the Floor Committee and Mr. Newton J. Tharp and Mr. Ernest C. Peixotto will superintend the decorations. It is officially decreed that men and women will be allowed to mask. The grand march begins at ten and supper will be served at half-past eleven for the accommodation of those who wish to keep early hours. Several of the boxes have already been sold although the invitations will not be sent out until the coming week.

That Dresden Tragedy

An official of the American consular service writes me from Vienna some interesting news, comment and gossip apropos of the latest chronique scandaleuse that is agitating the courts, consciences and tongues of half the royal families of Europe. "The flight of the Crown Princess of Saxony," he writes, "caused consternation in nearly every court. The fact is that signs are pretty plain that within the last few years a spirit of revolt has entered within royal and imperial circles, and made itself specially manifest in families where the children are numerous and discipline is severe. In the older days wars could be relied upon to dispose early of superfluous Princes; and unnecessary Princesses could always be placed in convents or shelved by some other convenient method. Disgraceful love affairs could be hushed by the removal of the inferior party. In these days sovereigns are reluctant to run the gauntlet of public opinion in dealing with frisky relatives. Moreover democracy sympathizes with Highnesses who have wearied of etiquette and the trammels of rank, and who prefer to cast their lot with the crowd. Universal sympathy is being expressed for the Crown Princess, it being rumored that if she had not eloped she would have been sent to a maison de sante. It appears that she was extremely disliked at the strait-laced Dresden court, because of her unconventional ways. She would never conform to the etiquette required of her. One of her characteristic misdemeanors that shocked people was the waving of her hand to friends in the audience when she occupied her box at the opera.

Her Own Frank Statement

"Picture to yourself a bright, healthy, active, essentially modern, high spirited and handsome young Princess, plunged into the gloom and austerity, the dull monotony and severity of a court conducted on the lines of an abbey. With such an environment and in such an uncongenial atmosphere, with, it is alleged, a husband who was not only notoriously unfaithful but also positively brutal to her, and at a time when her state of health called for the greatest care, the poor Princess was offered the alternative of a convent or a madhouse. No wonder there is consternation in European courts in view of the sidelights that have been thrown on this startling romance, few of the facts of which will ever reach the American press. The Princess has been frank in revealing the secrets of her unhappiness. Her statement to a British journalist contained these significant words: 'The opening hour of marriage, so blessed for so many, to me was an hour accursed; it was the first minute of indescribable shame. What there was behind the thick curtains of blue velvet, I knew too well: it was sorrow, it was brutality, it was insult. Later—quite lately—it was even worse * * * it was depravity. I can see my husband now, looking at me with an abstracted air as might a drunken man look at the glass with which he has made himself drunk and which fills him with disgust.' Anybody who knows life can read between those lines and understand that this is one of those tragedies the details of which may be whispered in the consulting room of the physician but can never be publicly discussed. No wonder the question is asked, What is to come of it all?"

Her Aunt's Niece

Mrs. Will Crocker has a niece after her own heart in the person of Miss Elsie Sperry. Mrs. Crocker is one of the few women in society who have sense enough not to take our social push seriously. Naturally a woman of her independence makes enemies, and I have heard that she is rather proud of her capacity in that respect. Elsie Sperry has the temperament of her aunt. Though she is not a poseur her latest fad is to be late at dinner. She enjoys hearing some one say, "The dinner or luncheon was a half or three-quarters of an hour late because Miss Sperry did not come." All this winter the debutante hostesses have been frantic because Miss Sperry would not put in an appearance until a little later than the last moment. They lately organized a union to attack the grub without her.

Why They Missed the Durbar

Many people have wondered why Miss Bonynge, the adopted daughter of the California millionaire, missed the oriental splendors of the durbar where Daisy Leiter Curzon succeeded in shining so brilliantly in the limelight. Miss Bonynge married Viscount Deerhurst and it will be remembered the Viscount's beautiful sister married Dhuleep Singh, descendant of the Grand Mogul and the richest princes of India. Letters to friends here tell of the recent financial failure of the Prince and his retirement from social life till he can revive his income. He still has an income, however, of some fifty thousand dollars a year. It may be amusing to the polloi for anyone to claim that such a sum is insufficient to live on but the Prince insists that it is not enough to properly maintain his establishment in these days of durbars and splendor: hence his retirement.

Looted His Immense Fortune

This marriage of Miss Bonynge linked her family with one of the most famous princely houses of India. When the British captured Delhi they found the grandfather of the present Prince a foundling, then three years old, amid the overturned splendors of the main temple. They promptly confiscated the foundling's fortune, amounting in those days to over seventy million dollars. Among the jewels seized was the great Koh-i-noor diamond, now the chief crown jewel of the British Empire. When the father of the present Prince reached his majority the Government allowed him an annual income of half a million dollars to recompense him in a measure for the fortune taken from his family. He moved to Suez and married a beautiful Swiss girl. The couple lived there in royal splendor for a number of years. This was ended by his returning to India and leading an unsuccessful insurrection against the government. His heart went out in this burst of patriotism and he died very soon after the failure. After his death the government gave a pension to his two daughters and the present Prince. The latter was given a splendid education. He has won considerable reputation for himself in the world of letters. He set up a splendid establishment after his marriage with Lady Anne Coventry, the sister-in-law of our Miss Bonynge. However his brilliant social talents are offset by poor financial ability and his investments have become so tangled that his income is reduced to a beggarly fifty thousand dollars a year.

One of the most serious-minded girls in society is Miss Kip who, since she went into mourning, has been devoting herself to physical culture.

In the County of Marin where all the paper-chasers dwell
There's a region of combustion and it's known as San Rafael.
There the fire-bug haunts the gloaming with his little sulphur match,
There he comes when none suspect him, in a manner hard to catch—
Pretty fire-bugs, dainty fire-bugs, see them streaking through the gloam;
Hurry, hurry, San Rafaelite, if you'd save your happy home!

In the County of Marin where all the paper-chasers dwell
There's a fire-insurance belt and it is known as San Rafael.
There with liquid fire-extinguisher they irrigate the land,
There the tired commuter watches with a garden hose in hand—
Pretty fire-bugs, dainty fire-bugs, see them flitting through the gloam;
Man the pumps, poor San Rafaelite, if you'd save your happy home!

In the County of Marin where still the paper-chase is rife,
Do not play with oil or matches if you value limb and life;
Pity still the poor commuter who is pining for that shore
Where insurance ceases troubling and the fire-bug burns no more—
Pretty fire-bugs, dainty fire-bugs, lighting matches in the gloam,
Just to make a splendid bonfire of your happy rural home.

The Plaything of Fortune

That versatile chap, Tom Lyden, is still amusing himself and diverting the public with his surprising pranks. Lyden has succeeded to a title since he was here and is now Lord Lyveden of Northamptonshire. Of all the freaks of topsy-turvey-land he is the most singular. He and his ilk and the American heiress-chasers serve far better than Debrett to illustrate the patchwork character of the modern English nobility. Fortune high or fortune low, though, we may feel assured that Tom Lyden will don his vestments of the House of Lords and uphold the British Empire with the same serenity of mind and easy confidence that he displayed when "slinging hash" here in a Post street restaurant. I first met him in a local restaurant in the late eighties. When the rush was over and he had time he'd loiter about the table, rubbing up the tableware, and talk about his adventures and expectations. At that time I regarded his "expectation" yarns as artistic flights in pure blarney, adroitly aired for snaring sundry quarters and half-dollars under the disguise of loans. But time proved his tales true.

Played Many Parts in Life

Lyden started on his kaleidoscopic career as a private soldier. Once discharged he foregathered with a troop of strolling mountebanks and tramped and starved and tore tricks and tragedies to pieces over all England. Then the fairy came into his life that lured him to America. She abandoned him on a reef of wretchedness and he wandered about as a waiter, a nursery gardener, a coachman, steward on a coastwise steamer, book agent, and back into his old calling of actor. He came out to Southern California on a land scheme that went up in air. When he came down he fell into the place of waiter in a Post street restaurant. Later on, by great good luck, he hitched on to a theatrical company going East. The last I heard of him he was caterer to the General Steam Navigation Company. The next big shift in his changeful life was his elevation to the title of Lord Lyveden. I hear now that the thespian spirit is still so strong in him that he has locked up his castle and gone off touring the provinces, where he is giving highly successful readings.

French Novels and Cigarettes

There was a time when the nouveau riche deemed a well stocked library essential to the tone of a home. The supposition was that books bespoke culture in a home even though they weren't read. But the multi-millionaires of today are too well satisfied with themselves to affect culture. There are so many things to occupy the attention of the New York smart set that its members do not bother about books. A Californian who visited the Clarence Mackays at Rosslyn, Long Island, some time ago informs me that in the "library" of the palatial residence she observed a small secretary covered with cheap sensational novels. On a table was one English book, Gertrude Atherton's "The Conquerer." It was open and at a page containing a reference to "Lady Kitty Duer." There were no other volumes in the vast "library." It may be interesting to learn that young Mrs. Mackay has a bath-tub carved out of onyx, and that the floor of the room is covered with white fur. The chairs of her mauve boudoir are draped with ermine, and in the sitting room of the boudoir is a table covered with smokers' articles. Some years ago Mrs. Mackay was the enfant terrible of Newport. By the way she is expecting another visit from the stork.

Elopement Echoes

Echoes of the Parrott-Whitney elopement are still to be heard. The sudden departure of Mr. and Mrs. Louis Parrott for the South is said to be due not only to a desire to flee the scene of the late unpleasantness, but also to nip another romance in the bud. Mrs. Parrott has another daughter, and she has resolved not to be caught napping a second time. I hear that the Parrotts were greatly distressed over the solecism of the young people in remaining in town to receive the congratulations of their friends, and even accepting a dinner in their honor given by Frank Goad at the Bohemian Club. It is the conventional notion that young people should sequester themselves for a few days after marriage. However a young girl cannot be the heroine of a romance every day, and young Mrs. Whitney should not be criticised for remaining in the limelight a day or two.

The Commercial Job-Chaser

The merchants of San Francisco have entered a protest at Sacramento against the confirmation of Harbor Commissioner McKenzie. They contend that some business man of this city should get the job. This concerted action on the part of the merchants is no doubt in the interest of some sage of Sansome street who is longing to get both feet into the public trough. Experience has proved that downtown merchants are not the most faithful of public servants. In nine cases out of ten the mercantile job-chaser is not a successful business man. The successful business man has no time to devote to politics unless he is a crook and hopes to prostitute public office in the interest of his private business.

Those Sycophantic Scribblers

There is nothing more amusing these days to readers than certain dailies whose social columns reek with rapturous laudation distilled by sundry sycophants, puerile proneurs and truckling touts. To those on the inside who know that the servile and inane adulation is not the work of journalists, and who are aware of the identity of the gush slingers, those social columns are more wearisome than amusing. In nearly every instance the work is done by a woman who is in society or on the edge engaged in climbing, and by close interlinear attention one can easily discern the ambitions of the writer. Undoubtedly a great deal of their fulsome flattery is disgusting even to those upon whom it is bestowed. I should imagine, for instance, that Mrs. Eleanor Martin, who is a sensible woman, did not enthuse over the notice she received in the Post the other night from the young lady who is the daughter of a late distinguished physician, and who edits the social column of that paper. She referred to Mrs. Martin as the Mrs. Astor of San Francisco and mentioned her "Ducet" gown of white Valenciennes, "trimmed with ropes of jet, which is so becoming to the style of our charming hostess." In another issue of the same paper Mrs. McClung was referred to as "ever so charming" and so bright and vivacious as to make one think of her as a sister of Miss Gladys and Miss Alma. Rather tough on Gladys and Alma, I should say, but it is a significant fact that both Mrs. McClung and Mrs. Martin are patronesses of the Bachelors' balls. Perhaps they can take a hint.

Some Samples of Gush

In the Bulletin the other night, the lady gusher wrote up one of the young women in the smart set as having worn a certain gown in which she looked "more beautiful than ever." Now it happens that this particular young woman is the reverse of good looking. Even her own mother, if she were alive, would think it a josh if anybody told her that her daughter was beautiful, yet the gusher had the nerve to write of her as "more beautiful than ever." A few nights later I found this in the social chat: "Mrs. Henry T. Scott was at her very best and this is saying much. Only once has she ever looked so handsome, and that was at the Mardi Gras ball last year where she led a little coterie of friends across the hall, and so interested were the spectators in watching her that only when the party was seated was the fact recognized that in this party were New Yorkers, who lead all that is swell and chic in New York and Newport." Now wouldn't that, as they say at the Orpheum, rattle your slats? Is it possible that our provincial aristocrats are so rattle-brained as to eat that sort of stuff? If not I should suggest that they sign a round-robin to the editor asking him please to desist.

To banish the blues nothing is so efficacious as a drink of Chapin & Gore's Old Reserve bourbon or rye.

Her Second Engagement

"She's no longer, then, too young to marry," was the the comment of some of Dorothy Heyneman's friends when her engagement with Leon Greenbaum was announced. And thereby hangs a tale. For there was a time, about two years ago, when Papa and Mamma Heyneman said that Dolly must not think of marrying yet. It is imagined that her present choice of a husband suits the parents better than the first. It will be remembered what a stir was caused in smart Jewish circles about the time of President McKinley's visit when Miss Heyneman's engagement with young Harry Stephens of Governor Nash's party was announced. Stephens was described as a multi-millionaire and all sorts of good things. Everybody was congratulating the Heynemans and Dorothy—and then the engagement was declared off. "Our daughter's extreme youth," was the reason given. Young Stephens went back to Ohio. and the story was told that he wasn't a multi-millionaire at all, but just the rich Stephens's cousin. He had not masqueraded in the character, the honors simply having been thrust upon him by the newspapers who had heard of his cousin and confounded the two. Leon Greenbaum, who is to marry the bewitching Dorothy, is considered one of our most eligible young men. Many a Christian society girl has turned longing eyes in his direction. He is a cousin of Louis Sloss and is an amateur actor much in demand at society vaudeville affairs.

There was a whisper buzzing through Society that an engagement would be announced at the Spreckels tea which would astonish the natives. It was not made, but gossip says it is only a question of time.

Three Charming Sisters

For the first time in several years the three charming daughters of the late Mrs. Hall McAllister are to be here together. The youngest of the sisters, Mrs. Pritchard, will soon arrive from the East on a visit to her eldest sister, Dr. Henry Wagner's wife. Marion McAllister first married Lieutenant Everett E. Wise of the U. S. Navy and after his death married her present husband. Edith, the second sister, married Frank Newlands. She is a brilliantly accomplished woman, having been educated in Europe under the care of her aunt, Mrs. Harry Palmer, whom old Californians remember as the beautiful Alice Herman. Mrs. Newlands is now at the Palace and will remain to greet her youngest sister, Eva, familiarly styled "Jack" by the family. She married a Harvard professor named Pritchard.

Parisian Impressions

Mrs. Marriner Campbell told the ladies of the California Club, the other day, what she saw and heard in the musical studios of Paris. She found much that is meretricious in the musical atmosphere of Paris, a mawkish sentimentality in the music of the day, and a lack of religious feeling even in so-called sacred compositions. She was touched to find so many vocal wrecks among girl students, and counseled aspirants for musical fame to study at home unless they have voices beyond question, thorough training, a good general education, fine health, at least a grounding in French, German and Italian, and in addition an income sufficient to maintain them for five years. With all these advantages a girl may succeed, without them she must face discouragement, failure, and perhaps vocal and moral death. The gist of her advice was, "Keep your girls at home." Mrs. Campbell referred to the peculiarities of French teachers, their excitability and quick temper, their craze for big tones leading to forcing of the voice, and also to the modern demand for temperament and dramatic interpretation, to which the finer qualities of freshness and bloom are sacrificed. Through the kindness of Emma Nevada, Mrs. Campbell enjoyed an entree into the studio of Madame Marchesi, and she gave an interesting description of this remarkable woman, now eighty-four years of age. She also visited the studios of Bouhy, Sbriglia and Duvernoy. In the advanced classes she met many Americans and some Californians, among others Alexia Bassian, formerly of Fresno, now the wife of a prominent Londoner. It is difficult for the French to conceive of anything good outside of Paris, and the number of American prize winners fills them with astonishment.

"Mrs. Gossip can speak several languages."
"But her tongue is longest in her own."

To Wed a Baltimore Belle

Announcement has been made of the engagement of Miss Mollie Lee of Baltimore and Mr. W. M. Randall of this city. Miss Lee belongs to the inner circle of old families in Maryland, she is popular in society and spends much time in the hunting field. Her fiance is the son of J. B. Randall, one of the early settlers of this State. He is a graduate of Harvard and is a member of the University Club. He is very popular in commercial and club circles.

A Stockton Romance

The opening of the Hewlett will in Stockton created the sensation I predicted, for it left everything to his wife and the daughter by a former marriage. But the sensation was short-lived for it was found the next day that all the other relatives, including the sporty nephew, had been remembered with gifts of twenty thousand dollars each before the banker died. There was a bit of romance in the life of Mrs. Hewlett which the gossips are recalling now that she is a wealthy widow. When she came home from boarding school, years ago, fresh and pretty, Mr. Hewlett, then a widower and thirty years her senior, fell in love with her and proceeded to woo her. But the heart of Eva Reed had been won by a young naval officer whom she had met while a student. However, she was prevailed upon to entertain a proposition from her wealthy wooer, and the supposition has been that it was her ambitious mamma who made the match. Mrs. Hewlett proved a faithful and devoted wife, nursing her aged husband in his last illness with patient care. Meanwhile the jilted naval officer took unto himself a wife, but it is said that he is now a widower and is stationed on this coast.

Prima Facie Evidence

The despatches assure us that May Yohe is going to supply the house of Strong with an heir, and that she went away because she objected to having her child born under the American flag. The birth of a child will no doubt afford Mrs. Strong satisfaction, for it was her failure to furnish Lord Hope with an heir that caused the first breach in their domestic relations. Like the Czar of Russia, Lord Hope declared it was his wife's fault that no heir to the house of Newcastle was forthcoming. And she believed him. If the Associated Press is correctly informed, then Lord Hope owes his former wife an apology.

Judge—Why did you leave your husband?

Madame D. Vorseeker—On account of our compatibility of temperament.

Judge—That's an odd cause of action; explain yourself.

Madame D. Vorseeker—Well, your Honor, we are both of the artistic temperament. He is a pianist and I am a vocalist, and he constantly accused me of getting off the key.

Judge—The wretch. Mr. Clerk, enter tne decree as prayed for.

That Moxey Case

While the Moxey trial continues it is the earnest purpose of the defendants to prove that no coercion was used upon Mrs. Phillips in order to get her money in the hands of the foxy Moxey with a string of Culture Institute degrees as long as his arm. Indeed the "young couple" are now living in an uptown boarding house as happily as two cooing doves. They are inseparable and their attitude toward each other would make it appear that a discrepancy of a mere score or so of years between the youngness of the husband and the oldness of the wife has not the least influence on conjugal happiness. Still there are those who declare that when the weak-minded old lady first fell into the clutches of the physical culturists, billing and cooing was not considered a necessary ceremony in the Moxey dovecote. In fact it is asserted that Moxey seriously, nay, cruelly neglected his doting bride as soon as he considered her liberal dowry safe in his hands. It is further claimed that the groom gave Mrs. Moxey hardly enough to appease her hunger while he himself dined in style at the grill of the Palace hotel. Mrs. Moxey, it is said, appeared frequently at the Market street institution kept by a friend and wept audibly at the coldness of her gay consort. If Moxey keeps possession of the grandam whom he so ingeniously lured into holy ties it is easy to see what his treatment of her will be as soon as the matter is out of the courts. This is a mere scrap of the inside history of a matrimonial deal the cold-bloodedness of which makes the ordinary marriage for money appear like an idyllic love romance of the sentimental school. It seems that the goryest passages of the Moxey tragedy were never without their elements of humor. It is said that Moxey and friend daily sallied forth in considerable state to dine at the Saint Nicholas and that Moxey prefaced his departure by handing his wife fifteen cents with which to buy herself something at the delicatessen store.

To My Pipe

Come down, old fellow! with shame-bowed head
I take you up from your dusty bed;
I feel regret and a just remorse,
And curse myself and my vapid course,
That I, the dolt, could have put you by
For a woman's whim and a woman's sigh.

Come down, old fellow! we meet again;
Today is not what the time was, when
I thrust you back in the shadows dim
In deference to a woman's whim.
No wondrous maid that the world e'er knew
Could chain a man to her heart like you.

Come down, old fellow! What, friend! think you
That any woman could part us two?
What fervid kisses from scarlet lips
Could thrill me thus to my finger tips?
Dear, brown old fellow, I bless the sprite
That gave me freedom, and you, tonight.

Why Not?

Miss Pearline Scrubem, one of last year's buds,
Still shines resplendent with unfaded charms;
And yet they seem suggestive of the suds
That seethed around her Mama's beefy arms
Some years ago when, bending o'er the tub,
She whacked the washboard daily for her grub.

But daddy died, and left behind a pile,
Got, God knows how! but it was big enough
To set the Scrubems up in splendid style
And work the customary social bluff
That somehow, where the wealth is, always wins,
Though many a guest behind his napkin grins.

But "Pearly" as they call her in the "set,"
Remembers little of those drudging days,
Or if she does, she struggles to forget.
She knows that thinking of them never pays;
The lineage that she to the laundry owes
Is never seen in her superb repose.

She's been abroad and there was taught the tone
That makes less favored belles with envy burn.
She gained the Court and bent before the throne
Of England's Ruler; and since her return
She seems as though "unto the manner born."
Though Papa came as cook "around the Horn."

Her Mama stays discreetly where she's told
And deftly dons the dowagerian air.
Nursing her swollen knuckles that of old
Of alkali and labor had their share,
She gives them, now and then, a furtive rub
And dreams, no doubt, of Scrubem and the tub.

But Pearly's panther form and faultless face—
Her laughing lips and shoulders like the snows—
Her beauty and her boodle—show no trace
Of that white soapy sea from which she rose.
Did not the Myth men love rise from a flood
Of fleecy foam? Why not this last year's bud?

Reciprocity

"It is not a difficult matter to prophesy that the wedding gifts will be very numerous as well as very costly, as Miss —— has a number of friends, many of them very wealthy, and no one is more generous in the giving of engagement and wedding presents than Mrs. —— and her daughter have always been."

Extract from Madame Gossip's Chat.

Miss Blank, the bride-to-be, to her mother: Well mamma, the presents are beginning to come in. Let's see whether they have done as well by us as we by them in times past.

Mrs. Blank (tears wrapper from package): "Mrs. Larry Rot's best wishes"—a sugar spoon!

Miss B.: And she with her millions! Why, mamma, how mean of her, when I gave her a set of cut-glass individual butter-plates. What did Larry send?

Mrs. B.: Nothing—his card is with hers.

Miss B.: Why, I thought they were good for a diamond tiara, at least. Well, here's something (opens another package). "With congratulations of Miss Dollars and Miss Grace Dollars"—a jardiniere!

Mrs. B.: I saw them at Swale's marked down to $1.45 on Monday. What did we give Grace when she announced her engagement?

Miss B.: Don't you remember, mother? It was at the linen shower—half a dozen beautiful hand-embroidered and hem-stitched bed sets.

Mrs. B.: Such stinginess. But it takes those women with long bank accounts to be mean.

Miss B.: Here's Daisy Moneyed's gift—you know the rare old lace shawl I gave her, and that set of porcelain dishes you gave—well, here's her return, two lace pocket handkerchiefs! I'll wager they were part of her trousseau.

Mrs. B.: Never mind, look at these lovely coffee spoons, aren't they sweet—"love and best wishes from Mildred."

Miss B.: Oh, Mildred Jones, that little cousin of Daisy Moneyed. Why, I never gave her a thing in my life, and didn't even ask her to the wedding.

Mrs . B.: You had her at your tea to help pour, remember.

Miss B.: And this is the way she shows her gratitude. Poor little thing, she hasn't a nickel to bless herself with, either. See, mamma, what a difference. Look at Isabel Heiress's present—another jardiniere, as I live, one of those Jap affairs that are worth about seventy-five cents net. And think of all we did for her—launched her in the swim, you might say!

Mrs. B.: You can never figure on anything. Here's the rest—

They tear the wrappers off packages, and the new ones constantly arriving.

Miss B. (noting results with pencil and pad): Twenty-six sugar spoons, thirty-eight jardinieres, three clocks, sixteen lace handkerchiefs, fourteen pickle forks, three sets coffee spoons, twenty cut-glass bonbon dishes, two engravings, one set wine glasses, six punch bowls, four jeweled hat-pins, one Hawaiian necklace, seventeen Indian baskets, five carved hall chairs, fourteen odd spoons for bonbons, salted almonds, etc., four silver-mounted toilet sets.

Mrs. B.: Well, I guess you'll have to furnish your house yourself. And think what we gave to these people!

Miss B.: Yes, mamma, I wish I had back that sweet grand piano we gave Ruby Brown, that pearl necklace Mamie Green is wearing, that lovely divan in old rose brocade that's in Jennie Robinson's drawing room and some of those elegant dinner sets we've wasted on these jardiniere givers. What will I do with them all, anyway?

Mrs. B.: Save them, of course, and give them as wedding presents to the next set of brides!

Large Audiences Attend the Tyndall Lectures

San Franciscans are generally considered as rather a materialistic lot and it is refreshing to find that we are "within the pale" even if we do not come up to the psychic atmosphere of Boston. Every seat in Steinway hall was filled last Sunday night at Dr. McIvor-Tyndall's lecture on "The Power of Thought." It was undoubtedly one of the most interesting yet given by the thought-reader and his audience was composed of representative citizens of the city. Dr. Tyndall holds that it is to the West, rather than to India, that the world must look for a scientific basis from which to study psychic phenomena and make practical its disclosures. Tomorrow night Dr. Tyndall lectures on "Palmistry: It's Relation to Character Building." The lecture will be illustrated with stereopticon views of famous hands. Views of the hands of many well-known men and women of San Francisco and the State will also be shown, and their characteristics and tendencies pointed out, from the shape and lines of their hands. The State's Chief Executive and many others of the State and city Administrations will be represented. The lecture is sure to prove attractive to a large number of persons, and extra seating capacity has been arranged for. The following Sunday night, February eighth, Tyndall will talk on "The Force of Suggestion; the Art of Mental Self-Defence."

"Yes, she's pretty gay but not half so gay as her daughter."

"Well, she never had the advantages of an education at a fashionable seminary."

"I don't blame her for playing a character part," remarked Mrs. Roastem at the Spreckels ball. "Why shouldn't she accentuate the ugliness of such a face?"

The Confessions of a Divorcee

Chicago, June 1, 1898.

Montague and I have had our first honeymoon quarrel. He wears such ridiculous ties that I am sure we shall never be happy together. Shall see an attorney today.

Mrs. Montague Swift.

Chicago, June 2, 1898.

Mr. Barker, my attorney, has settled everything with the judge and we will depart for South Dakota tomorrow.

Mrs. Montague Swift.

Alimony, S. D., June 5, 1898.

Mr. Barker accompanied me to South Dakota to see that all was O. K. To save embarrassment we were married before returning.

Mrs. Biten Barker.

Chicago, June 6, 1898.

See that Montague was married today to Mrs. Scott Hyball, ex-wife of Judge Hyball who divorced us. Am surprised at Montague's fickleness.

Mrs. Biten Barker.

San Francisco, December 19, 1899.

Am free again—grounds, desertion on both sides. By the way, I see that Judge Hyball has married the woman who divorced Biten Barker before me. Let me see: if Montague Swift, my first husband, marries the former wife of Judge Hyball, and Judge Hyball marries the first wife of my last divorced husband, Biten Barker, then I must be related to—but what's the use?

Mrs. Eleanor Barker.

Reno, Nev. Jan. 3, 1900

While on a little bridal tour with my latest, Gustav Blase, former husband of the present Mrs. Montague Swift, we had quite a pleasant little surprise on the car going out of Reno. I noticed a familiar figure in the seat in front of us, and looking closer, saw that it was Judge Hyball with the latest divorced wife of Biten Barker. I was scandalized at the impropriety of the two traveling alone, when I was told that they had come to Reno to be married. How stupid of me not to have guessed it! I rather admire Judge Hyball. Maybe I feel kindly toward him because I am related to him through several strata of divorce.

Mrs. Gustav Blase.

San Francisco, March 9, 1900.

Montague Swift appeared on the scene today, just in time to avert my eloping to Reno with Judge Hyball. I liked the color of his tie this time, and after a short talk with him I decided to let bygones be bygones and settle all differences. The first love is the best, anyway. We depart for Reno tomorrow.

Mrs. Montague-Swift-Barker-Blase.

Reno, March 11, 1900.

Montague and I will take up our permanent residence here. The Judge returned to Chicago today, intending to become reconciled to his wife three divorces removed and now at liberty. Montague and I are almost as happy as we were on our first honeymoon.

Mrs. Montague Swift-Barker-Blase-Swift.

The Alternative

The burglar pleaded guilty, and when the judge asked him the usual question as to whether he had anything to say before sentence was passed, he replied:

"No, your honor, I have nothing to urge in my behalf. But perhaps you would go light on me if I told you that just before my arrest I declined to contribute to the compounding of a felony though if I had done so I would have escaped arrest."

"Explain yourself," said the judge.

"The lady who caught me under the bed and who was the complaining witness in the case said that she would send either for a policeman or a minister. She gave me my choice and after sizing her up I took the cop."

STAGE

Did Carrie Take a Narcotic?

That the footlights' glare sublimates the conceit of those that bask in it is the only theory upon which I can account for the species of egomania which Ashton Stevens so deftly exploits in his amusing Sunday chats with mummers. There is nothing more exquisite than the art by which the breezy Stevens baits the strutting histrion, and persuades him to attudinize and unconsciously invoke the jeers of the cynical. To Stevens this fertile field to which the pompous actor-r and the proud actress are indigenous, belongs by right of discovery. It was formerly customary for critics and reporters to take player-folks as seriously as they take themselves, which is ponderously impressive. Not satisfied with being heroes and heroines on the stage, they crave the pedestal in private life, and when the stage was more of a mysterious realm than it is now the curiosity of the public was flattering unction to the soul of the mummer, who attributed it solely to admiration and envy. It was therefore his proud privilege to pose, and the newspapers encouraged him by dressing-room interviews the purpose of which was to afford the public a peep into the histrionic holy of holies. Now Stevens continues to gratify vulgar curiosity but in a way that accentuates the vagaries of the players regarding their genius, their wonderful achievements, their magnetism, their penchant for mash notes, et cetera. Yet, strange to say, more than one of Stevens's victims who had taken ridiculous poses for publication were so well satisfied with themselves that they invested in hundreds of copies of the paper to send to their friends. Are actor-folk impervious to ridicule? Is it the footlights' glare or the grease paints that deaden their sense of humor? Now in the case of Carrie Roma, who is said to have loaded a phonograph at the rate of two hundred words a minute for Mr. Stevens, I should say that she had been taking some powerful narcotic that had produced the most exquisite dreams. For it appears that Carrie, or plain "Roma" as she prefers to be called, just as though she were a Melba or a Patti, had visions of herself mingling with the nobility of England, receiving gracious compliments from Her Majesty the Queen, dogs from a Duchess, and two offers from Grau which she declined, not to mention a little sisterly advice from Nordica. She also had a dream about the time that she decided to stick to repertoire for the sake of her womanhood, about a hit that she made in an opera called "The American Heiress" in some remote corner of England, and another about a fat bank account that she had accumulated despite the sick husband on her hands. Whatever it was that Carrie took, she should patent it and put it on the market. Fancy the fortune she could make out of a brand guaranteed to keep such a dream on tap as the one in which she saw herself spurning an offer from Grau! Of course it would be a rude shock to wake and find oneself singing ballads for a "Fiddle Dee Dee" road show in a Pacific Coast country town, but then with plenty of yen shee in her pouch she could smoke up and plunge into an aria for the delectation of the Queen.

The Triumph of James

The rollicking, mischievous, revengeful jester in "Francesca Da Rimini" is no longer the only role in which Mr. Louis James rises to the dignity of a great artist. His Caliban in "The Tempest" is an achievement that ranks with that other notable masterpiece. Since his ability as an actor was first revealed to us in the days when he played the fool to Barrett's hunchback, Mr. James has played many parts, but in none of them did his skill as an artist assert itself as it does in the character of the repulsive monster, Caliban. Far be it from me to disparage Mr. Warde intentionally by concentrating my enthusiasm on his co-star, Mr. James, but the fact is that as Prospero his performance makes no such impression as that experienced in the contemplation of the weird Caliban, the wildest and most abstracted of all Shakespeare's characters. As Prospero, Mr. Warde is nothing more than our old friend, the actor who reads his lines intelligently and gesticulates mechanically but utterly fails to galvanize his audience. Mr. Warde is always conscientious and he has the temperament without the magnetism. As the deformed Caliban, Mr. James is the very personification of the evil Will. Force and poetry are combined in the actor's portrayal. Caliban is the climax of wickedness and brutality, a creature in whom devil, animal and man are equally blended, and Mr. James accentuates all the shades of character with vivid realism in his personification of this strange creation of a poetical imagination. "The Tempest" is a specimen of the purely romantic drama and one that few managers care to stage at this late day, and especially at this time when theatre-goers more than ever before crave pictures of up-to-date realities rather than a species of drama which owes no allegiance to time or space and which addresses itself entirely to the imaginative faculty. Its production in the sumptuous manner in which it is done at the Columbia reflects great credit on the management, for it is a splendid concession to lovers of the artistic. The supernatural theme of "The Tempest" with its lyrical expression appeals to the magnetism, but through it runs the story of a throne lost and regained, of traitorous kindred, abused confidence and requited usurpation. It abounds with arguments of state and leads thought into the theory and responsibility of government. All these elements combine to make it one of the most finished of Shakespeare's plays, and in the Warde and James production it loses neither its poetical nor philosophical interest. The cast is a complete one throughout, and a striking performance is that of Miss Edith Fassett as Ariel.

Nance O'Neil's Judith

If the modern dramatist would spare an hour or so to the perusal of the Old Testament, I warrant he would find there much fine stage material. Just a few months ago we had a New Testament drama, "The Voice from the Wilderness," and though it did not make a financial success it showed in its make-up considerable artistic strength. Mrs. Fiske has "Mary of Magdala" for her great offering in New York this season. And Nance O'Neil, or rather McKee Rankin, has given us "Judith." This big drama by the Italian Giacometti was, we are told, one of Ristori's favorites. In its present form I do not believe it will ever become popular with English speaking audiences. The language is too stilted, the scenes too long drawn out, reminding one of a Wagnerian opera. Even the greatest Isolde in the world could not make an ordinary audience do anything but yawn through "Tristan and Isolde." "Judith," with its long monologues and dialogues, has somewhat the same effect. It is only when the Deliverer herself is on the stage that the audience rouses itself into interest. As Judith Nance O'Neil shows another phase of her genius. Such a Judith, beautiful, serious, dignified, imbued with the spirit of self-sacrifice and patriotism, may Ristori have been. In some scenes, notably that with Holofernes in the third act after Arzaele has left them, and with the High Priest, and again when she prays to God for strength to wield the heavy sword of the tyrant, Nance O'Neil rises to greater heights than she has attained in any of her preceding impersonations. It is this strong Jewish character and the dramatic scenes that environ her that led me to suggest to dramatists that they search the Bible for inspiration. If "Judith" were translated into Biblical English, with the quaint old expressions, or in noble blank verse such as somebody else has suggested, it could be transformed into a play of ornate, classic beauty. As it stands, without Nance O'Neil's genius to illumine it it could not be played at all. The management has staged it superbly and with accuracy. Mayall, Butler, Byers and Miss Stoddard of the company give excellent support. Rateliffe's Holofernes, exaggerated to the point of burlesque on the opening night, later took on more subdued tones and is now a very acceptable performance. Herbert Carr, as the High Priest, is most impressive, and is a welcome addition to the stock support.

Arzaele, the favorite of the Harem of the Assyrian general, is played by Eliza Oldfield, a San Francisco girl who in this important role makes her first appearance on any stage. She was doing work for the Sunday supplement of a daily newspaper when Mr. Rankin met her. He saw in her face and figure a general fitness for the role of Arzaele, and he suggested that she try it. Though she had taken a few lessons in elocution from local teachers, Miss Oldfield had never appeared in even an amateur production and had not any serious idea of becoming an actress. But she consented to try and with Mr. Rankin's able coaching made her debut on Sunday night, her success surprising her most intimate friends.

"The Christian" at the Alcazar

Though San Francisco will never accept any other John Storm after Morgan's great characterization, it very willingly awards the palm for the best Glory Quayle we have seen to Alice Treat Hunt. Effie Ellsler, Elsie Leslie and Maude Fealy gave us their versions of the Hall Caine heroine, but Miss Hunt is the only one who combines in her impersonation the requisite beauty, charm and intensity. There is something in her work that reminds one of Julia Arthur in "The Dancing Girl," and her light comedy last week gave no hint of the strong emotional work she does in "The Christian." Close beside Miss Hunt's Glory goes Agnes Ranken's Polly Love. We never knew before what lay in this role in which Miss Ranken infuses such pathos. Brother Paul is another part which, slurred in former productions here of the play, is given its full value by William Warren.

Old Stunts and New

While with jugglers, acrobats and monologuists, and in specialty acts in general, the public cries for novelty, in music it likes the old favorites best. This is why when Eugene Cowles gave his recent concerts here, he was called upon to sing the Armourer's Song from "Robin Hood" on every occasion, the classic gems in his repertory failing to crowd that old success of his from favor. Billy Hopkins of the Bohemian Club can never get away from "The Holy City," or Donald Graham from "I Love and the World is Mine"; and Nordica has to sing the Valkyrie's cry from "Die Walkure" when she gives her recitals. The public enjoys in music what it knows. So Dick Jose at the Orpheum last week and this had to give "Dolly Gray" before his audiences were satisfied, though he has some new songs that are good, beside the other old favorites that he has been singing for years, "Sally in Our Alley" and "With All Her Faults I Love Her Still." Jose could go on singing those old songs to the end of his life, I believe, and they would always charm and enthuse an audience. Filson and Errol have their old hit, "A Tip on the Derby," this week at the Orpheum. It is a sketch that will do them for another year yet, for it contains the kind of wit and humor that doesn't grow shopworn. Morrisey and Rich's sketch, "A Breach of Promise," is also amusing, the scene laid in a photograph gallery, and the fun of the rough and tumble order. Jules Garrison's venture into the legitimate, with his declamation, the address of Spartacus to the Gladiators that McCullough used to declaim, strikes a new note in vaudeville. The silence that prevails during the recitation and the storm of applause that always greets its close seem to prove that vaudeville audiences are willing to be elevated if the elevating is done in the right way. The Garrisons are a clever couple and in their burlesque of famous tragedies the descent from the sublime to the ridiculous is taken at just the right angle. The Scott brothers have something new in acrobatics and equilibrium tests. They appear as Parisian johnnies, with monocles and cigarettes, doing their balancing feats without changing countenance or disturbing their attire. Later in white tights they perform some wonders on the slack wire. Collins and Hart have a laughable turn which they call "Two Strong Men." Some of the old hoaxes are in it, the rubber dumb-bell and ceiling equilibrium-supporter, but the new frame makes it interesting. Hill and Silvainy the bicyclists do their famed act, the man on the single wheel, with the woman standing on his shoulders, riding down a flight of steps. Les Frasettis do a xylophone duet that proves them artists of rare talent. The woman is a beauty, too, which always counts in winning an audience.

This cold weather, grip is warded off by taking Chapin & Gore's whiskies.

She's Now a Beauty

Truly Shattuck, formerly of the Tivoli chorus, is now being written up by New York papers as the "most beautiful woman in vaudeville." Some years ago she was the central figure in a local tragedy, her mother having shot and killed a young man who had been Truly's lover and who refused to become her husband. The notoriety of the case brought the girl to the attention of theatrical managers. She is now married and earning big money in vaudeville. Last week she was offered the largest salary she ever received for a twelve weeks' engagement at the Winter Garden in Berlin.

Sister Takes Husband's Place

Mrs. Fitzroy Tobin and Mrs. James Harrigan (Lotta and Belle Rogers) left San Francisco last week to begin a vaudeville tour in a musical act. Mrs. Tobin is the widow of the California trombonist who died in New Zealand a few months ago. Mrs. Harrigan is the wife of "the tramp juggler." Both ladies are young, pretty and talented. Mrs. Tobin won laurels in a musical act with her late husband, and her sister will doubtless make a successful and charming "partner," though this is to be her first venture into stageland. They are to be known as "The Tobins."

Stuart a Successful Hero

This is a week of merry tragedy at the Republic. More men are killed on the stage than are to be met in the cast of the modern thrilling melodrama. The play is a romantic drama and one with which we are all familiar, though the title—"The Master at Arms"—is new to us. It is really "Don Caesar de Bazan," a new version 'tis true, but the old favorite nevertheless. It was revived last season in New York and proved a strong attraction at more than one theatre. Faversham, the matinee idol, appeared in one version called "The Royal Rival" and on the first night when he was called before the curtain he smiled grimly, and said he didn't know what Mr. Frohman would put him in next, but he wouldn't be surprised if he were called upon to play the funny man in a comic opera. James Hackett played in another version at the same time, and the two popular matinee idols aroused great enthusiasm among their respective followers. Mr. Ralph Stuart, the new leading man of the Republic, has not the reputation of Faversham or Hackett, but he plays the rollicking, swaggering hero to the life. He has more of the temperament of the romantic hero than has Faversham, and though he does hail from the Murray Hill, having seen both I can testify that he is as acceptable in the role as was the star of the Empire. Not too swaggering, not too exuberant is Mr. Stuart's presentment of the role. He is sinewy in action and indeed a master at arms, for he sheds the blood of his numerous adversaries with neatness and dispatch. Mr. Stuart ought to make an ideal Count of Monte Cristo, and if he doesn't lure the mash-note writers to the Republic I will be surprised. Miss Mary Horne, the new leading lady of the company, had very little to do as Maritana, but she was effective.

Features of Next Week's Bills

"The Tempest" will be at the Columbia for another week. Anna Held in "The Little Duchess" follows. It was intended to present that old favorite "Francesca Da Rimini" next week, but such was the success of "The Tempest" that it has been decided to keep it on. People who were looking forward to the great treat of James as Beppo are to be disappointed unless the management can be induced to accede to the requests of many people, and present the old favorite at least one night.

Nance O'Neil has retained "Ingomar" in her repertory, and will play Parthenia next week. This will be a change from the intense roles in which Miss O'Neil has been seen during her engagement at the Grand and will show her art in its emotional and tender phase. She played Parthenia during her former appearances here and it was considered a charming interpretation. On Thursday she will give her first Ibsen matinee, when "Hedda Gabler" will be the bill. It will attract a large audience, as Ibsen is almost an entire novelty to us. "Lady Inger of Ostrat" will be given later.

"The Christian" has proved such a drawing card at the Alcazar that it is to go another week. "The New Woman," Sydney Grundy's comedy, is in rehearsal.

"Barbara Fidgety" is still packing Fischer's, new squibs and jests and songs being added each week. "Hoity Toity" is ready to go on at any time and a travesty on "Captain Jinks of the Horse Marines." There is a bank scene in "Hoity Toity," by the way, that will be very amusing to bankers, lawyers and financiers.

"Monte Cristo," which is one of the plays that never grow old, will be the Republic's bill. Ralph Stuart should make a fine title hero, and as in the company are several who supported O'Neill when he revived his old success in New York and Boston, the support is sure to be of the best. "Prince Otto," Otis Skinner's star play, comes next, its first production in the West.

The Swedish star has done a successful week's business at the California, but the theatre's policy being constant change, will give place to Hoyt's "A Stranger in a Strange Land" tomorrow night. William Keller Mack and John Campbell (formerly of the clever team Smith and Campbell) will have the principal roles. "The Devil's Auction" will follow.

They cannot take "The Mikado" off and the Gilbert and Sullivan revival promises to prove one of the best money-making ideas ever matured at the Tivoli. "Patience" is in rehearsal and will go on when the public consents to let "The Mikado" be taken off.

The favorite Dumonds, Parisian minstrels, Lottie Gilson, a new star here, in popular songs, Joe Maxwell and company in "The Fire Chief," a musical creation, Nelson's Comiques, novel comedy acrobats in "Frolics at the Zoo," with Filson and Errol in their bright sketch "A Daughter of Bacchus," the bicyclists, strong men, and Morrisey and Rich, with the biograph, will be Orpheum attractions.

Short Sermons

(Which Those Who Run May Read.)

I.

One morning as I was returning home from a not quite Satanic going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it, I came upon what seemed to be a mere child, clad in a flower-fair muslin gown, sitting by the wayside, her face hidden in her hands, sobbing as if her little heart would break. As I drew near, I noticed that the white-flower frock was slightly soiled.

"What is the matter, little girl?" I asked. "What are you crying about?"

She raised her tear-stained face—a much older face than I had expected to see.

"I am crying over spilt milk," she answered; and her sobs broke out afresh.

"It's no use," I said.

"It is use," she insisted. "What else is one to do?"

"How did it happen?" I inquired, ignoring her question.

"I took my life in my hands," she confessed, "and raised it to the lips of a man who seemed O, so thirsty. He tasted it; then handed it back to me. It was whisky, not milk, he wanted. When I learned that, I let the cup fall to the ground." Again she fell to sobbing.

"Don't cry; it's no use," I argued.

"It is use, and I can't help it. What else is one to do?"

"O, anything," I said weakly, and went on my way.

II.

Years passed. One afternoon I came upon a woman dressed in a gaudy scarlet gown all bedraggled and bespattered, lying in the mud by the wayside, laughing.

"What are you doing, lying there?" I cried in wonder.

She opened her bleared eyes and looked at me. "I know you," she said rudely; "the last time I saw you, you wanted to know why I was crying; now you want to know why I am laughing. What else is one to do?—one must either laugh or cry." And that dreadful laugh began again.

"Sister," I said, reaching out my right hand while I drew my skirts close about me with my left, "sister, let me help you to get on your feet. You must make a fresh start."

She laughed sardonically, and began singing in a cracked voice:

"Humpty-dumpty sat on a wall;
Humpty-dumpty had a great fall.
All the king's horses and all the king's men
Can not put Humpty-dumpty where she was, again."

And she laughed a fiendish refrain.

"For God's sake," I exclaimed, "don't laugh so!"

"Madam," she said epigrammatically, "a fallen woman is a Humpty-dumpty. I must laugh. What else is one to do?"

As I hurried away, I fancied I could hear the sobs of a child mingled with that horrible laugh.

III.

Again the years passed. One evening about the hour of the Angelus I came upon a crone by the wayside, dressed in faded gray that matched her scanty hair. She was kneeling in the dust of the road, her face towards the setting sun. As I passed by on the other side, I heard her pray hoarsely: "O Thou who, though without sin, didst never once stoop down for a stone, whose sacred feet did not disdain the nard, be merciful to me, a sinner!"

And she went on into the west, and was lost in the glory of the sun. Harry Cowell.

MUSIC

The New Musical Club

Since the Schumann Club which David Loring directed and the Saturday Morning Orchestra which Mrs. Selden S. Wright brought into being, no musical organization has started with such a strong membership, such enthusiasm and fine financial backing as the new Twentieth Century Club, which will give its first concert next week. The members are all very enthusiastic over the old opera they are studying and which will be the feature of the program. The club is the outgrowth of the very successful charity affair which was given in Maple hall two seasons ago, and which led to a desire on the part of the projectors to form into some kind of a permanent club. The idea has been growing since then and this Twentieth Century Club is the culmination. Formed entirely of society people, there is no lack of talent, for some of our society amateurs are sufficiently advanced in musical knowledge to rank with professionals. Miss Bessie Ames, for one, is a 'cellist of rare ability. She has been urged to become a professional artist, but she does not care for that. She studied abroad with her sister Alice, who is Mrs. Robbins now, and who plays the violin. Mrs. B. G. Lathrop, who is Miss Ames's particular friend, is also a fine musician, and Mrs. Jack Casserly is one of the best harpists in this part of the world. Mrs. Walter McGavin, first vice-president of the club, sings charmingly, especially the French songs she studied under Donald de V. Graham. Mrs. Alice Bacon Washington, second vice-president, recently made her reappearance in concert here as pianist with the Minetti Quartet. Mrs. Richard Bayne, Mrs. M. B. Sherwood and Miss Gertrude Wheeler are of the vocally talented in the club. Miss Polk was a member of the original Saturday Morning Orchestra. The populace is not to have opportunity to attend the club's recitals, which are strictly invitational affairs for the members and their friends. But the influence of the club will be felt, nevertheless, on the community. It is all in line with the interest lately awakened in matters of culture.

Zelie de Lussan

When Zelie de Lussan sang in grand opera here with the Ellis company, her Carmen, Musette and Page in "Les Huguenots" were counted among the best things of the season. Her coming song recitals here, in Steinway hall on February tenth, twelfth and fourteenth, are therefore looked forward to with added interest. She will sing numbers from her operatic roles besides the song classics of various countries. Her rendition of the popular "La Paloma" has created a furor at every concert. At her first concert she will sing the Habenera from "Carmen," Knowest thou the Land from "Mignon," and the waltz song from "La Boheme," with songs by Mendelssohn, Rubinstein (The Asra), Denza, Franz, Arthur Nevin, Schumann and others. She will be assisted by Angelo Fronani, a young Italian pianist, whose numbers will be a Cappricio by Glazanouw and numbers by Reinecke and Thome. De Lussan is a fascinating woman as well as singer and, though of French parentage, was born and bred in New York. She calls all Americans "my people" notwithstanding the fact that her most brilliant artistic and social triumphs have been made in Europe.

A Wizard with His Bow

In Bohemia there is an influence that promotes the artistic temperament, and that romantic land has produced many great musicians. One of them is Wenzel Kopta, who revealed his cleverness on the bowed instrument at Steinway hall last Tuesday night. Kopta is a genius and a gentleman. Though he has most of the familiar characteristics of his kind, obtrusive eccentricity is not one of them. Being in comfortable circumstances, and free from cupidity, he does not follow his profession closely. He prefers a life of leisure and he has been enjoying it in a country home in the interior. However it is evident that he contributes to his own pleasure by frequent communion with his fiddle for his hand has all the cunning of the devoted practitioner. His technic is bold and assured and he plays with considerable dash, communicating much of his enthusiasm to his hearers. In Paganini's "Wiches' Dance" he played with great fire and spirit and in the familiar "Cascade" by Kontski his intonation was charming and he played with exquisite sentiment. Miss Gertrude Wheeler, a local contralto, made her debut as a concert singer, and made a favorable impression. She is a pupil of Mr. Edward Xavier Rolker.

A Prophecy Fulfilled

The predictions voiced in Town Talk usually come to pass. I have no desire to blow our own horn, but I remember that just two years ago my contemporary the Saunterer told of the contemplated retirement of Maurice Grau. The news came from a private source, and was immediately pooh-poohed by the augurs who had not heard of it. Town Talk's correspondent said that while for another year Grau's name would remain at the head of the Metropolitan Opera House concern, and as the grand opera impresario of Europe, in reality he was out of it. Now comes the authorized despatch that, owing to Grau's illness, he will take a rest for a year. Nessager of the Paris Opera was the man originally predicted as Grau's successor, but now it appears that Jean de Reszke has an eye on the job.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch the Young Russian

Gabrilowitsch will give his first concert in this city at the Alhambra next Tuesday night. The young Russian is said to be one of the most sympathetic pianists the world has ever known, and the enthusiasm of the audiences at his concerts in Paris and London knew no bounds. At his first concert here he will play Mendelssohn's "Variations Serieuses," Beethoven's Sonata Op. 31, three Chopin numbers, Rubinstein's "Le Bal," and the novelties will be an "Esquisse" by Arensky, "L'Alouette" by Glinka-Balakireff, and a Caprice-Burlesque by the young artist. On Thursday night he will play a gavotte of his own composition besides Schumann's "Carneval," "Marche Militaire" by Schubert-Taussig, and numbers by Bach, Tschaikowsky, Rubinstein and Henselt. At the Saturday matinee Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 110, and Brahm's variations and fugue on a theme by Handel will be the principal numbers. Complete programs may be had at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s where the sale of seats is now in progress. Gabrilowitsch will give a concert in Oakland at the Macdonough theatre Wednesday night.

The Stewart Recital

Society and musicians are rather more than ordinarily interested in the recital of works by Dr. H. J. Stewart to be given next Tuesday evening in Steinway hall. The program is selected entirely from Dr. Stewart's compositions, and in full is: Part Song, "The Singers; aria (Bluff King Hal), J. F. Veaco; songs, "Secrets" and "Out in the open meadow," Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup; violin solos, Romance in G and Bourree in G minor, Nathan Landsberger; part songs, "The Brook" and "Slumber Song"; songs, "Were I the Rose" and "Awake, dear heart," Mrs. J. E. Birmingham; solos, "Springtime," scherzo in G minor, "A song of happiness," and "Menuet Heroique," Dr. Stewart; quartet, "Ave Maria"; songs, "What saith the wind?" and "The sun has kissed your eyes," Miss Alma Berglund; violin solo, "Legend in D," Mr. Landsberger; songs, "O, like a garden in my heart" and "The Lords of Song," S. Homer Henley; song, "A little while," Miss Ella V. McCloskey; part songs, "The Chamber of Sleep" and "Sweetly blows the breath of Spring." These are but a few of the works that Dr. Stewart's muse has produced. One of the most beautiful songs he has written, and which Donald de V. Graham sang in the original production of the opera, is "Clouds are gathering darkly o'er me" in "Bluff King Hal." His setting to Tennyson's "Crossing the Bar" I have mentioned before as a fine work. His oratorio "The Nativity" has been sung in various large cities.

The Mansfeldt Recital

The first entertainment given in the new hall of Adelphian Club of Alameda was a precursor of the delightful musical treats that Alameda will enjoy this winter. It was a piano recital by Hugo Mansfeldt, and was highly successful from every point of view. The program rendered was: Sonata, C sharp minor, Op. 27, No. 2 (Moonlight), Beethoven; Minuet, B minor, Schubert, Nocturne, A major, Field, Perpetual Motion, Weber; Nocturne, B flat minor, Op. 9, No. 1, Air Allemand, Chopin; Ballade B major, Redding Gavotte, Romance, Mansfeldt; Campanella, Liszt; Consolation, E major, Gnomenreigen (Gnome Dance), Romanza from Tannhauser, Wedding March and Fairy Dance, Liszt.

The Kilties Band, the Gordon Highlanders from Belleville, Canada, will give a week of concerts at the Alhambra beginning Monday matinee, February twenty-third. This organization includes forty musicians, a choir of eighteen voices, six Scotch dancers, two pipers and other features of a Scottish Regimental Band and the programs will be most interesting and varied. The selections range from Wagner and Beethoven to De Koven, Sousa and Lueders. Kocian, in March, will be the next Greenbaum attraction. —The Music Critic

A Familiar Topic

The annual inquiry as to what books people took most pleasure in reading during the last twelve months is under way. F. C. Burnand, editor of Punch, has replied that he cannot specify any two in particular, since he found all the books interesting which he did not drop before the first twenty pages. This has given opportunity for some despairing soul to lament the degeneracy of the age which demands that its literature shall be interesting before all else. Pessimists of this order make the grand mistake of confounding interest with amusement. People always did demand that their reading matter should be interesting. Otherwise they will find some other form of divertisement. It makes no difference whether one takes up a biography, a book of travels and exploration, or a novel, if it is not interesting it will be speedily laid aside. The figures of the market reports or a table of statistics are interesting to those whom they concern. The reports of agricultural associations and stock breeders are interesting to farmers and stockmen. The sporting journals must interest their own clientele, and the fashion magazines have their followers, all of whom are deeply concerned with their contents, as a matter of business or pleasure. The amusement may come later, when some result is accomplished, but the interest must come first. Schoolboys may be driven to their lessons or their allotment of reading without taking an interest in it, but no one will voluntarily take up book, paper or periodical, and work a weary way through it if it excites no interest. Mr. Burnand happens to be editing a paper whose acknowledged purpose is to amuse, but it is no amusement to him in his editorial capacity. It is earnest work. Writers who have not the capacity to interest their readers may be authorities on the subjects which they treat but they will be no more apt to find themselves consulted like encyclopedias, for the verification of facts, than read from end to end. Interest is, if possible, more important than strict accuracy, which is not to say deliberate misrepresentation. Errors can be corrected but dullness is fatal.

Protest Against Uncut Pages

The London Globe is making a vigorous protest against the publishing books with pages uncut, and the majority of readers will be ready to add their voices to the outcry. It takes the sublimation of an "artistic temperament" to see anything beautiful in the ragged and untrimmed edges, which give an unfinished appearance to the bookbinders' work, and they catch the dust, so that, for ordinary handling or library usage, the uncut book is shabby in one-half the time that a smoothly trimmed volume begins to show wear. It adds an altogether unnecessary burden to the work of librarians, who must cut the pages before the volumes are placed on the shelves, and for private ownership it is an inducement not to buy books. The average book is not worth the trouble it costs to get at the contents, and the only excuse for the practice is the wider margin it allows in the case of such books and periodicals as are rebound or bound for their owners. Not once in a hundred times does any one care for a special binding of an ordinary book, and when it does happen the obvious course is to obtain the unbound sheets from the publisher. Connoisseurs and collectors place high values on uncut copies of rare works and early editions, but they attach importance to leaves which have not been separated at all, a condition which can hardly be regarded as complimentary to authors, since it is proof undeniable that the books have been unread as well as uncut. Given choice, there are very few readers or purchasers who would not prefer smooth edges to the ragged appearance of the uncut volumes, and if the London Globe will keep up the clamor, something may be effected by it.

The Rutledges are about to begin the republication of a series of "half-forgotten books," amongst which are noted for early appearance, "The Mysteries of Udolpho," "Jack Brag," Theodore Hook's novel, and "Whitefriars," by Emma Robinson. The field seems t obe one worth working, though there is no predicting how an old favorite will be received by a new generation. Most of the older books are regarded as entirely too long by the present reading population, who read as they do all else, by electricity. It is not a matter to be corrected by finding fault about it, since we are obliged to do everything else at a rate of which our grandparents never dreamed, outside of their fairy tales. Most reissues of old books have been pruned more or less judiciously, to bring them within modern bounds.

With the Money Makers

News from 'Change

The dullness in the Stock and Bond market incident to the holiday season seems to have entirely disappeared and there is quite a good active movement in almost all the leading securities. Trading during the past week has been of good volume and the interest manifested by investors and the variety of stocks in which they are placing their money shows there is no lack of confidence in the future of valuations. While sales as a rule have been mostly in small parcels, this class of business creates a more healthful condition than when transfers are in large blocks confined to but a few securities. Present indications are that the investing public are on the lookout for dividend paying stocks and bonds as a source of income, the returns generally being better than the present low interest rates offered by the savings banks. This condition of affairs is beneficial in two ways. In the first place, it not only creates a good demand, but a better market condition for the shares of our industrial corporations, and in the second place, the withdrawal of savings deposits for investment in dividend paying securities will reduce the surplus in the hands of the banks and thus help to strengthen the money-earning capacity of bank deposits. It is a well-known fact that the savings banks of San Francisco have largely increased their deposits during the last year and that all of them have funds on hand in excess of what they have use for in making loans. This fact is the prime factor in bringing the present interest rate on deposits down to the low standard now prevailing, which by the way, is the lowest in the history of the city. The sales of shares during the week has been well distributed with a very steady movement each day. Sugar stocks have been moderately well represented in the sales of the week and prices have ruled quite steady. Hana plantation is in demand at $4.35 with practically no offers to sell and substantially the same thing may be said of Hawaiian Commercial, for which $44.50 and $45 has been offered without drawing out any stock. Paauhau has been selling from $16.37 1-2 to $16.50, but the holders of this stock seem to be so well satisfied that they are very backward about accepting these bids, and in fact they manifest very little anxiety about selling at any price. Hutchison Sugar Plantation is held steady at $15.25 to $15.50, the buyers being more numerous than sellers. Business in water shares has been comparatively light and under the offers of some small holders to sell Spring Valley stock experienced a small decline. The drop, however, was of short duration and while the original figure has not yet been reached the price has recovered to $84.50. Contra Costa Water has been steady at from $65 to $65.50, while Port Costa is $64 bid and $66.50 asked. San Francisco Gas & Electric commenced the week very dull, with the price from $41.25 to $41.75. During the last few days, however, a marked improvement has occurred and $43.75 has been readily paid for round lots. The latest annual statement of the Equitable Gas Company contains some points of considerable importance with reference to the utilization of gas in this city. Although the average sales of gas by this company have been slightly less than 52c. per thousand cubic feet, a clear profit of $18,000 is shown for the past eleven months. In the near future the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company will give their shareholders the results of last year's business, and considering a very much higher average rate at which the gas disposed of by them is sold the profits for the year should make a handsome showing. It should be borne in mind also that the Equitable Company has only laid its mains in certain portions of the city, where the consumption is heaviest, at the least cost of distribution, but even then, when it is considered that in the largest part of its territory the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company is receiving $1.25 a thousand feet, the forthcoming balance sheet ought to show large profits. Oakland Gas shares have been enhanced in value by reason of the absorption of this company in the new organization known as the California Gas and Electric Company. There has been considerable activity in Giant Powder shares and quite an advance in the price was effected. This improvement, however, lasted but a day or two and the selling price is again down to $64.50. There has been a greater fluctuation in the price of Alaska Packers shares than at any time during a number of months. As far as can be learned the only reason for this downward movement was the announcement of the company of their intention to sell at an unusually low price all their pack of one or two kinds of fish during the coming year. As a matter of fact, instead of depreciating the stock, this action is of benefit to stockholders because it was undertaken to head off threatened competition, and by so doing the general condition of the market can be maintained much more advantageously than if competition had been allowed to organize. Furthermore, these sales at the unusually low prices can have no effect whatever upon stockholders' interests, because at the beginning of the year at the annual meeting of the directors, sufficient funds were set aside to allow the monthly payment of $1 per share as a stockholders' dividend for the ensuing twelve months. Trading in bonds has been quite extensive and prices have ruled steady, railroad bonds taking precedence in point of demand.

Word comes from New York that the Commercial Cable Company, which owns the new Pacific Cable, will shortly issue new stock to the extent of $1,667,000, making the total capital stock issued $15,000,000, which is the total authorized capital stock of the company. Stockholders will be given the right to subscribe to the new stock to the extent of 12 1-2 per cent of their holdings. The stock is now selling at about $175 per share so that the rights will be worth in the neighborhood of $9 per share. The stock has been quite inactive for some time past, what there is of it being held in strong hands. The holdings of the Mackay-Bennett combination were not separated after the death of John W. Mackay.

A special meeting of the members of the Merchants' Exchange will be held on March 25th, to authorize the creation of a bonded indebtedness of $1,500,000 in 4 per cent twenty-year bonds, to provide funds to erect the new Exchange building. A contract has been made with the Bank of California to sell that institution the bonds at $98 and accrued interest, as funds are required.

At the annual meeting of the Vigorit Powder Company held last Monday the following directors were re-elected: C. de Guigne, J. Stauffer and John L. Howard. George A. Moore and S. L. Abbott were also elected. The yearly reports say: "There has been an increase in the amount of powder manufactured over 1901 of 707,000 pounds, or 53 per cent. The profits of the year were decreased by $3,180.22 in bad accounts, which have been carried on the books of the company for several years as assets, and $8,888.49, depreciation of silver, in Mexico, where the bulk of the business was done. The price of powder has recently been advanced in Mexico to cover Exchange at 275 per cent, and as exchange is now quoted at from 255 to 260 per cent, it is hoped to partially retrieve losses of this score during the coming year. The company expended during last year in betterments and improvements, made necessary by the increase in business, $15,661.03." —The Financier.

The February number of the Pacific States Investor is just out and fully sustains the reputation of the paper. The editorial articles cover an exceedingly wide range of subjects, in all cases giving the investor a pithy and practical view of the situation. To say that the paper is up to date and readable is merely to repeat the comment of every person who has read any of its issues during the year of its existence. The articles on automobiles and on a sardine factory for the Pacific Coast are specially interesting features of this month's issue.

Other People's Ideas

"A horse knows a friend by instinct. So does a man. But a man, vain creature! is willing to repel instinct and trust intellect, and so suffers from the attempt to revise his first impressions, which, if he is healthy, are infallible."—"John Brent," Theodore Winthrop.

"Is there any of the apostolic precepts are harder than that which bids us 'rejoice with them that do rejoice'? The joy, the fame, the wealth that is not ours offends. To weep with those that weep, to play patron and comforter—these are offices highly congenial to the most selfish. But the gracious benignity which can rejoice with those who do rejoice, which can praise the worthy without a secret hatred, and respect the honestly wealthy without a cleaving envy, is a much rarer virtue; and only those possess it who are the beloved of God—men and women after God's own heart."—"Love for an Hour Is Love Forever," Amelia E. Barr.

New and Old Stories

She Wanted the Change

A German who hadn't been to church in fifteen years attended an Episcopal service one Sunday. When the plate was passed he put on a quarter and asked the vestryman for twenty cents change. He didn't get it, for the man with the plate didn't hear his request. The lady who was with the German dropped ten cents on the plate, when her escort, persisting that five cents was the contribution expected from each person, whispering that that was too much, reached for the plate, and seizing a nickel, handed it to the lady, conscious that he had saved five cents for her if he himself was twenty cents behind the game.

A Beecher Story

One pleasant Sabbath morning, so the story runs, on the way to church, Henry Ward Beecher went up to a number of boys playing marbles and exclaimed:

"What, boys, playing marbles on the Sabbath day! Why, you frighten me!"

Upon which one of the little sinners answered:

"Frightened! Why in the devil don't you run, then?"

Not a Good Samaritan

The little daughter of a prominent Boston clergyman had just been put to bed, when upon the stillness came a tiny voice in the nightly prayer. Then silence, soon broken by these words:

"And, dear Lord, this afternoon I saw out upon the cold sidewalk a poor little girl, and she has no shoes or stockings on and—and—'"

Another silence, as though staggered by the immensity of the problem:

"It's none of our business, is it, God?"

A Bad Debt

The late George Douglas Brown, author of "The House with the Green Shutters," to illustrate a point once retailed this story about the old Irishman who spoke up in Parliament.

"Yes, gentlemen," said Sir Pompous Bletherby, with a falter in his voice, "all that I am I owe to my wife."

"Poor old woman," said Pat from the gallery, "that's one bad debt on her book."

Preferred Another Dignity

The Duke of Rutland and Disraeli were enemies. When the latter returned from Berlin bearing "peace with honor," and made himself a Knight of the Garter, some one asked him why he did not also make himself a duke.

"A duke!" exclaimed he; "make myself a duke? Why, Rutland's a duke!"

A Sample of British Wit

"But I don't know you, madame," said the bank cashier to the woman who had presented a check.

The woman, however, instead of saying haughtily, "I do not wish your acquaintance, sir!" merely replied, with an engaging smile:

"Oh, yes you do, I think. I'm the red-headed old virago next door to you, whose scoundrelly little boys are always reaching through the fence and picking your flowers. When you started for town this morning your wife said, 'Now, Henry, if you want a dinner fit to eat this evening you'll have to leave me a little money. I can't keep this house on plain water and 6d. a day—'"

"Here's your money, madame," said the cashier, pushing it towards her and coughing loudly.

To Expedite Litigation

The Bar Association has at length come to the relief of our Supreme Court with a bill designed to lighten the burdens of that tribunal. Legislation to that end has long been desired, for the court is utterly unable to handle expeditiously the business that comes before it, and its calendar has become clogged to such an extent that it is three years in arrears. Consequently there is much suffering on the part of litigants through the law's delays. And it is not surprising in view of the vast volume of legal business, civil and criminal, instituted in the Superior Courts of the State, and the large proportion of which that goes for final determination before the court of last resort. The bill drawn by a committee of the Bar Association provides for the institution of an intermediary Court of Appeals which shall have jurisdiction over a certain class of cases, and in which its decision shall be final. It contemplates the division of the State into three judicial districts, and the election of three judges for each at large, who shall be assigned by the Supreme Court. The measure will no doubt receive the enthusiastic support of the legal profession, for lawyers throughout the State have been eager for something to be done to expedite litigation. When cases hang fire fees are delayed, and lawyers grumble, but litigants suffer too, and generally the client fares worse than his counsel by the inevitable dilatoriness of the court. The judicial system of California has long been in need of expansion along the lines proposed for it has not the requisite capacity for the prompt handling of the business that arises. It is not that people have grown more fond of lawsuits, for as a matter of fact there is a growing desire to avoid unnecessary litigation, and as a consequence there has developed a class of lawyers whose principal duty is to give reliable advice as to how to avoid suits or to arrive at satisfactory settlements. The great commercial, manufacturing and financial corporations of today are averse to plunging into litigation. They know that it involves expense and time, and so they have their counsellors to help them avoid suits. Trust and title guaranty companies have for a long time been working towards a reduction in legal business. Nevertheless the dockets of our courts are clogged and for the reason principally that our population has grown beyond the capacity of our judicial system. However, in a measure members of the legal profession are responsible for the clogging of the Supreme Court calendar. Quite often they appeal cases knowing that there is no merit in the appeal. Their only purpose is to force a compromise. This is in the nature of legal blackmail, and it is practiced by eminent members of the profession.

Blood Money for Churches

As a rule the correspondence columns of a woman's paper excite only laughter, but once in a while there is something that calls for indignation. In a recent number of one of these periodicals advice was sought as to some method of earning money to be contributed towards clearing a church debt, and the editor suggested assisting in family sewing at the munificent rate of fifty cents a day. He stated that there were many mothers and housewives who would be glad to take advantage of the opportunity to employ cheap and efficient help. Of course the querist is one of that large band who have leisure time and no necessity for turning it into money, so that whatever is "earned" is clear gain, and the church fund is benefited. But how about the seamstresses who are already picking their eyes out with the point of their needles, working for the smallest sum that will keep body and soul together? Are they to be obliged to compete with the "ladies," and either lose a part of their patronage, or cut rates to meet church competition? Where is the charity or common sense in such a course? Why need churches be eternally in debt any more than individuals? Why build an edifice beyond the financial capacity of the congregation? And why be everlastingly enacting the role of the beggar? What doth it profit a community to have half a dozen church spires rearing themselves aloft, while the roofs are weighted down by mortgages and the pews are empty? There is no more virtue in a pauperized church than in a pauperized individual, and nothing is gained by contributing towards the payment of a church debt the money which should go to the support of a family. The multiplication of churches is a foolish vanity and usually arises from the self-importance of one or two disgruntled members of the congregation who long to see themselves in positions of consequence. To be deacon or trustee is a great honor in a small community and to a small mind, and in order to reach it there have been endless splits and schisms brought about. It is easy to segregate the disgruntled and start a new church, or for that matter a new religion—easy to raise a mortgage and a new church spire, but not so easy to raise money. Now, if these charitable dames who undertake the task want to do the fair thing, why do they not charge current wages for what they do, and give the same equivalent for value received that they would themselves exact? Why do they go to merchants and dealers and beg articles to dispose of at church fairs and charity bazaars. Why do they not consider the injustice of undersellling the tradesmen who have made the gifts, thus working the double injustice of receiving something for nothing, and inaugurating a ruinous competition as well? What right has an idle dame to take up work that others depend upon for their existence, do it in a half-hearted fashion, for less than half the price, and then pose as a model of thrift and industry? There has been a good deal said and written, these last few years, about the morality of colleges and universities receiving gifts of ill-gotten gains; the churches might well look to themselves and examine the blood-money which is poured into their coffers.

The Free Text Book Fad

If a State Legislature is ever convened in California without having a free text book bill come before it, the millennium will have arrived. It is one of the "popular" measures which appeal to the demagogue and is meant to tickle the poor voter into an idea that the father of the measure is a public benefactor and a statesman. It is true that the cost of school books is a considerable item in any family, but it also costs something to feed, clothe, lodge and doctor children, and there is no better reason why books should be supplied free than why the State should maintain a public restaurant or a warehouse full of clothing to be drawn on on demand. The needs of a family should fall, as they do, on the head of the family, and he should exert himself to supply them. The oftener the State steps in with paternalistic measures, to relieve parents of the responsibilities which they have voluntarily assumed, the more the bond of family union is weakened. As it is now, it is possible for parents to shirk every care and concern for their offspring, and the number of dependent and abandoned children increases frightfully from year to year. To begin with, the Maternity societies undertake to care for the expectant mother, either in her own home or in some hospital. They furnish clothing for the little stranger, and if there are other children at home they are disposed of in some day home or kindergarten, where they are fed, clothed and cared for. If the mother wishes to shirk the responsibility of the new baby, there is the Foundling Asylum near at hand where she can leave it, or if she keeps it but neglects to train and teach it, the Reform School will assume the burden, and later on, there is the State Penitentiary. Our school system has expanded until, from a device by means of which no child need grow up illiterate, it has become a system out of which every child is to be accomplished. The burden of the cost of the text books is out of all proportion to necessities, for the greater part of the school course is embroidery, and embroidery on unsuitable material at that. Children are crammed with bits and scraps of science and art which they have no need of and no use for. The pity that an occasional artist or musician should miss the opportunity which would mean so much to him is more than offset by the pity that hands which stretch out by instinct for the hammer and the toasting fork should be compelled to cramp themselves around a pencil and pen. Let the superfluities be cut out of the educational treadmill, and only the essentials retained, the brick and mortar foundation upon which the edifice is to be erected, and the number of text books required will not be found so burdensome.

Toying with Language

There is a tendency amongst the ultra-fastidious to drop the good old word sick and substitute ill. The innovation savors of Anglomania, for in England sick is restricted in its application, and used only in referring to nausea. But in America sickness has always meant indisposition, and there is no good reason why it should not continue to do so. There are a number of connections in which there can be no preference except that of fastidious and strained nicety, between the two words, but it is enough to make one sick to encounter such refinements as "bed-ill" and "sea-ill." The same class which is striving to retire sick is abusing ill in another connection, by inventing the mongrel "illy," a contrivance as clumsy in sound as it is unnecessary. Changes in language were never yet effected by rules and regulations. Words creep in as they are needed and disappear as they prove useless. We have not a single vestige of the Spanish expressions so prevalent just after the late war. Even here, in California, where they were partially acclimated before, they have not remained. Neither are the Boer expressions carried back to England taking root there. There is a tendency to make use of "Marconigram" to designate despatches by the wireless system, and some one has suggested "Mackaygram" for messages sent by the new Pacific cable. It is possible that the novelty will take hold for a little while, until the new systems have become a matter of course, and then "telegram" and "cable" will be found to fulfill all the requirements. In fact, the made-to-order words which are proposed from time to time are no more successful than the made-to-order languages. There have been half a dozen artificial languages invented and perfected, as far as grammar and construction could go. They have been taken up by scholars and savants, as well as by teachers and business men, with the idea of establishing a universal medium for communication, but none of them has yet advanced beyond the "plaything" stage, so far as practical use is concerned. There is just as much hard work and study required to master Volapuk, Blue, or any other of these tongues as goes to the learning of French, German or Russian, and there is no literature to repay the student for the exertion. Languages grow slowly and the elect can do but little more than the non-elect in the matter of hastening the process.

The Whipping Post

A bill has been introduced in the Legislature of New York to establish the whipping post as a form of punishment for certain misdemeanors and transgressions, and considering that similar measures are reported as being recommended in other sections of the country it will not be surprising if some State actually adopts the measure and gives a practical demonstration of its usefulness. There is really no objection to the cat o' nine tails except that of the sentimentalists who believe, or affect to believe, that criminals should be treated with especial consideration. When a man is incorrigibly lazy, when he refuses to support his family or treats his wife and children cruelly, the present plan is for the charitably inclined to supply his deficiencies and let him enjoy the proceeds. If he is arrested, he goes to jail for a short period, where he is fed, clothed and kept warm at the public expense, and probably enjoys greater comfort than his family. The burden of support falls on the community, and as he is usually of the class which pays no taxes, he is just that much ahead. The argument of "brutalizing" counts for nothing, for such a character is as brutal as it can be, and there is some chance of working an improvement by the application of the only argument which appeals to him, physical pain. Men who have no shame, no feeling whatever about mere imprisonment, will be apt to remind themselves of the sensations which reside in a sore back, and think twice about committing an offense which will call for a second application of the rod. There is always a lot of nonsense preached and written about the humiliation suffered by prisoners, but the habitual misdemeanant himself knows nothing of it. A respectable, law-abiding citizen makes a big mistake in transferring to the wife-beater and the incorrigible shirk the sufferings which he would undergo mentally if he were placed in such a situation. There is no necessity for the whippings administered to be unduly severe, and no occasion for them to be given in public. There is no likelihood that judges will impose the sentence when it is not needed. Every misdemeanant who falls into the hands of a constable is not in danger of having his back flayed, but the persistent and incorrigible, who have not proved amenable to kinder treatment, would be speedily brought to terms. There has been so much sickly sentimentalism in the treatment of law breakers that it is becoming necessary to revert to original principles and treat savages like savages.

The Boundary Dispute

Secretary Hay having agreed to submit the Alaska boundary question to the arbitration of a commission of six members, it has once more become the topic of discussion. Never until the richness of Alaska became apparent did England raise any question as to the boundary line. The whole course of diplomatic negotiations, from 1861 to the present day, negatives the contention of Canada that she is entitled to access to the sea above fifty-four degrees, forty minutes north laitude, and her own as well as the British map makers set the boundary line thirty miles back of the sinuosities of the coast line. It was in 1867 that the United States purchased Russian Alaska, and the Russian boundary line became the American. It was fixed by an Anglo-Russian treaty in 1825 and it was never disputed until 1898. The object of Russia was to prevent the Hudson Bay Company from building a chain of posts on the mainland opposite the Russian islands. There was no misunderstanding about the boundary line on the part of Great Britain during the forty-two years that intervened between the date of the treaty and the acquisition of Alaska, nor during thirty-one years of American occupation. Even as late as 1876 the Dominion Government acknowledged the justness of a protest entered by our Secretary of State against a violation of the sovereignty of the United States by Canadian constables who took a prisoner across the territory now claimed by Great Britain. But Canada now wants a port to promote the development of the Yukon territory. Hence the dispute. The purpose of the Hay commission is to quiet title for all time.

An American Rand

Not long ago a high authority on gold production estimated that in the course of a few years the annual output of the gold mines of the world would approximate four hundred million dollars. When that estimate was made nothing was known of the project of an English and American syndicate to develop a district in Alaska, the richness of which is said to equal that of the Rand in South Africa. It has been thoroughly experted by the syndicate, and he has reported that it is capable of yielding five hundred million dollars, that the gravel yields on an average of two dollars in gold to the cubic yard, and that by reason of the natural and hydraulic facilities that are there or may be established there, this gold can be extracted from the gravel at a cost not to exceed sixty cents for each cubic yard. No rush of miners to the district will take place, for individual mining cannot succeed there. The field can be operated only by a corporation capable of furnishing the capital necessary to establish the placer mining plants. Moreover the undertaking is one in which the public will not be invited to join. The syndicate will be a close corporation whose securities will not be placed on the market. The news of the prospective operations of this syndicate has aroused great interest in Eastern financial circles. The fact that the Rothschilds are understood to be among the most active of the capitalists who are to finance the scheme, tends to increase the interest, for our financiers are quick to comprehend what it means, not only for the commercial and industrial activity of the United States, but also what the stimulus to commerce and manufacture throughout the world will be if it be true that in addition to the output from the gold fields already being exploited in Alaska, there be added a new district matching that of South Africa. It is the impression of financiers that the influx of so much new gold will lead to the opening up of hitherto undeveloped or only partially developed portions of the American hemisphere. Possibly it was a knowledge of what may be expected within the next three or four years from Alaska which prompted James J. Hill to state recently that instead of having reached the commercial divide and being on the industrial down grade, we were yet a long way from the climax of development and prosperity.

Perkins Gave the Tip

Nobody appears to know how the news leaked out about the reasons that actuated the Naval Board at Washington in refusing to award to the Union Iron Works a contract for the building of certain ships upon which that company had put in the lowest bid. The manner in which the news leaked out would have been no great mystery to me even though I had not been enlightened by a correspondent at Washington. He says that the straight tip came from Senator Perkins. So the crafty statesman has scored one more hit against the Scotts! He was no doubt bubbling over with delight when he told the newspaper correspondents sub rosa, which is a favorite way he has of disclosing State secrets, that the Administration feared to award the contract to the Scotts on account of labor troubles. The dailies tell us that Perkins called on the Secretary of the Navy to urge him to award the contracts to the Scotts.

Looks Like Sweet Revenge

Fancy George C. Perkins exercising his political pull at Washington in the interest of the Scotts! It was only a few months ago that Irving M. Scott was dealing out money in liberal doses with the expectation of putting the quietus on Perkins's Senatorial aspirations. The bitterest kind of a feud exists between Perkins and Scott, and it was intensified during the visit of McKinley when the foundryman took occasion to snub the Senator in a brutal manner. Under the circumstances it isn't likely that Perkins tried very hard to convince Moody that he should put the Scotts in the way of making a few million dollars. On the contrary it looks very much as though Senator Perkins has enjoyed a sweet revenge.

To Discourage Divorce

The Legislature is once more grappling with the divorce evil. A bill has been introduced, at the instigation, I believe, of Father Yorke, which provides that the District Attorney of each county shall interplead in all divorces instituted within his jurisdiction. The purpose of this measure is to force the State to take an interest in divorce proceedings, and to discourage collusion. It is based upon the theory that as it is the duty of the State to safeguard public morals the authorities should concern themselves with an institution that is more responsible than anything else for the looseness of morals. Though the popularity of divorce is due to the modern decadent standard of morality which sees no wrong in anything that doesn't threaten commercial stability, rather than to the laxity of the laws, nevertheless the proposed measure is a step in the right direction. The prospect of the interposition of a public official is bound to deter many people from rushing into the divorce court, but legislative action cannot accomplish much in the way of discouraging divorce while intellectual poseurs are spreading broadcast the pernicious doctrine that the Decalogue is an anachronism, and "higher thought" exponents are advocating the theory of elective affinities.

The Secret of the Rush

"Ned" Greenway is thinking of throwing up his job of floor manager of the Mardi Gras ball, and all because of the number of young women who are urging him to make them pages at the function. Never before were there so many candidates. Indeed, heretofore Greenway had to scout for pages and he generally made his selections in the Tivoli chorus, but this year he is being pestered to death with applications, and the society leader is such a tender-hearted fellow when feminine feelings are concerned that he is reluctant to say no. When the applications began pouring in he was amazed. It was not until Claudia Rodgers put in an appearance that the secret of the unprecedented rush was revealed to him. It was then that he was reminded that last year he slipped a ten-dollar piece into a page's raiment alongside of her powder puff.

A Meteoric Past Recalled

A contest in the Oakland courts over the guardianship of the estate of John Llewellyn Auzerais, son of Mrs. Esmiol, revives reminiscences of the checkered career of the lad's mother. Though the dailies have made brief mention of the contest, which involves an estate valued at one hundred and thirty thousand dollars, they failed to recognize in Mrs. Leon Esmiol that erratic personage, Mrs. Auzerais, formerly of San Jose and later of the world's dramatic stage. San Franciscans remember when Mrs. Auzerais, after winning laurels in an amateur production, formed a company to produce Daly's plays and pioneered a theatrical venture in the frozen North. Mrs. Auzerais, after inheriting a small fortune, came up from San Jose and proceeded to spend her money in her own way. She had her apartments at the Palace furnished with sultanic sumptuousness and when she tired of repose she became a theatrical star. In her company that sailed for Alaska only to meet with shipwreck were Holbrook Blinn, who is to be Grace Kimball's leading man next season, and several clever amateurs. Hereward Hoyte coached them while they stayed in town, and in his coaching he won the star's heart. Estranged by her plunge for fame from her husband, a marriage with Hoyte was the sequel, he having previously become freed by the courts from his wife, Lillian Beddard, the Australian actress.

Before and Behind the Footlights

The Hoytes rented a furnished house on Pacific Heights, where they lived between the pauses between starring ventures and wild bohemian splurges. When they gave up their tenancy a big damage suit was brought by the agent against Mrs. Hoyte. It appeared that her son, the little John of the present suit, had in his merry play kicked out several door panels, and when his little arms needed exercise he had swung from chandeliers. Curtains pulled from their poles, and portieres torn from their rings, disemboweled clocks and a dismantled garden were among the playful depredations of little John Auzerais. Later, Mrs. Hoyte was in the papers again, the people in the hotel where she lived having been disturbed by her cries for protection for herself and son from her actor-husband. But she loved the thespian with all his faults and later went off to Europe with him.

The Drop Curtain

Thence in time came hysterical cables telling of their desperate straits and pleading for money in ten thousand lots. The trustees of the estate would not send any, asserting that Mrs. Hoyte had spent her share and that she could not have little John's to squander. When other people had almost forgotten the meteoric career of the Hoytes, Hereward died. His widow could not be consoled and swore that her heart was in his grave. Later however she contracted a third marriage with a drummer. Her suit for her son's guardianship was cut short by fate, when Mrs. Esmiol passed away in an Oakland sanitarium this week.

Is There Anything Wrong?

The best regulated orphan asylums are popularly regarded as institutions for the hand-raising of parentless children, and it is also a popular supposition that a child raised in an orphanage does not enjoy a milk-and-honey existence. The fact is that in an abstract sense the orphan asylum is an institution which supplies regulation stepmothers who substitute a fine executive ability for maternal affection in the rearing of the young. The institution inherited a black eye from predecessors of an earlier period, and in reputation it suffers for the sins of its forbears. But in late years there has been vast improvement in the methods pursued in the training of the little folks in public institutions, and I have heard that in our own Maria Kip Orphanage the inmates were treated most kindly. I know that they are superbly housed, and that they wear esthetically picturesque costumes, and are supplied with good wholesome food. The Orphanage is the pet charity of several society women who are interested in seeing that the management is beyond reproach, therefore I was surprised to learn that some significance has been attached to a reference made to it by a clergyman at the recent Episcopal convention. He merely suggested that the delegates should visit it and take an interest in its material welfare.

Charges of Cruelty

Though the clergyman, Rev. L. C. Sanford, may not have intended to convey any hint, people who are aware of the fact that something in the nature of a scandal was smoldering beneath the Maria Kip Orphanage some months ago think that he did. It was in August last that local Episcopal dignitaries were shocked by charges of a sensational character against the management of the institution. The charges were preferred by women employed in the institution, but the investigation was a star-chamber proceeding, for all concerned in the welfare of the Orphanage dreaded publicity. As the Orphanage is a quasi-public institution there should have been no effort at concealment. Investigations behind closed doors are never satisfactory. However, there were women who testified to instances of inhuman treatment, of corporal punishment inflicted until blood was drawn and little ones beaten into submission. Evidently the inquisitors were not convinced that there had been any unnecessary harshness, but now it is being said that the lady managers were inclined to scoff at the charges because they were made by disgruntled subordinates. But usually when mismanagement of such institutions is revealed, the public is indebted to disgruntled subordinates for the revelations. If it were not for the revengeful spirit of the disgruntled many humane reforms that accomplished much good would never have been instituted.

Will Concentrate Its Offices

I am told that the Southern Pacific Company is negotiating with the Merchants' Exchange Association to lease for an extended period the nine upper stories of its new eleven story building. For some time past the railroad company has been hunting over down town locations to get a big building to house its scattered offices. The best chance that offered was the Hayward building, but the owner of that building declined the tempting offers made him: he was afraid that when the railroad moved out his building would be injured as an office-renting proposition. The new Merchants' Exchange building offers the best accommodations the Southern Pacific Company has found in the desired locality. The nine stories will afford ample room to accommodate the numerous wings of the Southern Pacific Company. If the proposed lease goes through many of the offices in the Fourth and Townsend streets building, the various offices in the Union Trust, the Hobart and the Crocker buildings, besides the numerous agencies and headquarters of the several steamship lines, will all be concentrated in the new building.

Phelan's Strategic Dinner

Senator-elect Frank G. Newlands of Nevada has decided that hereafter he will not attend any more dinners given in his honor unless he is permitted to scrutinize the list of invited guests, and bar those to whose presence he objects. This is one of the prerogatives of royalty but Mr. Newlands is not afflicted with the delusion that the divinity that doth hedge a throne also vouchsafes an egis to the toga. He merely wishes to assert a personal privilege for his own protection against political strategists. He claims no official prerogative, but in justice to himself he deems it advisable to stay away from formal feasts which, though they be given in his honor, and appear to be perfectly harmless, may be loaded with highly explosive political significance.

Gavin and His Side Partner

The other day the unsophisticated sage-brush Senator was invited to a dinner at the Pacific-Union Club by that prince of hosts, Mr. James D. Phelan. Mr. Newlands accepted the invitation, coming as it did from a representative citizen of California, an ex-Mayor of San Francisco, and a multi-millionaire representing vast interests. He assumed that Mr. Phelan desired to honor the Senator from Nevada, and never did he suspect for a moment that any ulterior purpose was to be subserved. It proved a very palatable dinner and Mr. Newlands met one or two distinguished men, but the most conspicuous "among those present" was Mr. Gavin McNab, the repudiated boss of the recent campaign, and the man by whom he was repudiated. Mr. Franklin K. Lane. The presence of the recent gubernatorial candidate in cheek-by-jowl companionship with McNab at the Phelan dinner was significant, aside from the fact that Lane so vociferously asserted his freedom from the Phelan-McNab taint in the late campaign when he was ardently pleading for the support of the labor unions. But that significance was not revealed to Senator Newlands until the next day.

The Sequestered African

But the ignorance of Senator Newlands is excusable. His own political fight in Nevada has absorbed his attention for many months, and he therefore knew nothing of the ramifications of San Francisco politics. But when the local situation was revealed to him, the political downfall of Phelan, the kicking out of McNab and the defeat of their creature, job-chaser Lane, it gradually dawned upon him that the dinner was a bit of strategic subterfuge designed to give prestige to a pair of decadent Democrats by bringing them into conspicuous contact with a distinguished member of the Democratic party. It was after being called upon for a dozen times to explain his presence at that dinner that Mr. Newlands resolved to exercise more caution in the future before accepting invitations from people who affect an eagerness to honor him.

Gibson "Originals"

According to one of the Sunday Supp writers of the Hearst syndicate, Dessa Gibson, a New York chorus girl, is going to marry Carlo di Rudini, son of the famous Prime Minister of Italy. "She is," says the Supp. man, "the original of Charles Dana Gibson's 'Widow.'" Alleged originals of that distinguished artist's creations are becoming more numerous every day. No well regulated chorus is without at least one of them. When Mrs. Stevens arrived in New York from Kansas City a little over a year ago, Gibson's "Widow" series had almost run its course. She applied for a job in the "Florodora" chorus and was engaged. Somebody told her that she resembled Gibson's "Widow" and she promptly adopted "Dessa Gibson" as her stage name. Up to that time she had never met artist Gibson, and I doubt whether she would know him now if she saw him. However she has since been known as the "original of Gibson's widow," and though the facts are familiar to Sunday Supp. writers they will probably continue to write of her as such until the end of the chapter.

"I think she has a past."
"Then she is destined to have a future."
"Why do you think so?"
"It's the woman with a past that has the intellect to achieve a future."

Beware of the Count

M. le Comte Robert de Montesquiou-Fezensack is threatening to come to this city to enlighten us on literature and art. He says that he has been invited to come by a wealthy woman of culture who lives in fashionable Burlingame. As Mrs. Will Crocker is the only wealthy woman in that burg who has any culture worth speaking about I presume that the Count refers to her. From what I have read of the foreigner who is now in New York I should advise that the invitation be withdrawn. The Count is an esthete who keeps himself highly perfumed, wears silk pajamas ornamented with hand-painted poppies, and when he goes driving he has two rubber bags filled with hot eau de cologne at his feet. Each bag is encased in a silken cover. The Count has a wonderful gait. He takes very short steps and between every third and fourth steps makes a little half skip and hop, at the same time lifting his hands slightly and pursing his lips as if humming a tune. No doubt the Count is an interesting chap, but he is altogether too esthetic.

Grau's Retirement

The greatest sensation of the day in musical circles is the abdication of Maurice Grau, the opera king. Mr. Grau is an Austrian by birth, but he came to America when he was five years old. He was a lawyer by profession, but finding the practice of law a trifle dull he decided to enter the theatrical business. He began his managerial career in 1872 with Aimee, the famous opera bouffe singer, as his star. After exploiting her he handled a number of French stars until 1882, when the firm of Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau was organized. They directed the tours of a number of foreign actors and actresses, prominent among whom was Sarah Bernhardt. They made lots of money until they undertook to give opposition to Colonel Mapleson in a grand opera venture with Christine Nilsson and Madame Sembrich. Mapleson had Patti and Gerster. Abbey, Schoeffel & Grau lost two hundred and fifty thousand dollars in one season and went back to the management of Bernhardt. They didn't experiment in opera again until 1892, when they lured Patti away from Mapleson by offering her forty-five hundred dollars for each performance. The venture was successful until Patti tried to sing Carmen and made a failure of it. It was not until the season of 1892, which marked the first appearance in America of the De Reszkes, Emma Eames and Plancon, that they began making big money out of opera.

The Removal Project

When Senator O'Neal introduced his amendment for the removal of the capital to San Jose he was jocularly guyed by the good people of Sacramento. During the week, however, they have manifested some uneasiness. When a similar project was agitated eight years ago, at the close of the Legislative session, it created a big sensation. The people of Sacramento became alarmed and they raised a large fund to beat it. There are many astute and experienced politicians in Sacramento, and consequently the removal of the Capital is no simple undertaking, but it is a consummation devoutly to be wished. Sacramento is objectionable not only because of its remoteness from the large centres of population, but on account of the meagreness of its accommodations and the unhealthfulness of its climate. There is not a more forbidding burg in California than that inhospitable town with its antiquated hotels, its unsavory hash-houses and its malarial breezes.

Plagiarism in Music

In discoursing on the origin of songs, a writer has noted, amongst other imitations, that one of the latest successes is only the old "Maid of Athens" syncopated, but for that matter, the curious and observant can discover queerer things than that. Fitzgerald made no secret that he found church hymns and Sunday-school songs a source of inspiration, having made the discovery quite by accident, in playing over a hymn to a quickened tempo. "Yankee Doodle," it is said, is an old Papal chant which dates back to the twelfth century, and a popular dance tune in our own mining camps, known there as "The Maid of Monterey," is only the Sunday-school hymn, "I Want to be an Angel," played to quick time. "Hold the Fort" is set to the tune of an ancient Teutonic drinking song which, if it were translated literally, would never be permitted to pass the quarantine station, and "All on Account of Eliza," in the opera of "Billee Taylor," is Mendelssohn's "How Lovely are the Messengers," from the oratorio of "St. Paul." "When the Robins Nest Again," which might almost have had a new lease of life from its reiteration in "Madame Butterfly," is the same as "Maid of Athens," and "Wait till the Clouds Roll By," which was one of the popular favorites a few years back, begins precisely like the "Blue Bells of Scotland." Another popular favorite of a certain kind, "Sunday Night, when the Parlor's Full," was a recrudescence of "The Last Rose of Summer," and one could go on endlessly enumerating duplicates, in which a change of accent or time has sufficiently disguised the origin of the music. When Scanlan's "Peek-a-Boo" was new the publishers threatened a suit for damages against a rival firm who were bringing out "Will You Meet Me, Darling Josie," and they, nothing daunted, set an agent to work to discover the origin of the music for the "Peek-a-Boo" chorus. In a short time they were able to confront their accusers with Abt's "When the Swallows Homeward Fly," and nothing more was heard on the subject of the suit. There is so much of this transferring, altering and bodily "lifting" done, that in any given case an accusation is apt to savor of the amenities of the pot and the kettle.

A Bored Butterfly

It's a dreadful bore to be a society butterfly, I am assured by a young man of that species who is quite popular in the local swim. A butterfly existence in this city, he says, is wearisome because wherever you go you meet the same people, and you get tired looking at them and hearing the same voices and the same guff. Verification of this judgment is to be found any day in the social columns of the dailies. All the entertaining is being done by a little clique, the members of which are strenuously engaged in trying to convince themselves that they are scoring social triumphs in ornamental and frivolous roles. If it were not for the advertising they get it would all be deadly dull. It is the ultra-smart woman who lives to be advertised and whose greatest misery is to be ignored. The modest violet is a rare flower in society.

Another Bachelor Caught

The society gossips have another engagement to talk about. The ultra-smart set has had several surprises of late, and the latest, given by George Newhall and Miss Taylor, is not the least. Of Mr. Newhall it was said that it was inconvenient for him to marry, but the announcement of his engagement silenced idle conjecture. Now that it has been demonstrated that bachelors Deering, Hall and Newhall, and widower Beale, were not immune to Cupid's wiles, matchmaking mammas may take heart, and who knows but that they will be angling again for Mr. James D. Phelan? The winter's campaign has been decidedly a good one from the match-making parent's point of view. It is curious to note how the matrimonial wave rises and subsides from time to time. In one season there will be an absolute dearth of engagements among one's acquaintances; the next will remind one of the last chapter of a novel by the Duchess where everybody with one accord gets married to everybody else, all in the space of two or three months.

Never, Never—Yet He Will Wed

In the same Chronicle that announced Miss Carrie Taylor's engagement with George Newhall appeared a supp. article in which Mr. Newhall was numbered among the bachelors who asseverated that they would never change their condition. So men, as well as women, change their minds sometimes. Mr. Newhall's bride will own some of the most artistic furniture and house finishings in San Francisco, for Mr. Newhall is a connoisseur in that sort of thing. He has some beautiful bric-a-brac and rare chairs and draperies. He had one of the first smoking rooms here fitted up in Oriental style, and he has a valuable collection of pipes. Old armor, too, is among his possessions. There was nothing especially romantic about this engagement, though the match is an excellent one in every respect. Miss Taylor has been out a number of years and she has the aplomb of an experienced society woman. She is clever and both she and her fiance have many tastes in common.

Marriages of Convenience the Rule

If it were not for the occasional elopements and divorces the element of romance would be quite dead in society. The engagements announced of late have as a rule been those of bachelor maids and men who have remained free until the romantic age was passed. After exhausting the enthusiasms and emotions of youth, the men conclude that it would be as well to marry. So they look about them for a wife who will be a proper mistress for their home. In seven cases out of ten they choose some one they have known for years, who is en rapport and who will fill the requirements of a presiding genius, to entertain their friends and manage their household. These marriages are for the most part happy, even though the spark of romance is left out.

Patti's Next Au Revoir

Will L. Greenbaum is no longer an itinerant impresario, for he has secured a temple of music in which he will proceed to pull off his great musical treats. He is now the lessee of the Alhambra, and he intends to metamorphose that house into a cosy, sumptuous music hall. This should be glad news to music lovers who have hitherto found it difficult to banish the chills even under the warming influence of high class melody in the frapped atmosphere of Steinway hall. Mr. Greenbaum has come into undisputed control of the local musical field, and he has some exceptionally high class attractions coming in addition to those already here. I hear that Edouard de Reszke and Nordica are to be here in May, together with one of the finest orchestras that ever crossed the continent, and the perennial Patti—shout it in stentorian tones in Gath or proclaim it through a megaphone in Askelon—is to visit us on just one more farewell tour. Do you remember Patti's farewell tours? Well, this is to be like the others, a special car and hubby (the third, I believe) is to be of the entourage. She is to give sixty concerts, commencing November fourth in New York, and four of them will be given in this city. At each concert she will sing one solo, with an encore, one concerted number and a scene from "Il Barbiere," "Linda" or "Traviata." The artists to accompany her are now being selected in Europe. Patti is sixty if she's a day but her vocal organ has not lost its high note nor is its quality impaired.

Our Breezy Western Provincialism

San Francisco never shows her provincialism more blatently than in the manner in which she entertains visitors of more or less distinction. The literary star of any degree of brilliancy she draws to her bosom with a gladsome shout of welcome, even though that same luminary is merely recorded in the astronomical charts of the East. The reasons for this are manifold. One of them is that we grow more fruit than genius out here, and the other that our literary wonders usually stay here only long enough to write the book that shall call them to New York. Miss Bertha Runkle has come, seen and conquered and the reception she has received on every hand has almost frightened her to death. She was seldom dragged into the lion's cage in New York, where they are blase on the subject of menageries, so, being a somewhat timid little woman, she imagined at her first tea here that she was going to be dragged limb from limb. Her popularity at afternoons and dinners has made the reading of "The Helmet of Navarre" quite the rage again in this city and it has considerably increased the local sale of the book. No one cares to face Miss Runkle and confess that he or she has never read Navarre's swashbuckling chronicle, so society women have been "boning" on the book like students before a college examination. One day last week a well known bud was caught poring over the pages of "The Helmet of Navarre." "Don't interrupt me," she said, "I'll have to finish this before that Runkle tea." "But why do you read it if you haven't time?" was asked. "Because," was the reply, "I'll have to tell Miss Runkle, of course, that I have read her book, and if she takes it into her head to quizz me I'm not going to be caught. So I have learned who Navarre was, what he did, what the book is about, who published it and how many editions have been sold."

Mrs. Joseph Martin received a large number of friends at her handsome new home, 2414 Fillmore street, Friday afternoon of last week. The rooms were lavishly decorated with American beauty roses. The hostess and her three sisters who received with her were charmingly gowned.

The Nobility of Her Nature

Mrs. Wellington Burnett is quite seriously ill, I hear, at the home of Mrs. Timothy Guy Phelps. The feminine progeny of Revolutionary sires were much amused by the story of Mrs. Burnett's inconsistency in opposing the proposition to buy tickets for the Booker Washington lecture and then attending the lecture in her own propria persona. But Mrs. Burnett's opposition was not due to race prejudice, I am told. She was actuated solely by a desire to discourage discussion of a topic that usually breeds dissension. Mrs. Burnett is a big-hearted woman, and she has done many noble things. It is related of her that some years ago she rescued two girls from a cruel father and raised them as though they were her own daughters. So cruelly had they been treated that for a time after they had been brought under her care they would shrink from her in a cowed manner, such was the timidity with which they had been inspired.

A Studio Reception

Society and Bohemia rubbed shoulders on Thursday of last week at one of the most delightful receptions given this winter. The affair was an at home at Mrs. May Mott Smith-Bird's studio in Post street. Mrs. Bird is a miniaturist who has not been located long in San Francisco but she has been here long enough to make many friends. Between the hours of five and seven her studio was filled with club men and society women, and representatives from the art world. It reminded a returned traveler of an afternoon tea in London's ultra-Bohemia. Miss Bender and Homer Henley sang, and Frederick Warde recited one of Shakespeare's sonnets. Mrs. Bird wore a beautiful gown of gray crepe de chine, trimmed with pearls. Miss Laidlaw and Miss Bender, who assisted her in receiving, were also becomingly gowned.

Cocktails Heralded His Approach

Fulton G. Berry who, with his wife, is visiting in the East, is being entertained most hospitably during his stay, by the Lambs and others. Before Mr. Berry left Fresno he bought a demijohn, filled it with cocktails, boxed it up and placarded it:

"Have one with me. I'm coming."

He sent it on ahead to his son-in-law, Frank Moulan. The "Admiral," as his friends call him, told a Bohemian Club friend that he ran away from Belfast, Maine, when he was nineteen years old, resolving never to return until he had made enough money to buy a mackerel gig and start a fishing business. That was fifty-three years ago, but he said he never, somehow or other, had been able to get money together to buy that gig. Nevertheless he at length decided to pay a visit to the old home, and hence his trip East. The Berrys' daughter, Maude Lillian Berri, is singing the prima donna role in Ade's opera "The Sultan of Sulu," and her husband is also of the company.

Mrs. F. R. Dray, president of Sacramento's Saturday Club, left this week for New York, accompanied by Miss Alice Dray. They will visit Mrs. Culver at the latter's beautiful home in Mount Vernon.

Can't Take the Pose

The retirement of "Kissing Bug" Hobson from the navy has been the cause of considerable conjecture in San Francisco, as well as in the East, for Hobson is well known in the ports of the far West. In fact is was once rumored that he was engaged to a local belle, but nothing came of the affair, for Hobson was ever liberal with his proposals. But the question of the day is, Why did Hobson retire? There are many theories from many sides, but the most common verdict is, Unpopularity. Hobson had always a pose of cocksureness and his goody-goody egotism did little to endear him to the drinking set, which is large in the navy. While studious to a degree, he was pedantic and priggish with his learning, and this unpleasant trait in his character gained for him the sobriquet of "The Walking Encyclopedia" during his lieutenantcy on the cruiser New York. In fact, the same qualities which made him the hero of Santiago bay estranged rather than endeared him to his companions. And the popular judgment upon him was often grossly unfair, as may be shown by the misfortune which befell him while he was yet an undergraduate at Annapolis. It seems that some charge of ungentlemanly or unprofessional conduct was lodged against one or two or three undergraduates, and the suspicion finally settled upon Hobson, who might have cleared himself by giving certain information desired. The information, however, was not forthcoming, for Hobson utterly refused to speak. As a consequence he was ostracised until after his graduation, when the fact came to light that Hobson had kept silence to shield a friend who was really in the wrong. This was an act of undoubted nobility, but like many of Hobson's noble acts, its consequences brought a cloud, not a halo. Hobson is, sincerely speaking, a hero, but nature has not given him the grace with which to strike the pose.

He Died and She Dined

Some people contend that it is no longer fashionable to mourn for the dead; that you can show respect for the departed by plunging into the gay whirl as well as by resorting to the usual conventional evidences of grief. This appears to be the notion of some of our local fashionables. Last Tuesday morning Mrs. John Luning died in New York and the same evening Mrs. Chauncey Rose Winslow gave a dinner in this city which was attended by Mrs. Luning's sister-in-law, Mrs. J. Athearn Folger, formerly Mrs. Cunningham but nee Luning. Mrs. Folger is very fond of society but she never went out much until she married Athearn Folger whose marriage to a woman of millions was an advantageous one. Mrs. Folger's frock at Mrs. Winslow's dinner was a wonderful affair of real lace.

The Winslow dinner was a sumptuous affair. The decorations in the dining room consisted entirely of pink roses, and the illumination was supplied by pink candelabra and lamps with passionate shades. Mrs. Mountford Wilson wore a frock said to be the latest thing in gowns. It was of lace of course and was made of shawls which are said to be heirlooms in the Wilson family. The trimming was of real silver and Mrs. Wilson wore a wreath of solid silver leaves in her hair. Silver is the newest decoration for gowns and there are not many fashionable gowns at present that are not trimmed with it.

The Davis-Everett Wedding

The wedding of Miss Eloise Davis and Mr. Wallace W. Everett will take place at three o'clock on February nineteenth, at the city residence of Dr. and Mrs. H. C. Davis, corner of Scott and Green streets. It will be a very quiet affair owing to a recent bereavement in the family of the groom-elect. The Right Reverend Bishop Nichols will perform the ceremony. The future home of the young people will be in Oakland where an artistic residence has recently been completed for them. Miss Davis has almost completely recovered from the severe accident of some years past which occurred while her family were spending the summer in Mendocino county. Her many friends are showering her with congratulations, for there is none of her set more deservedly popular in San Francisco society. Mr. Everett is prominently identified with the trade journal publishing field of this city, a graduate of the University of California in the class of '97 and a director of the Cosmos Club.

The Busy Social Beggar

Apropos of Mrs. Margaret Collier Graham's clever speech recently delivered before the California Club on "Social Beggars" I might say that there are many such in our midst, not amateurs, but professionals. These persons —mostly women—are much-dreaded scourges in the business districts where they have made themselves obnoxious by dint of their brazen effrontery and ill-concealed graft games. I have in mind particularly a rather well-looking young woman who runs a south of Market charity institution which is presumably for the education of the young. If gall and mendicant audacity goes for aught in the welfare of such concerns, her school ought to be as rich as the Carnegie Institute. The school, however, does not always flourish, although its lady charitizer seems to fare very well. She is fond of publishing abroad pictures of her school and its inmates, showing a bevy of neat and happy tots in modern and sanitary surroundings, but those who have visited the school declare that the pictures are somewhat idealistic.

Her Winning Ways

She has a regular route mapped out, including private subscribers and firms easy enough to be liberal with their merchandise, and these she enters, literally, without knocking. Her methods are strenuous. She will butt cheerfully into the private sanctum of an insurance, bank or railroad president, toy playfully with every loose article in the room and hang on to her busy victim until she has made a successful graft in the name of charity and her dear children. Then, loosening her clutches, she will flit jocundly to the next. Her work, for such unvarnished stuff, does very nicely. Once she entered the shop of an uptown florist and asked for some violets. The manager, who is sodden with the charity superstition, asked her if some other kind of flower would not do as well. "You see, madam," he said, "this is the time of the year when violets are the most rare. I have only a half dozen bunches in my store." "Oh, well," she replied sweetly, "I guess you can spare three bunches," and coolly handing two bunches to the little children with her, and taking one for herself, she swept out of the place. Truly the Lord loveth a cheerful grafter.

The Matron Was Shocked

Since the elopement of Daisy Parrott, the friends of that young lady are telling many stories illustrative of her remarkable aplomb. One of them is about an incident at the Palace hotel on the day of the elopement. An influential matron living at the hotel was shocked to learn that Mr. and Mrs. Whitney were in the grill eating dinner instead of sequestering themselves in their room. She marched down to verify what seemed to her preposterous. She gave a very chilly nod in answer to the young bride's beaming salute. They met in the elevator after dinner and the matron reprimanded the bride in a strident voice for acting in such an "undignified manner." The bride protested that she was "awfully hungry" and had gone down to the grill as a matter of course without thinking of the proprieties. "Just to show I'm not hurt at your criticism," added the bride, "I'm going to ask you innight. We're going to have lots of friends down." At which the matron was more shocked than ever. Indeed the Whitneys did hold a regular levee morning, noon and night until their departure for Rocklin.

Nance Gives Us Ibsen

When Ibsen's "A Doll's House" was produced in New York some twenty years ago it caused a scandal. The good people of the polite Gotham of that day were shocked. But Ibsen has came into his kingdom, and when Nance announced last week that she would start a series of Ibsen matinees on Thursday of this week nobody blinked an eyelid. Even the pulpit custodians of our morals said not a word. Yet Ibsen didn't write plays for boys and girls. Local theatregoers are not familiar with Ibsen. His cult is confined to academic circles, but he is recognized as easily the greatest dramatist of the age. He is great because of his technical mastery, his profound, unerring knowledge of human nature and his psychology. He is somewhat shy on humor but his creative powers are unsurpassed. His men and women are not pleasing personages, and their morals are not edifying, but they are human beings. He makes no concession to modesty, but his realism is tremendous and startling. Commonplace people are his puppets, and his powerful pictures are of contemporary life. They strike you with horror but they are true. Nance O'Neil is courageous to unfold the canvas. It was only a few days ago that a minister back in Massachusetts, the despatches tell us, protested against the production of Pinero's "Iris" on the ground that it is immoral. He had never seen it but he had read its story. I wonder what he thinks of Ibsen's dramas. I have read the story of "Iris" and in my opinion it is a piece that demonstrates that cultivated Bohemia is a nasty place, and that social laws are essential to human happiness. A play is immoral only when it makes vice attractive and virtue ridiculous, and "Iris" does not do that. Neither does Ibsen, and yet people protest against his plays because they shock little folks and prudes.

She Had the Recitation Habit

It is related that when Nance O'Neil was at Snell's Seminary she was a great bore owing to her mania for reciting selections from Shakespeare. Her schoolmates often begged her to quit, and she told them that they did not appreciate dramatic ability. Now that Blanche Bates and Nance O'Neil are near the top of the histrionic ladder one hears many reminiscences of those two distinguished women who started on their dramatic career in this city.

Unfortunate Foreign Marriage

Laura Banning, whose father cleaned up such a handsome fortune in Elsinore during the land boom in Southern California some years ago, has met with the usual domestic fate that befalls those American heiresses who leap into romantic matrimony abroad. After the family moved East to spend their money and get into the social swim Miss Banning went abroad. In Dresden she met handsome, dashing Lieutenant von Blunn of the Saxon guards, whose family had a certain prestige at court. Certainly every member of the family worked the prestige for all there was in it. When the American heiress came along the young lieutenant paid assiduous court to her. Through his influence she was invited to a number of very smart functions. The dazzling social season ended in his proposal and her acceptance and a handsome dowry put the lieutenant on his financial feet. Misfortune quickly followed. In spending his wife's money as freely as he considered proper he imbibed too much wine, got into a duel with a brother officer, seriously injured his man, and was dismissed from the army. Then he took all his bride's fortune and plunged into business. He knew practically nothing of business affairs and in a little while her fortune was irretrievably lost. Now the young wife has gone back to her parents in New York. The husband accepted the separation with a shrug of his shoulders. There will no doubt be a divorce at an early date. And so ends the matrimonial alliance abroad of another Californian girl.

President Theodore Roosevelt's wine is Ruinart.

Queer Feasts in Bohemia

Wild West dinners were not unknown at the Bohemian Club prior to the one at which the hair of McClure's assistant editor was raised. Joe Redding and Horace Platt gave a similar function some years ago to an Eastern tenderfoot, and they, too, attracted the police. Another picturesque function was that given at the club some years ago by Theodore Wores, Charley Peters and other kindred spirits by way of a josh on "Sir" Henry Heyman and other members who prided themselves on the cheap decorations that had been presented to them by the kings of Hawaii, Tahiti and other puny potentates of remote realms. The gentlemen with the decorations had given a "Decoration" dinner which proved a sort of mutual admiration function. Wores and his companions followed it with a "Tramp" dinner at which they all wore rags and dirty faces and ate with their fingers.

Casey Blocks Schmitz

The breach between Mayor Schmitz and Public Works Commissioner Casey is widening. It first became apparent when Casey blocked the Mayor's scheme to grab the patronage of the Health Department. When Schmitz made a little deal with Chief Wittman to secure control of that department he reckoned without his old friend Casey who happens to be the champion of Health Officer O'Brien, and who had made up his mind to save the latter's official scalp. When J. Leo Park resigned the secretaryship of the Board of Public Works the other day, Schmitz requested that one of Ruef's henchmen be appointed to the vacancy, but Casey again demurred. Casey is true to organized labor, and he had a man for the job in the person of Assistant Secretary Jortall of the Sailors' Union, and the latter was appointed. The Mayor and the labor unions are getting farther apart every day.

A Daily Question

How often a woman asks herself, What can I do to retain my youthful appearance without fear of criticism and injury to myself? For while all ladies wish to look beautiful, no woman can afford to use artificial means that would in any way detract from her refinement, as is the case by the use of powders and lotions which can not be put upon the face without being noticed.

Mme. Idaline's Face Cream is different from all other face preparations. It beautifies at once, preserves the skin, can be used without the slightest injury, and at the same time being invisible.

How Mrs. Harvey Lost a Girl

The merest mention of the eternal servant-girl problem, which unlike the wicked never ceases from troubling and unlike the weary never is at rest, sends the cold shudders down the spinal vertebræ of San Francisco's 400. Mrs. J. Downey Harvey is the latest victim of that new and ultra-fashionable disease, hired-girlitis. She gave a dinner party the other night, the guests were due to arrive at seven o'clock, and by reason of the storm the entire electric lighting service in the Western Addition went on a strike at half-past five o'clock. She summoned her butler and ordered him to gather together all the candlesticks in the house and place them on the dining table. An hour later, the lighting plant went into commission again, so she told the butler to take away the candles. He neglected to do so and when the guests entered the dining-room they were confronted by no less than twenty-seven candlesticks, china, ormulu and common tin, each decorated with a tallow candle and all twenty-seven spluttering away for all they were worth. The butler left the next morning and Mrs. Harvey replaced him temporarily with a maid. A few intimate friends had been invited for dinner the following day and Mrs. Harvey explained to her new acquisition that it was her invariable custom to have her mother, who was of the party, served first. "I have never worked in a place," remarked the maid, "where one of the family got served before the guests and I won't now. I'll quit first"; which she did, and a caterer's assistant waited on the table that day at dinner.

A Familiar Species

The "Cultureen" is an animal that has been recently discovered by an Eastern satirist, but the species has existed this long time to my knowledge under sundry different names. His habitat is the tea and the "salon," his prey macaroons, ethics and weak Oolong. His mane is shaggy, his coat long and black and his voice disagreeably well-modulated. He has a mauve soul, a pink conscience, an interesting complexion and an infinite capacity for idealistic, transcendental convulsions. The female cultureen is more common in San Francisco than the male, mainly because the local man is a busy, vulgar animal with little time for the "higher thought" which is the ozone of the Cultureen. The other day I made a tour of the Japanese stores, when I overheard one of the breed going over a pile of prints.

A Characteristic Outburst

"Oh, how adorable!" she was saying in a tinted voice. "Don't you positively worship Hokusai? Such tones, such contrasts, such curves! Don't you think that the Japanese masters tasted, in some measure, the inspiration of Oriental mysticism to have thus gained the power to thrill our innermost being by the passionate suggestion of the simple curve? Ah, that curve! It is like the exoticism of Swinburne or the symbolism of Maeterlinck—suggestive, evanescent, ephemeral—at once a threnody and a pæon! The lissome, tendriled twining of that curve—"

"Yes, real Hokusai," suggested the Jap behind the counter. "It very cheap today—$1.75. You want?"

"No," said the Cultureen with a sigh, "I would not dare to have it in my possession. If I should see it too often I should become tired of it, I fear. And to become tired—to fail to thrill at the truth and beauty of that curve—it would kill me—I'm sure it would!"

"I wish it would!" remarked a customer as he took his bundle and got out into the open air.

The Real "Sunny Jim"

The dark continent of literature, advertising, has its Napoleons, but they are inglorious, if not mute, and that for obvious reasons. We have no trouble finding out who wrote "The Confessions of a Wife," what the bright young lady author has for her breakfast and how many millions of her book have been sold in a week, but who, pray, knows anything about the originator of our old street car acquaintance, "Sunny Jim," whom Mr. Dooley satirizes thus:

"Out of the house went Lucky Jo—
Guff was the stuff that made him go"?

The author of "Sunny Jim" is a lady—or rather a school girl. She lives in Portland, Oregon, but she is making enough money out of her one and only stunt to go to Radcliff, like Mary McLane. She claims to have realized seventeen thousand dollars already out of her novelty, and she will make much more, for the series still continues and she is being paid on the royalty basis. The "Sunny Jim" pictures are being done by an Eastern artist, but the bulk of profits go to the writer, for it is the idea that counts. Speaking of ads., Judge for this week has a full page cartoon representing a fox terrier looking quizzically into the funnel of a phonograph. It is not hard to recognize in this the copy of a well known talking machine.

Why the Wedding Was Postponed

The trivial accident that happened to young Mrs. Merrill a few weeks ago, when she and her baby fell out of her carriage just as she was waving good-bye to the Merrill seniors, was far-reaching in its consequences. Mr. Merrill, in his haste to reach mother and child rushed down the long stone steps from the house so rapidly that he fell and sprained both his ankles. They were put into a plaster cast, and he was confined to his home for two months. The first day he ventured down to his office he slipped and both ankles were sprained a second time. The injury sustained by Mr. Merrill was not the only consequence of the hack-spilling episode. It was in consequence of his lameness, together with the ill health of Mrs. Merrill, that it was deemed advisable to postpone the marriage of Gladys and Harry Bates. The wedding was to have taken place February eighteenth but has been postponed indefinitely. The supposition is that it will take place in the spring, but Mrs. Merrill quite seriously objects to its taking place at all, or at least for some time, owing to the extreme youth of the betrothed pair. However, as the courtship was in progress for eight years the presumption should be that they know their own minds.

The Carrs of Kentucky

Lord Rosebery's name has been so persistenly coupled with that of Mrs. Alice Carr Chauncey that My Lord has been put to the pains and expense of cabling a denial of his engagement to that beautiful Kentucky widow. Lord Rosebery evidently hasn't been "landed" but those who know the Carr family have no doubt that if Mrs. Carr-Chauncey has made up her mind to write herself among England's peeresses nothing can stop her. There are other fish almost as big as Lord Rosebery in the matrimonial pond. Alice Carr's name was familiar to a few of the San Francisco elite eight years ago, but many people have never heard how this blue-grass beauty treated one of the scions of a wealthy Californian family. At that time Alice Carr, with her mother and a younger sister, Grace, were touring the Eastern watering places. The Carrs came from Louisville and though their father was a colonel that does not mean much in a land "where the corn is full of colonels, and the colonels full of corn." They had little social prominence and less wealth. When Colonel Carr was found dead, shot through the brain by his own hand, the only legacy left to his wife was a life insurance policy of five thousand dollars. Without waiting for the conventional time of mourning to expire, Mrs. Carr took her daughters East and paraded them at the various fashionable summer resorts. Alice, the elder, was such a dazzling blonde that she made an immense sensation at Saratoga. It was there that the Californian lad, fresh from Harvard, fell desperately in love with her and is said to have proposed at second sight. Miss Alice accepted him and the news was telegraphed out here to his people. As none of the Southern set here knew the Carrs, the young man's mother was afraid he was marrying beneath him and wrote a letter to Mrs. Carr that plainly showed she disapproved of the match.

A Bit of Strategy

Later on she went to Saratoga to look into the affair, and on her arrival she learned that Mrs. Carr had indignantly broken off the match, declaring proudly that she objected to the marriage of her son to one of the newly rich from California. The young man's mother thereupon sought to patch up the affair, but Mrs. Carr was a clever strategist. She had a bigger card up her sleeve—a Brooklyn millionaire named Chauncey. He married the girl and then sent the mother and her other daughter to Europe, where the latter married one of the British nobility. Mr. Chauncey died several years ago and it was rumored some time ago that his widow was going to marry her first love who is a bachelor and spends most of his time abroad.

Miss Hager's Latest

Miss Ethyl Hager is going to give a "Yellow Kid" dance. There are to be seventy-five guests all in Yellow Kid costumes so that it will be a wise Jack who knows his own Jill. It is almost time for the strain of living up to her reputation for originality to begin to tell on Miss Hager. But evidently all she has to do is to put on her thinking cap for a moment and all sorts of whimsical ideas come trooping out. The "Yellow Kid" dance is the latest delightful folly she has planned. I hear the supper is to be a Dutch feast eaten on beer kegs with all sorts of Dutch delicacies, from Wiener-Wurst to Kalte-Fische.

Wooed in Hawaii

The engagement of Miss Mary Nichols and Philip Lansdale which was announced Thursday was not a surprise, for it had been rumored ever since the young lady came back from Honolulu. She accompanied her father, Bishop Nichols, to Honolulu last spring, and it was then that she was wooed by Lansdale. The Bishop would not give his consent. He thought it too sudden, and that perhaps when his daughter left the tropics and got into the fogs and winds of San Francisco her passion would cool. But it stood the test of a long separation, and the churchman finally gave his consent. The young man is not very well off, being a clerk or something on a coffee plantation. His cousin, Lieutenant Lansdale, married the eldest of Sidney Smith's daughters. He was killed at Samoa by the natives in a most shocking manner. Miss Nichols is in her early twenties and is not what one would term a society girl. She likes church work and is given to intellectual pursuits, and though not a beauty has an interesting and attractive face.

A Famous Horse Cemetery

This last sale of racers at the Palo Alto stock farm recalls to mind the horse cemetery there. This unique spot of ground is about a block square. Many of the record-breaking thoroughbreds that brought fame and money to the farm lie buried there and make it without doubt the most curious cemetery of its kind in the world. Its foundation came about in 1888 when several of the famous Palo Alto horses met death in the fire of the big stable. Among them was the champion yearling, Norlain (2:31 1-2) by Norval (2:11 3-4). As Norlain was a champion and greatly liked by those on the Stanford estate, a beautiful spot was selected for her burial place. Gradually places were found beside her for the great sires and mares as they passed away, and so the cemetery grew.

Pardee's Petty Political Trick

Dr. Pardee, late of Oakland and now of Sacramento, may be a capable medical man but he isn't made of the stuff out of which great statesmen are fashioned. He has not been in office long, and he has not had any opportunities to exhibit the qualities of statesmanship. Indeed it has been impossible so far to judge him by the tests of the historical method, but his attitude in the squabble over the Bank Commission inspires the grave suspicion that he is too small for the job. It is evident that he has no hesitation in bringing to bear in State affairs those rank political methods that flourish on the other side of the bay among as measly a lot of pot-house politicians as ever filched a plugged quarter from a public treasury. When Pardee went to Sacramento he had an Oakland past to live down, but I fear that he will eclipse it. The misgivings of decent citizens in the late campaign when they had to choose between job-chaser Lane and Dr. Pardee are not likely to be allayed by such methods as those resorted to for the purpose of rebuking a political enemy. Dan Kevane is not an ideal Bank Commissioner but it is establishing a bad precedent when the Governor of the State encourages the Legislature to abolish a statutory body merely to wreak petty revenge. The Legislature is not the plaything or the tool of the Executive, and it is a crime to use it as such. In doing so Governor Pardee plainly showed that he had not a proper appreciation of the dignity of his office.

A Russian Wedding

Mrs. John R. McLean, the sister of Truxtun Beale, is cast for an unusual role in an important diplomatic marriage to occur the nineteenth instant at the Russian Embassy. She is to be the mother of honor to Mademoiselle des Planques, the daughter of the great Russo-Chinese banker, who will on that day become the bride of Alexander Pablov, Russian Minister to Corea. Count Cassini, the Russian Ambassador in Washington, will be the Father of Honor. Bishop Sikon of the Greek church will perform the ceremony, and the music will be furnished by the male choir of St. Nicholas church, New York. Immediately after the ceremony the bridal couple will start for Corea and they will pass through this city.

Society Cake Walk Artists

The cake-walk figure at the Spreckels ball is still the subject of comment and wonder. Ethyl Hager and Mr. Grace who led it are being told on all sides that their performance would make the contortions of the average professional look amateurish. That Ethyl Hager could cake-walk to beat rag-time, all her friends knew, but it was supposed to be quite out of Mr. Grace's line. Although he has been out here half a dozen seasons it was only this winter people managed to coax him from "stag" pleasures, so he is not even a familiar figure at cotillions. His cake walk gyrations were therefore a complete surprise. Mr. Grace comes of an excellent New York family. His father was a one time Mayor of that city and he had the social as well as the political pull. The new men going out his season have imparted a zest to things. One of those who are giving a new tang to social life is Dr. Zeile, a cousin of the Hopkins's who has just returned from an eight years' sojourn in Europe. Dr. Zeile has such courtly manners that the girls all say he is as good as a leaf out of one of the present-day popular romances. Distinguished manners are not native to the hothouse soil of San Francisco for the men of the smart set here have been spoiled.

Juggling Bills at Washington

My Washington correspondent writes me that Senator Aldrich and his clique are craftily making use of Quay's omnibus statehood bill to block Congressional action on three big measures that are particularly obnoxious to them. The three big measures are the immigration, the eight hour and the Hoar anti-injunction bills. These measures are strongly supported but they are stoutly opposed by the Aldrich contingent. The latter, who is leading the fight against Quay's bill, remarked to a friend, last week, that the Statehood bill would be kicked out of Congress without the least ceremony as soon as its usefulness for blocking purposes in the Senate was over. Aldrich laughed when asked if he had the necessary votes and tapped his pocket. The immigration bill is obnoxious to the shipping trust. The Hoar bill is obnoxious to those big corporations which, during strike times, rush to the courts and ask for orders restraining the strikers from doing things that may be prohibited by stretching the law. But the most obnoxious bill of all to them is the eight-hour measure. It is also the most strongly backed, and it has the approval of all the labor unions. The shipbuilding trust, the armor plate trust and other big corporations that furnish supplies to the government have spent thousands of dollars for the purpose of getting out newspaper articles in opposition to the bill. They are willing to spend thousands more to prevent it getting before the Senate or the House. They don't even want it to come up for discussion for fear it may gain strength in such corners as they have not touched. Hence the ruse to block action with the Quay bill and stave off any consideration of these three important measures till Congress is on the eve of adjournment. Then in the rush the pet measures of those on the inside will be pulled out of the fire and placed in safety.

Mr. Raphael Weill will be a host at a large dinner this evening at Marchand's, in honor of Mr. W. D. English.

When She Lived in Washington

Both Anne Apperson and her cousin, Miss Lane, who are to be married this spring, had the benefit of seasons in Washington society under their aunt's wing. When Mrs. Hearst decided to leave Washington and make California her permanent home, many a San Francisco girl felt a twinge of disappointment. For Mrs. Hearst was always most generous in hospitality, and not only gave her protegees seasons at the nation's capital, but treated them to transportation both ways and smart frocks during their stay with her. Sybil Sanderson's sister Jennie, Nellie Calhoun and one of the Hillyer girls enjoyed Washington seasons under Mrs. Hearst's wing. Senator Hearst purchased Secretary Fairchild's fine house in New Hampshire avenue, near the aristocratic Dupont Circle. The Secretary wished to leave Washington when the Harrison Administration came in. The house was exceedingly old-fashioned when the Hearsts took it but they had it entirely remodeled. A ball-room and a porte-cochere were added, and the shape of the house changed. When it was completed it was one of the handsomest homes in Washington. Mrs. Hearst dazzled the diplomatic swim by her magnificent entertainments and she soon became a social leader. The Senator never took any interest in the place or in society, for he detested fashionable entertainments. When he was not at the Senate he found his pleasure in driving behind good horseflesh or sitting in John Chamberlain's back room listening to good stories with a coterie of friends.

Little Willie developed a well defined case of scarlet fever a short time ago, and he communicated it to the other Crocker children, so for the first time Mr. and Mrs. Will Crocker know what it is to be socially ostracised. Mrs. Crocker is proving herself a most devoted nurse.

A GREAT TURF EVENT.

There'll be an even larger crowd than usual at the races today, the drawing card being the biggest event of the racing season —the Burns handicap. Competition for the ten thousand dollar prize will be brisk, and all the best racers are entered for the contest. Interest in the race is keen, and the owners of fleet nags are all looking forward to a lively event at Ingleside today.

Alice Rix in Paris

That brilliant journalist, Alice Rix O'Leary, has been heard from. She is living in Paris where she has sumptuous apartments, in an atmosphere that is most congenial. She is with her husband to whom she is as ardently devoted as she was in the days of her honeymoon. Her son by her first marriage, the erratic youth who figured as the motif for Miriam Michelson's first Smart Set story, is with his mother and is pursuing his art studies. Mrs. O'Leary lived in Paris with her first husband and it was there that she acquired the chic manner that so often found expression in her sparkling newspaper work. Her retirement from journalism was a distinct loss to newspaper readers, for her brilliant work was most refreshing. She has had many imitators but none that ever approximated the dash and sparkle of her unique style.

A Military Snubbing

A story is going the rounds about the snubbing of a handsome young army officer who has been capering nimbly in the inner circles of society lately. It relates to a dance given by him at the Presidio recently for the purpose of reciprocating many of the social favors that he had received. It appears that he had no intention of showing deference to his superior officers at the post by inviting them to the function, though military ethics provide for such courtesy when use is to be made of the official hall. However, the derelict officer was reminded of his duty by the Commandant and the invitations were thereupon forthcoming. But as the officer acted under orders, his brother officers decided to consider the invitations as official documents. And, as the story goes, these words were written across each: "Rejected and disapproved," after which the invitations were sent back.

Peixotto's Good Work

Ernest Peixotto did not have to go away from home to be appreciated. He was recognized long before he went to New York and set up a studio in old Washington Square. Then he went abroad on commissions to illustrate notable books, and by the way found time to paint his great "Lady in Yellow" that won honorable mention in the Paris Salon of 1901. The lady in yellow has the place of honor in the local exhibition of Peixotto's works that opened this week. Everything is well placed, the black-and-white drawings in one room and the paintings in another apartment draped in red, which is a color to which the artist inclines. His Venetian paintings are very beautiful, the tints just warm enough to please the eye. Tone poems, I should call these scenes. They are full of the the breath of life and of thought. An "Interior of a Fisherman's Cabin—Martigues" is especially worthy of mention. Peixotto was always famed for his pen and ink and wash sketches. His technic is irreproachable and in everything the poetic idea modifies the dry details. Mr. Peixotto has delivered one or two art talks during his stay here. Mr. Peixotto's wife, who is also an artist, traveled all over Europe with him and they are thoroughly en rapport in their ideas.

China Introduced to Bohemia

Most of the dishes served at the dinner given on Wednesday evening by Mr. Charles Victor Miller were prepared by or made under the direct supervision of the host, who is an amateur Brillat Savarin of uncommon skill. The affair was in honor of Ho Yow's successor at the Chinese Consulate, and there were twenty-eight guests entertained, the American contingent of the art or scribbling world. The Consul was attended by his suite, and several prominent Chinese citizens with their wives. All the decorations in the dining-room were of a Chinese character, the walls being hung with beautiful embroideries and tapestries. The menu comprised a number of Chinese delicacies, and a Chinese orchestra discoursed characteristic music. The host wore a costume in keeping, a gorgeously embroidered robe, and all his famous and rare jewels. There was a pretty little Chinese girl among the guests. She could not have been more than five or six years of age, but her perfect manners in the drawing room and at the table would have reflected credit on an American child of twice that age.

A Short Cut to Culture

In the catalogue of an Eastern firm which makes a specialty of educational works I came across the following:

"How to Study Literature." A novel, a poem, a history, a biography, a drama, an oration, a sermon, or any other literary production, if read or studied as this book tells one how to read and study, becomes a subject which one can discuss or write about in a thoroughly intelligent and comprehensive way. Enables you to talk about a book as if you had really sized it up completely. Just the thing for literary societies, reading circles, and the teacher and pupil; also for any one who desires to retain a symmetrical impression of the books he reads. 75 cents.

Now, if that is not what Mr. Dooley would call "near-think" I should like to know where we are to look for the commodity. It was "Gail Hamilton," the brilliant sister-in-law of James G. Blaine, who originated the prayer, "Grant that we may be well smattered," and here is the Bible, hymn book, and Book of Common Prayer, of the cult of the smattered, with illustrations and diagrams complete. It only needs an additional chapter giving directions how to obtain a comprehensive glance of the contents of a volume by looking at the covers of the volumes displayed in the windows of book-sellers. No doubt this particular work will be in great demand by the class to whom it is especially recommended, the "literary societies and reading circles," whose object it is to "talk about a book as if you had really sized it up completely," as well as for those teachers who never read except under compulsion, and in order to keep pace with their classes. The "literary society" which is so unliterary as to need such aid towards forming an opinion, and the "reading circle" which is on the lookout for some means to avoid reading should be crushed out. Culturine in two-grain capsules, and Liebig's extract of book are what they thrive on, and brainless idiots who neglect the stocking basket and the kneading tray to pose above the heads of their village contemporaries should not have the way smoothed for them. It takes more than a hen-club chattering about the latest novel to make a community intellectual, and it is one of the most unfounded assumptions of the age that everyone must be interested in books. How to read a book without reading it will prove a sort of "machine piano," like those contrivances which one found in obscure mountain villages some thirty years ago. By inserting a sheet of perforated paper into a box-like arrangement and turning a crank, and then listening intently and exercising the imagination to the utmost, faint, tinkling sounds might be made out which one could call music, because they resembled music as much as they did anything else.

"Come, come, good wine is a good familiar creature if it be well used." Iago.

Diana of the Ditch

The discussion had taken place the night before, over cigar ends and black coffee, while the women, with feigned indifference, waited in the room beyond.

During a certain course at dinner Miss Darcy had introduced the subject inadvertently, by asking Lord Archibald—familiarly called Archie—whom the huntress in wig and velvets represented. The painting alluded to was that of Lady Matilda, a portly dame in a broad, conspicuous gilt frame hung directly over the great antlers.

"That," said the young Lord gravely, "is my great grand aunt, the only woman, in fact the only person who ever took the Devil's Ditch."

Those who did not know of the place in question looked duly impressed and began asking covert questions about so great an event. Then Lord Archibald rose to the occasion and during a hushed silence proceeded, for the benefit of the uninitiated, to tell the assemblage of a ride which had passed into the annals of his house. Lady Matilda, buxom and smiling, looked down from the canvas, one hand grasping the whip with which she had conquered her Bucephalus.

Teddy Leeks made some disrespectful remark to his neighbor about the lady's lines not being parallel to those of an Amazon.

Miss Darcy looked up with awed violet eyes.

"Is it really such a terrible leap?" she asked demurely.

His Lordship adjusted his monocle before answering solemnly, "My sister's groom was killed last year in making the attempt."

Lady Mary shuddered at the recollection. The brother and sister had strong sporting tendencies, and if an indulgent world had not allowed a wide margin for titled failings, they might have been dubbed something analogous with the turf. Dame Grundy looked wise, but only a hint of their indiscretions had reached Mayfair.

Since the heir had come into possession and the dowager had abdicated, the Badington stables held the finest specimens of the equine product, and grooms were kept busy twelve hours out of twenty-four. At present the kennels were filled to overflowing for the hunting season had begun and the vicinity resembled a beehive.

The party was all agog with hunting and sporting topics, so the story of the famous leap only served as a fresh impetus.

"I heard," said Clayton, leaning forward to attract Miss Darcy's attention, "you made quite a record in Egypt last winter."

"Ah," she said, smiling, "Lord Archibald has promised me Sweetheart for tomorrow; she's the beauty of the lot. As for my Ciaro racing"—she looked scornful—"those miserable little ponies can hardly be termed horses."

"Do you think you can really ride her?" asked his Lordship anxiously.

The girl who had broken in her own horses in Arizona before the mine was struck, smiled down consciously into her plate.

"I can but try," she answered quietly. Clayton saw the prophecy of great things in her eyes; he secretly wondered if the Devil's Ditch figured in her dreams.

After the women had left the table, Teddy Leeks said suddenly, "I say, Archie, what would you do if some woman took that leap tomorrow?"

Lord Archibald turned and looked slowly at his questioner, then as though registering a pious vow replied solemnly: "What my great uncle did—marry her."

With one accord the men rose, and clinking glasses told that the witnesses had heard and were drinking to the possible Lady Archibald.

The morning broke cool and clear, tempered by a briskness that sent the blood coursing through the veins. The hounds in leash bayed impatiently at the bugle, awaking a thousand echoes. Horses champed uneasily, expectant for the run to come, and the park presented a scene of brilliant life, the red-coated huntsmen adding the needed color.

The American girl came slowly down the terrace to where the man stood holding her horse, the close habit showing the slim perfections of her figure, and her bright hair straying rebelliously from under the severe head gear. There was a grace and conscious strength about her every movement. Sweetheart stood with slender feet restlessly pawing the ground, and eyes luminous with suppressed eagerness. Every now and then the small groom at her bridle swung pendulum-like in mid air, powerless to resist. Coolly taking the reins Miss Darcy gently stroked the arched neck, at the same time whispering softly into the silken ear. The thoroughbred stood still in surprise, then the girl sprang lightly into the saddle. The firm hand on the snaffle guided the covorting animal until she settled into a steady trot. The cut across country is four miles over smooth downs marked with hedgerows and an occasional fence, then the Devil's Ditch, like a slash from a mighty sword, bisects the ground into two separate hunting fields. Further down, the bridge spans the chasm, and many a malediction goes forth as the sportsman sees the hound go clean across the the abyss he dares not attempt. The pushing, bustling crowd of horsemen suddenly dispersed: a fox had broken cover, and with a mad cry the dogs went speeding into the open. Lord Archibald on his great sorrel led the way with thundering hoof-beats.

"Wh-whoop!" cried Teddy Leeks, as his horse took a fence rail, and continued riderless.

No one stopped. On went the pursuers, keen with the chase, the hounds with lean lank bodies extended, were on the scent of an old customer and nothing could stop them. The whippers-in vainly tried to turn the course toward the bridge.....but on went the dogs, unerring, heedless of cries.

Chester the sorrel, and Sweetheart the mare, were neck and neck; with long, easy strides they took water course and fence, never pausing; with one impulse every obstacle was taken, and the country moved backwards with wonderful rapidity.

Then the sorrel plunged and reared, mad with the race and fear of that deep cut.

"For God's sake, don't!" cried a warning voice.

The little black mare, with sinews strained and muscles drawn, stood with hoofs firmly planted, ready for a wild leap; the satiny body quivered, then rose high in the air, horse and rider disappearing.

Lord Archibald rolled off his horse and rushed to the brink. The Ditch yawned wide, like Satan's mouth; there was the tramp of many feet and a speechless crowd, pale with horror, looked into its depths. A small innocent derby lay at the bottom; on the other side a girl sat her panting horse, proudly erect. Heedless of dogs or quarry, the hunting party sent up a mighty cheer.

Helen Darcy smiled back, her face a trifle paler than usual.

"By Gad," said his Lordship, mounting and riding swiftly to the bridge. He had something to say to Miss Darcy—alone. The other men speculated. She had mounted to the eminence swelling gradually to the ditch, and with trembling fingers was trying to confine her wind-blown hair. The approaching rider bared his head and gazed in speechless admiration. Wishing to impress his hearer he said, ponderously, slowly, "Miss Darcy, you are the most splendidly daring horsewoman I have ever seen." She nodded in acknowledgment as he continued: "You are the peer of Lady Matilda." She laughed lightly. "In fact," he went on, "I doubt if she rode as well. Few knew she was but a governess to my grand uncle's sisters, but while out riding one day she did that, too"—he pointed to the ditch with his crop. "My uncle asked her to be his wife." He paused. "Miss Darcy, I am going to do the same thing. Will you be mine?"

Lord Archibald looked away to his patrimony in a mildly meditative fashion, fully aware of his generosity, so politely tolerant. There was a stop, more of quiet acceptance than anticipation. The doves cooed softly in the woods beyond, and below them a break in the trees showed a glimpse of noble park and ivied turrets belonging to the princely abode he asked the American girl to share. She thought of Lady Matilda,a poor nobody on one side of the ditch, a lady of broad estates on the other. Then she laughed suddenly. Lord Archibald grew stiffly rigid.

"I appreciate the honor," she said quietly enough, "but I also decline it."

The glass dropped from her listener's eye.

"Do you know"—she spoke in a confidential tone, and leaning over her saddle as she looked at him frankly—"when I do marry, it will be some one over there." She pointed vaguely to where she thought the ocean might be.

"We have ditches and husbands, too, in America." This shot was delivered over her shoulder, for Sweetheart was growing restless. Then she cantered briskly off.

On the other side of the barrier, the pack was yelping and snarling, for the fox had been run to earth by the hounds, unaided. Clayton came trotting round with the freshly cut brush over his arm. It was to be laid at the feet of Miss Darcy, for whom he cherished a secret admiration. He looked at his Lordship's face, where surprise had given way to anger.

"Well, some one took the ditch," he said tentatively.

"Yes, some one did," then Clayton fancied he heard an expression not conspicuous for elegance.

The sorrel, objecting to the heavy hand on the bridle, together with the furious dig in the ribs, plunged violently. Clayton gave a long, low whistle.

"I see, old chap," he laughed softly, "which way the wind blows. Diana took the ditch . . . but wouldn't take You."

How Perkins Used His Pull

Scene: Office of the Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C.

Dramatis Personae: Senator Perkins and Secretary Moody.

Moody: Mornink, Perk.

Perkins: Howdee, Mood old man. Say, the Chamber of Commerce out in Frisco wired me to call on you to urge you to award those battleship contracts to the Scotts.

Moody: Who th' 'ell are the Scotts?

Perkins: They're the fellows what runs the Union Iron Works.

Moody: Oh, yes. Well, they're the lowest bidders; I suppose we'll have to award to them. They're all right, I suppose?

Perkins: Well—yes—that is, you see, those strikers are raising hell out there all the time, and the Scotts are having trouble with them.

Moody: You don't say! But then, I suppose they'll patch it up all right.

Perkins: Oh, yes; if you give them seven or eight years they'll pull through all right.

Moody: What!!!

Perkins: Well, say nine or ten years.

Moody: Why, man alive, we may need those ships in ninety days.

Perkins: Give them twelve years.

Moody: Do you mean to say they can't finish those contracts in less than twelve years?

Perkins: Well, I shouldn't like to stake my reputation as a gentleman and a prophet on it.

Moody: Then they can't have 'em.

Perkins: I'm sorry that you're so unreasonable. I'd like to help my friend Irvie Scott because he needs the money. He lost about thirty thousand experimenting in the Senatorial fight, and he doesn't think any more of a dollar than an ordinary man does of his life. However if you've made up your mind, I know you can't be swerved. But I want you to promise me something.

Moody: What is it?

Perkins: When the newspaper correspondents come round tell 'em I tried my damndest to coax you to give the contracts to the Scotts.

Moody: Oh, very well. —The Diplomat.

Society's Strange Caprice

The dailies appear to have been surprised by the statement of a Paris jeweler that Mrs. Charley Fair wore "imitation" jewelry abroad, but New York jewelers confirmed the report that it is customary for rich people to have their costly necklaces and pins duplicated with imitation stones which they wear while originals are securely kept in safe deposit boxes. It is a singular caprice of the rich that finds expression in the wearing of "imitation" jewels and the concealment of their gems. Why they should care to invest in costly jewelry that they are afraid to wear it is difficult to understand. One daily referred to the "imitation" stones as "paste." They are not. They are artificial gems such as are sold by the Alexandra company of this city. Mr. Alexandra of that firm recently explained to me that there is quite a difference between what is known as the "paste" diamond and the Alexandra. The former is a stone to the base of which is applied a substance that imparts a glitter which wears away. The Alexandra is a manufactured article that possesses all the elements of the genuine diamond.

"I have duplicated," said Mr. Alexandra, "some of the finest settings possessed by local society people, and have inserted Alexandra gems which they wear in lieu of their own genuine stones." —The Reporter.

EXPERT GIVES OPINION

AN EXPERT ON PEARLS WRITES:

The most delicate and beautiful of all gems is closely approached in this new production.

An imitation was up till now very brittle, and it imitated nothing but the appearance of a real pearl; all other qualities were absent.

This new scientific production of ALEXANDRA Silver and Fish Skin Pearls, not only gives the beautiful nacreous appearance, but provides the great properties of weight and hardness as well; in fact these ALEXANDRA Pearls are as heavy and as unbreakable as the real and costly Oriental pearl.

AN EXPERT ON DIAMONDS WRITES:

The ALEXANDRA MANUFACTURED DIAMOND is intensely hard and seems to possess all the essential qualities of the real diamond.

The durability and brilliancy of this new discovery has been tested in various temperatures, both high and low, and it was conclusively proven that the ALEXANDRA would retain its singular life and beauty indefinitely. My opinion is that these Manufactured Diamonds have come to stay, and will somewhat compensate ladies of social position for the excessive and rising value of the real diamond.

Hoyt Renascent

Memories of Charley Hoyt, America's greatest farce writer, were revived once more at the California, this week, when that familiar skit, "A Stranger in New York," was presented by a company consisting of the usual array of comedians and terpsichorean vocalists. When Charley Hoyt was writing farces with the same rapidity that characterizes the work of Clyde Fitch as a dramatist, it was thought that the children of his quaint genius were born for the hour. The Hoyt satire was applied to follies and customs of the day, and it was supposed that as time passed interest in the farces would cease, but it appears that the humor of the Yankee playwright was less evanescent than his critics imagined. After all, the funny side of life is the same today as it was a decade ago, and as it will be when the next generation of theatre-goers bobs up. The ludicrous experiences of the stranger in New York are as amusing now as they were when Hoyt first brought them to the attention of the public. The humor of the farce lacks the spontaneity that was so refreshing in some of Hoyt's earlier works, but there is a great deal of room in the piece for "specialty" work and the interpolations impart to it the necessary ginger. Jack Campbell, the leading comedian of the company, is an illustrious chap and makes up in activity what he lacks in drollery. William Mack contributes largely to the gayety of the piece, and Miss Sylvia Starr invests the role of the "best fellow" with piquant flavor.

A New Edmond Dantes

It is always pleasant for even the most dogmatic of us to have our judgment verified. Therefore do I cheerily point with pride to the fact that Mr. Ralph Stuart of the Republic, and late of the Murray Hill, has more than made good in the role which James O'Neill is popularly believed to have copyrighted. Last week I enthused over Mr. Stuart in the role of Don Caesar. He revealed himself to meagre audiences as an actor of intelligence and temperament in the part of the swaggering hero, and I predicted that he would make an ideal Edmond Dantes. And so he has. When O'Neill made his last visit here the effect of his acting in Monte Cristo was iconoclastic. He shattered the illusions of our childhood, for the rollicking actor whose achievements in our younger days we remembered as triumphs of histrionic genius failed to appeal to our mature emotions. The fact was that O'Neill had played Monte Cristo so many thousand times that he had become atrophied in the familiar role. He had developed into an automaton. Stuart brings us back to the Monte Cristo of the years agone. He has the enthusiasm and the imagination essential to a proper appreciation of the picturesque hero, and he lures his audience into sympathy with him. The production has its shortcomings but Stuart's performance neutralizes the worst.

Nance O'Neil's Farewell

The character of Parthenia is one that shows Nance O'Neil's art in a different phase from the tragical roles in which she has hitherto appeared. She is arch and tender by turns, and tames her savage in charming fashion. Herbert Carr's Ingomar is just in the right key for Miss O'Neil's Parthenia. The latter end of the week has been given up to that seldom produced drama, Scott's "Guy Mannering." Next week will be the last of Miss O'Neil's successful engagement here. Mr. Rankin will take his star on tour visiting San Jose, Los Angeles and other cities,, and stopping at Denver en route to New York. In New York Miss O'Neil will play at a Broadway theatre and will have a first-class company in support. Later a tour of Canada may be taken.

Not Her First Booking

The most charming ingenues of the stage are frequently those whose experience in private life would better fit them for heavy emotional roles. Nevertheless it was considerable of a shock to little Oza Waldrop's admirers to learn this week not only that the fascinating ingenue of the Alcazar is soon to marry a Mr. Clarence Grange, but that he will not be her first venture matrimonial. Oza Waldrop was once Mrs. Louis Meyer, her husband being a printer well-known here and in Sonoma county. Oza was a Baptist minister's daughter, and her early life was passed in a country town. Her success on the stage has been of the continous order. She is pretty, petite and plump.

Of the newest papers the Linen Bonds displayed by COOPER & CO. are most effective.

A Genuine Broadway Success

I may assure my readers, not on the authority of a press agent, that "The Little Duchess," Anna Held's musical comedy, that comes next week to the Columbia, was a geniune New York success, having played several months at the Casino to crowded houses. It is a typically sumptuous Broadway production with gorgeous costumes, heaps of beautiful girls, and three or four lively comedians. The chic little star has everything done for her by the authors and managers to accentuate her many attractions. In private life, by the way, Anna Held is Mrs. Ziegfield Jr., the wife of her wealthy manager. She is a quiet little lady, devoted to her husband and never exhibiting any of the Parisian naughty airs and graces of which she is so fascinating an exponent on the stage. The eel-skin dresses for which she is famous will probably be copied by San Francisco women, who have a knack of taking to a fashion when it is out of date in New York. Mlle. Held probably clings to them yet (or has them cling to her) for sinuousness is part of the charming comedienne's stock in trade.

Mrs. James Brown-Potter, since her late success in London as Calypso, has a new venture—a tour of Scotland and England in recitations of poems and tragedies, accompanied by Mr. Adolph Mann, pianist. Two others to share in Mrs. Brown-Potter's tour are Kalman Ronay, violinist and Darren Llewellyn, baritone. His Majesty King Edward is so ardent a champion of Mrs. Potter that he refused to knight Beerbohm Tree because that eminent actor had shown her a professional slight. Though Mr. Tree endeavored to make amends, His Majesty refused to overlook the original slight.

An Actress Enjoined

Aimee Angeles, an actress formerly in the employ of Weber and Fields, recently had a sharp reminder of the meaning of a legal injunction. Miss Angeles is a clever mimic and impersonator. She was under contract to the Shuberts, but saw fit to refuse to comply with the terms. As a result, they had an injunction issued last fall restraining her from making use of her talent in any public exhibition. Miss Angeles gave some of her impersonations at a benefit for Marie Dressler, and in consequence she was haled before the court and fined fifty dollars. The judge before whom the case came up declared her proceedings to be contumacious, and would have imposed a heavier penalty had the exhibition not been given as a charity. As it is, Miss Angeles was warned that if anything of the kind occurs again she will be made to feel the heavy hand of the law.

San Franciscans will be treated to a unique minstrel entertainment at the Alhambra, Friday and Saturday evenings, February twentieth and twenty-first, with a matinee Saturday, when Freemen and Lynn's Commercial Men's Mastodon Minstrels will appear. The organization, composed entirely of traveling men representing California's foremost business houses, is now in its third season. They have a military band of twenty-five pieces under the leadership of Charles Cassassa and an orchestra of sixteen musicians under the direction of James H. Doolittle.

The famous Band of Gordon Highlanders, known as "The Kilties," will give a series of their characteristic concerts at the Alhambra, the week of February twenty-third. Concerts will be given afternoons and nights, at which concerts the famous chorus of the band, reel dancers, pipers and soloists will appear. The band will parade every day, the music being furnished by the British buglers, pipers and drummers in true Highland regimental fashion. The men are uniformed in the full kilted regimentals of the Scottish Infantry and present a most attractive appearance.

Tyndall's Closing Lectures on Psychic Science

The progress of the new psychology is aptly illustrated in the size and character of the audiences that fill Steinway hall every Sunday night, to hear Dr. McIvor-Tyndall's lectures on mental and psychic science. The time is not so far distant in the past, when the theories and beliefs expounded by the celebrated psychologist would have been pronounced rank heresy. Dr. McIvor-Tyndall, however, far from destroying any one's religious views, simply seeks to harmonize them with the discoveries of science. In his talk on Palmistry last Sunday night, Tyndall showed that the study of Palmistry, far from teaching the hopeless doctrine of predestination, is of inestimable value in "pointing the way" to individual advancement and success. He said: "I hold that as we are born with certain inherent tendencies, it is absolutely logical that these tendencies must be taken into account in determining how much we can accomplish in life. The average student leaves college with his brain filled with much that is obsolete. A knowledge of the dead languages is not half so important as is a knowledge of his own capabilities. With the hand of a mechanic, probably, he essays to carve his way to fame and fortune along the path of law or journalism. The result is failure. And yet Nature has written in the shape and lines of his hands, the index to his possibilities and limitations." Next Sunday night Dr. McIvor-Tyndall will talk on "The Force of Suggestion: the Art of Mental Self-Defense." He will show the importance of closing the mind against certain influences and suggestions, and how to accomplish this. The following Sunday, February the fifteenth, he will give the last of his series of lectures here, as he leaves for Honolulu on the seventeenth. Both letures will be followed by experiments and demonstrations, in deference to popular demand.

The Student Abroad Subject Satirized

"Peggy from Paris," in which George Ade satirizes the American love of foreign stars, was tried on the canine in an Indiana town last week. Peggy, the heroine, is an American girl from Hickory Creek, Ill., daughter of Captain Alonzo Plummer, the village Pooh Bah. Educated in Paris, her vocal fame has spread over the artistic world. Her American nativity is not known outside of her immediate family. She is engaged by a Yankee impresario for a great operatic production, under the impression that she is a Paris stage divinity who will electrify American audieices. She plays her part in French dialect, imitating the imported artist until near the close when she has had enough of the silly honor, casts the mask aside and declares America is good enough for her. The piece opens with a scene in the Hickory Creek hotel, introducing the family and childhood friends of Peggy in an old-fashioned party, with characters as rural as in any pastoral drama. Later they appear in scenes with Peggy. There are many touches of real sentiment wherein the famous Peggy betrays the true heart of an American.

Back to the Wings

Robert Hilliard whom Orpheum patrons saw two years ago in a sketch, "The Littlest Girl," became recently a Wall street broker, but his experience was of the briefest and presumably not of the most lucrative, for now he has returned to the "boards" as the star of "Jim Bludso" at one of the cheaper theatres in New York. Mr. Hilliard is believed to be "the glass of fashion and the mold of form."

Sandow, the famous athlete, who has made a great success of his school of physical culture on scientific principles in Boston, will arrive here from Australia from a tour around the world, and will give one lecture at the Alhambra Saturday night, the fourteenth of this month. His lectures are said to be of great interest to physicians and laymen.

When Theodore Kremer lived in San Francisco, he struggled along without any recognition except from S. H. Friedlander, who always encouraged him to persevere in his play-writing. Finally he went East and is now a most successful dramatist, with fifteen of his works on the road, all contrjbuting to his royalty account.

There is always a theatrical manager at hand when there is a chance to exploit the heroine of a salacious scandal. Ted Marks, a New York vaudeville magnate, has offered the Crown Princess Louise of Saxony a thousand dollars a week for a tour of this country.

In the cast of "Prince of Pilsen" now touring the country are Helen Bertram, once prima donna of the Bostonians, Anna Lichter and Arthur Donaldson, formerly of the Tivoli, and Lillian Coleman, seen and heard at Fischer's last summer.

Charles Peyton of the Nance O'Neil company devotes himself to literature in his leisure hours. His latest short story, "How Spot Became an Actor," has been accepted by the Sunset magazine.

Ida Conquest will come to the Columbia with Gillette in "Sherlock Holmes." "Arizona" for a short engagement is a Columbia future.

Features of Next Week's Bills

Broadway prices will prevail at the Columbia during Anna Held's engagement. "The Little Duchess" is said to be a beauty show of the first order. The third act, which represents a fencing scene, shows the beauties in black velvet costumes modeled after those in Beraud's picture of "The Fencing Girl." A brass band, reporters, flashlight photographs, trained nurses and surgeons appear in this scene. Louise Royce, who is of the company, used to be of the Tivoli forces. Franz Ebert, the liliputian comedian, is a favorite in this city where he played two seasons; Herbert and Marion are both well known names here.

"The Jewess" Monday and Tuesday nights; "Camille" Wednesday and Thursday nights; Ibsen's "Lady Inger of Ostrat," Thursday matinee; "Magda," Friday night, a testimonial occasion to the star; "Judith," Saturday afternoon and evening—this will be Nance O'Neil's repertory for her final week at the Grand. The Sunday night program has not yet been decided upon.

A twenty-five cent rate to all parts of the house for matinees goes into effect at the Republic next week. "Prince Otto," a thrilling drama founded upon Robert Louis Stevenson's novel and in which Otis Skinner starred in the East, will be the bill. Ralph Stuart should find in the romantic hero another strong part.

It is quite a long time since "The Devil's Auction" has been seen here, and many will enjoy renewing acquaintance with it at the California. It is one of the best of Charles Yale's spectacles, and the company producing it this season is said to be a good one.

"Patience" fittingly follows "The Mikado" at the Tivoli. Though Oscar Wilde is dead and the esthetic craze died nearly two decades ago, "Patience" is as melodiously attractive as ever. Its libretto is numbered among the English classics. Ferris Hartman will be Bunthorne and Edward Webb, Grosvenor, while Arthur Cunningham will be Colonel Calvery, who has the patter song "If you want a receipt." Bertha Davis will sing the title role and to Caro Roma will fall the character part of Lady Jane. Marie Welsh, who sang so admirably during the grand opera season, will be Lady Ella.

John T. Sullivan, who is remembered for his strong legitimate work with Booth, Modjeska and Rhea, will be the Orpheum's headline. He appears in the only one-act play Sydney Grundy ever wrote, "Captain Huntington," assisted by Miss Margaret Atherton, who had her comedy talent developed in cher Paree. The clever Martinettis, who have not been here for years, will do some good acrobatic marvels. Cole and Johnson, colored entertainers who sing lieds, Nevin's songs and ragtimes, will be new here. The Dumonds, Maxwell & Co., Lottie Gilson, Nelson's Comiques and the biograph will finish the bill.

The Alcazar will revive, for the first time in four years, Clay Greene's novel of Californian life, "Chispa," Alice Treat Hunt in the title role, Ernest Hastings as Zeke Stevens and George Osbourne as Injun Jack. Osbourne is the best impersonator of the Indian the stage possesses.

"Barbara Fidgety" will run another week at Fischer's, "Hoity Toity" to follow. A female brass band, a Monte Carlo scene and some pretty music will be features of the latter. "Helter Skelter" will be the next weberfieldian offering.

A baby leopard and two baby tigers are new at the Chutes.

His Clever Daughter

According to Ashton Stevens, the toupee worn by Louis James is a delicate topic to broach in conversation with that actor. In other words Mr. James wishes to be thought as young as he looks with the aid of his head-piece. The tragedian, by the way, has a daughter, Millie James, who is a "chip of the old block." If she were as young as she looks on the stage, she would not add years to her bald-headed father. For two years she has been the child heroine in New York productions. Two years ago in an interview with Alan Dale she admitted that she had passed her twenty-second year, but she declined to tell him her exact age, saying that she might regret having done so when she grew older. Last season she played the twelve-year old heroine in "Lovers' Lane" at the Theatre Republic, now Belasco's theatre. In this Clyde Fitch sensation, Ernest Hastings, now of the Alcazar, made a big hit in the leading role, that of a New England minister. Miss James is playing the child heroine this year in "The Little Princess" at the Criterion theatre, New York. —The Playgoer

MUSIC

A Genius from Russia

Ossip Gabrilowitsch has played himself into the hearts, won the approval of their heads, and received an ovation at the hands of the music lovers of San Francisco. Those who had heard so much of his mastery of technique, and were half-fearfully expecting an expressionless perfection and a paucity of personality, a maximum of mechanical skill and a minimum of magnetism, were overjoyed to find that Gabrilowitsch is not a Russian make of pianola new to the Pacific Coast. Form, so vital as a means, so fatal as an end, has been the end of many a good artist; for just as soon as we begin to marvel at a man's technique we cease to be moved by his art. In fact, the artist who regards form too fixedly, too exclusively, finds it at last assuming a significant coffin shape of exactly his own measure. But the "young Russian pianist" possesses technique to the end of playing music; he does not play music to the end of parading his possession of technique. The artist has not been done to death by the "technician." To be music-mad and yet to play with perfect sanity, is an ideal to which few have attained. Foremost among that few is Ossip Gabrilowitsch. He has that reserve which leaves the hearer hungry for more of him. Never does he play so close to the edge of his limitations as to make the listener forget the music to tremble for the musician. It required but little talent for appreciation, that catholicity of taste which grants to the artist the right of individual interpretation (and all art is essentially an expression of personal preferences), and a fondness for old favorites with a new flavor, to join heart and hand in the encore which the rendering of Chopin's valse in C sharp minor called forth. Music is without doubt a universal language, a spiritual Volapuk, but in the Russian numbers Gabrilowitsch made his piano sing with a slight foreign accent which was an added delight. In his own compositions his mastery was much in evidence. Personally, the great pianist is simple, frank, a little diffident, altogether without frills—unspoiled. Those who have ears to hear should hear him.

Amusing, If It Were Not So Pathetic

For the past fortnight the dead walls and billboards of San Francisco have been adorned with posters announcing, in letters of the largest size, a series of concerts by Madame Sarah Wolden, "the world's greatest composer, pianist and operatic soprano." To be sure, Madame Sarah Wolden was not known in the world of music, but that argued little or nothing. Perhaps fame had not yet found her out. With some curiosity I wended my way to the Alhambra theatre on Wednesday evening, and patiently waited until the slowly filling house was sufficiently peopled to justify the appearance of Madame Wolden upon the stage. She proved to be a heavy, thick-set, gypsy-browed woman whose years must certainly be well in the forties. I do not know whether Madame Wolden's overwhelming self-conceit or the bad advice of her friends be responsible for her appearance in public—suffice it to say that her performance was the most atroeious ever listened to. It fell but little short of criminality. Who have been her teachers, and what has been her musical instruction? She lacks every requisite of a public performer. She has neither personal grace nor magnetism. As a pianist she does not even know her notes, not to mention the lack of such qualities as temperament, technique or artistic finish. To crown all, her program was of the most ambitious description, and fairly bristled with Chopin, Liszt and Beethoven. This woman, whose capabilities are nil, attacked compositions for which Padarewski, Hoffman and Bloomfield Zeisler have set a standard. Her vocal efforts were such as to excite the risibilities of her well-disposed and well-behaved audience. Imagine a woman totally without a voice essaying an aria from "Robert le Diable"! Her effort had not even one redeeming quality. It would be laughable were it not pitiful. Whoever aided, abetted or encouraged Madame Wolden to appear before an audience deserves death by slow torture. I really pity a woman who has been so exploited. Her performance was beneath contempt, and to criticise it seriously would be a waste of time. She should confine her efforts to the privacy of her own home, and should only sing and play for her own amusement or for the delectation of such admiring friends as are deaf to her shortcomings. I am told that she is a Jewess and her name is Blumenthal. As her appearance was under the direction of a certain M. Bloomington, perhaps the latter is the correct name. If M. Bloomington is her husband he should exert his marital authority to keep Madame within the precincts of the home circle. She has no place in public. The audience was evidently a paper one, but disposed to be courteous and judicial. It listened patiently until the close of the aria, when it filed out almost to an individual. There were no demonstrations more noisy than suppressed titters, but Madame Wolden may consider herself lucky that she was not greeted with hisses and cat calls.

The Stewart Concert

The program at Dr. Stewart's concert on Tuesday night was interesting and showed the versatility of the composer. The part songs were very happy and were sung by a choir of eight male and eight female voices unaccompanied. The vocal solos were graceful and well sung. Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup had two charming ones, "Secrets" and "Out in the Open Meadow," both well suited to her fresh and limpid voice. Mrs. Birmingham sang "Were I the Rose" and a showy new song, "Awake Dear Heart," which should become a favorite on the concert stage. Alma Bergland was heard to good advantage in "What said the Wind?" and "The Sun has Kissed your Eyes," and Miss McCloskey sang pleasingly, "A Little Way." Mr. Veaco rendered in his sweet but somewhat nasal tenor an aria from "Bluff King Hal," and to Homer Henley fell one of the finest numbers on the program, "The Lords of Song," notable for its brilliant harmonic setting. The closing madrigal, words by William Greer Harrison, had an old-time flavor, and was sung with good spirit by the male choir. Nathan Landsberger interpreted the violin solos, of which there were three, all very effective, and Dr. Stewart himself played three piano solos, a scherzo in G minor entitled "Springtime," and a Menuet Heroique being particularly pleasing.

The Zech Concert

A most attractive program, and one peculiarly in the vein of Conductor Zech and his musicians, was offered at the symphony concert of last week. The double postponement of this concert should not be regretted, since increased excellence has been the result of a longer time for preparation. Beethoven's Coriolanus Overture was the opening number, followed by Mozart's Symphony in G minor. This composition shows more passion and

To Light Or Not To Light

San Francisco has a reputation for push and "get there" not excelled by any other city, but there's the invariable exception to all such general statements and we fall down woefully in our street lighting system. It's positively ridiculous to think that on certain nights of the month, supposedly at the time the moon is full, not one street lamp is lighted. On the moon we depend for the necessary illumination. Occasionally the sky clouds over and we are left in the dark. Such a state of affairs is decidedly provincial.

New York, Boston, Chicago, St. Louis, in fact no other city in the country adopts such a niggardly policy. For lighting the public buildings and streets an appropriation of $275,000 a year is made, enough to contract for light for only 329 nights. The other 36 nights in the year we are dependent upon the heavens, and if by chance the stars and moon have been working overtime, we grope around in total darkness. Why, half the hold-ups for which San Francisco is rapidly working up an unenviable notoriety may be charged to the penuriousness of the powers that are responsible for the local government. Sufficient money should be allotted to this branch of the city service to run it as a civilized community, not as a one-horse village, or else the Board of Supervisors should be compelled to furnish us with tallow dips for dark nights.

The Welsbach Street Lighting Company of America is not responsible for the "Light or no light" habit that we are addicted to. Neither on the head of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Co. should we pour our wrath. They give us just what we pay for and when we put up enough money to buy light every night in the year, we will get it and not before.

stress of feeling than is usual in Mozart, yet never for a moment does it depart from the composer's characteristics, beauty and refinement, song-like theme, and an Hellenic self-restraint. Such music belongs to a region of pure and godlike beauty where there is neither sensuousness nor extravagance, and where the content never overflows the form. To these ideal heights Mr. Zech carried his listeners in the G minor symphony. That they followed him sympathetically and responsively was evinced by genuine applause and a demand that the Minuetto be repeated, which was gracefully acceded to by the conductor. The Mozart symphony was one of the most beautiful and satisfactory things that Mr. Zech has given us. The Siegfried Idyll was heard twice in the Holmes series of concerts a few years ago. The familiar "Ring" motives appearing ever and anon, its great tonal beauty, and the wonderful richness with which its themes are worked out, as well as the tenderness and feeling of its close, render it a favorite. It received adequate treatment from Mr. Zech and his players. The Russian Suite for strings by Richard Wuerst, a Berlin composer, proved to be full of color and contrast. The prelude was a dance movement with a strongly marked rhythm. The andante was a Traumerei with an exquisite violin obligato feelingly played by William F. Zech. The Allegretto was a light and airy pizzicato, the finale a Russian theme, changeful and exhilarating, and full of rush and motion. The dainty Miniature Overture from Tschaikowsky's Nutcracker Suite closed the program. This little morsel is lively and brilliant, its rapid contrapuntal changes flying from the strings to the wood winds, and exacting spirit and verve from the instruments. It served as an appropriate ending to a program conceived and carried out in happy mood. As Mr. Zech has been invited to Los Angeles to conduct two of his Symphonic Poems, "Lamia" and "The Raven," there is some uncertainty about the date of the next concert. Due notice will be given by means of postals and press announcements. Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding," Zech's symphonic poem, "The Raven," a Serenade for strings by Volkmann, a Suite composed and conducted by J. S. von der Mehden, and Dvorak's Slavonic Dance No. 1 will form the program. Too much cannot be said for the annotations supplied by James Hamilton Howe. They are a great assistance to an intelligent understanding and enjoyment of the music.

Zelie de Lussan's Concerts

There will be a large audience to greet Zelie de Lussan at her concert on Tuesday at Steinway hall. The program will include selections from grand opera, songs by Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, Franz, Nevin and Schuman. One of the numbers will be the Habanera from "Carmen," the waltz song from "La Boheme" and "Knowest Thou the Land" from "Mignon." The pianist, Mr. Fronani, will play a capriccio by Glazounow and other interesting numbers. On Thursday night De Lussan's principal numbers will be the "Vedrai Carino" from Mozart's "Don Giovanni," the "Styrienne" from "Mignon," and a group of Grieg's songs; also numbers by Hahn, Erlanger, Bemberger, Allitsen, Clara Schumann and D'Hardelot. A novelty will be the "African Love Song" by Ethelbert Nevin, and by special request she will repeat the Habanera from "Carmen." At the Saturday matinee McDowell's "Thy Beaming Eyes" and Ethelbert Nevin's "The Rosary" will be sung.

Mascagni to Conduct Here

Impresario Greenbaum has organized the best and largest orchestra ever assembled in this city, with Ferdinand Stark as concert master, to play with the great composer and conductor, Pietro Mascagni, at the Alhambra, on the afternoons of Tuesday, February seventeenth and Thursday, February nineteenth. Arrangements are also being made for a grand production of Rossini's "Stabat Mater" at the Mechanics' Pavilion, will full chorus and soloists. The program for the symphony concerts will be particularly interesting and novel, and will include Goldmark's Second Symphony (for the first time in this city), Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic," the overture to "King Lear" by Bazzini "Rienzi" by Wagner, and "1812" by Tschaikowsky, the suite to Hall Caine's "Eternal City," "Hymn to the Sun" from "Iris," "Dance of the Dolls" and Mascagni's intermezzos to the various operas. There will be twelve first violins, including the leaders of our best orchestras, and others will be in proportion. In order to prevent speculators getting hold of the seats, not more than ten seats will be sold to any one person. The prices are very reasonable considering the importance of these concerts, and will be two dollars, one dollar and a half, and one dollar. Sale of seats will be open at Sherman Clay & Co., next Wednesday morning at nine o'clock, and a great rush is expected.

A Chorus to Assist Mascagni

Manager Greenbaum is forming a large volunteer chorus to assist in the production of Rossini's "Stabat Mater" at the Mechanics' Pavilion Sunday afternoon, February twenty--second, to be conducted by Mascagni. Singers desirous of taking part will kindly send their names and addresses to Mr. Greenbaum, care of Sherman Clay & Co., mentioning the quality of their voice, whether soprano, alto, tenor or bass, and notice will be sent them of rehearsals. Parts will be furnished without charge.

The youthful violinist Kocian will concertize at the Alhambra in March. He will be assisted by Julie Guyer, a brilliant solo pianiste.

The Kopta Concert

Kopta's second recital on Saturday afternoon was even more enjoyable than its predecessor. The violinist's numbers included Paganini's second concerto, Nesverd's "Ekloge," a Polonaise de Concert by Laub, Barcarolle by Spohr, and "Perpetuo Mobile" (Ries), with two of Sarasate's Spanish dances. A critical audience enjoyed the recital and burst into its warmest applause after the Ries composition, which drew forth as an encore "The Cataracts," a brilliant selection brilliantly played. Mrs. Anna Wilson substituted for Mrs. Haralson, who was ill, in the vocal numbers. She sang the "Nobil Donna" aria from "Les Huguenots" and "Connais tu le Pays" from "Mignon."

Dr. Palmer in Paris

Dr. Francis Palmer, who was for several years organist and director of the choir at St. Dominic's church, has been for some time studying organ in Paris under the celebrated maitres, Widor and Gigout. His playing has been highly praised by the Parisians, one hears. Dr. Palmer has collected a number of interesting novelties for organ. After a visit to the musical centres of Germany and Italy he will start for home, expecting to return to San Francisco in the summer.

To Make Her Debut

A song recital will be given by Mrs. L. Snider-Johnson on Monday evening, February sixteenth, at Y. M. C. A. hall. Dr. H. J. Stewart and Mr. Nathan Landsberger will assist. Mrs. Johnson is the soprano at the First Congregational church of this city and makes her professional debut as a concert soloist on that night.

Fred Zech Jr. left on Monday for Los Angeles. The reason of this trip of the director of our symphony orchestra was to direct the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra at its concert yesterday, when Mr. Zech's "Lamia" symphonic poem was one of the numbers. —The Music Critic

Why Plagiarism Isn't Popular

In discussing the question of the liability of editors of magazines and weekly periodicals to be imposed upon by plagiarists, a prominent editor says that successful frauds are rare and that dishonesty amongst writers is only sufficiently common to emphasize the fact of the general reliability and truthfulness of authors. The greatest inducement to fraud is vanity—a desire to figure amongst friends and acquaintances as an author, and the almost certainty of discovery and exposure is the deterrent, sufficiently strong to prevent the attempt. The would-be literary lights are more apt to purchase work from some impecunious scribe for a sum sufficient to insure silence, than to copy what they hope will pass undetected. Occasionally an editor is victimized, but it is rare, for professional readers are expected to keep up with the times, and know what is appearing in current magazines. By the time a manuscript has been passed through several hands, there is comparatively little chance that some one will not have suspected any fraud which it may contain. Of course, if an editor is victimized and a pirated article is printed, he is liable to become involved with the original publisher, in a suit for infringement of copyright, but if there was no premeditated fraud there is likely to be an amicable adjustment. Not much advantage could be reaped from proceeding against the "author," who is usually so badly frightened by being detected that he is not apt to try the trick again. Swindlers in general prefer some quicker and more remunerative scheme. It would be comparatively easy to copy old stories taken from the magazines twenty or thirty years ago, and forgotten, if they ever were known by present day publishers and readers, but that literary fashions change so completely. They might be re-written, but the plagiarist, if he had the literary ability to do this, would be better employed than in committing plagiarism. The greatest protection to editors in this matter of fraudulent authorship is found not in the law, but in a wholesome fear of detection and exposure.

The Juvenile Field

John Habberton is the latest authority to declare that the writer of a good story for boys has a perpetual producer. He cites an instance of his own, where he has been able to count on a steady income of from six hundred to a thousand dollars on a boys' story published many years ago, and in all probability his royalties will continue until his copyright expires. But he also warns writers that boys are not so easy to please. On the contrary, they are most exacting in their requirements. They demand action and adventure, and they will stand no beating about the bush. Writing for boys is good practice for it leads to directness. Boys will not accept padding and superfluities for the sake of adding to length, and the author who makes the mistake of being wordy is apt to find himself unread. At best he will discover that his audience is given to judicious skipping, and omitting his rhetorical flights and reflections. Really good books for children are the rarest products of the press. If the truth be told, the average writer, with a weather eye to his royalties, writes what he thinks indulgent aunties and parents will be induced to buy, rather than what the young generation will want to read, so we have pious little prigs and impossible automatons who excite all the pugnacity of live children. It is not necessary to glorify the misdemeanors of little boys and girls, any more than it is to represent them as marble angels escaped from tombstones, but there are plenty of normal happenings and plays in which children take a natural part, which they are interested in reading and hearing about. The writer who can produce stories for children from seven to fourteen, and especially for children from seven to ten, which they can read without the need of explanation and interruption from their elders, has an unoccupied field at the present time. A few years ago there were a dozen magazines for children, but now there is absolutely nothing. One after the other they have disappeared and left a void. And yet, the educational course would appear to be founded on the idea of making children read, to the exclusion of all else.

Some irreverent wit has been classifying authors as annuals, semi-annuals, quarterlies, and biennials. He seems to have overlooked the perennials. Like Columbus's celebrated egg, we can all do it now that we have been shown how. It is surprising, however, when attention has once been directed to the subject, to notice how regularly certain authors present a new book after just a certain interval.

Income of Authors

A Scotch religious weekly gives this authentic information concerning the income of authors: Miss Annie S. Swan has an annual income of twenty thousand pounds from her books; Dr. W. Robertson Nicoll pockets thirty thousand pounds a year from his writings, and James Barrie has already received fifteen thousand pounds from royalties on his "Little White Bird," and will make seventy thousand pounds from his "two fine plays." The same authority states that Barrie never spends more than five hundred pounds a year. Reducing pounds to dollars does not reduce one's amazement. Who on earth is the Miss Annie S. Swan who can count on her $100,000 a year, and what she she written which reaches such a demand? Who has access to the private accounts of Mr. Barrie, and can speak with authority of his expenditures? This is a specimen of the sort of unguarded and unedited statements which find their way into print in some obscure journal and are clipped and copied elsewhere without heeding the preposterousness of its assertions. Authors do not take the trouble to contradict them, for they know that once begun they would have time for nothing else, and apparently it does not occur to editors, least of all ,editors of religious periodicals, that they are disseminating untruths as well as indulging in unwarranted impertinence. The world at large has no more right to be taken into confidence concerning the income and outgo of writers than of ministers or judges. Idle curiosity is one of the crimes of the age. It is a vice that is confined to no particular class, but we might, with reason, demand of ministers and religious publications, the self-constituted guardians of morality, that they should make some effort to be truthful, if they must gossip.

Irving Bachellor is going to tempt fate with a volume of poetry. He has not deserted the field of fiction, however, but has a novel in hand also, "Daniel of the Blessed Isles."

MRS. A. HESTHAL, Proprietor

Norway's Leader of Thought

The recent demonstration in Norway in celebration of the seventieth birthday of Bjornstjerne Bjornson has caused a contemporary to ask in amazement, "Where else in the world at this day would such honor be paid to a poet?" Nowhere. Nor in Norway, had Bjornson been poet or novelist only, though there is no other country in the world where literature is held in greater esteem. Bjornson stands, to his countrymen, for more than books. He is the political and literary regenerator of Norway. For half a century or more he has stood in the forefront of the battle, urging the cause of a national spirit and a national literature. He has fought against odds and discouragements, unflinchingly, and he has won his place. He is their great leader of thought. A considerable sum of money was subscribed as a gift to the author, as a part of the homage offered him, but instead of accepting it as a personal gift, he has established a fund for the pensioning of poor teachers.

Owen Wister says his next long novel is to deal with the West, but before he sets to work on it he means to write a story about vampyrism, a belief in which he says exists in certain communities in godly New England, precisely as we have made its acquaintance in the Arabian Nights and other Oriental tales. No one who has read that weird and ghastly tale of Bram Stoker's, "Dracula," is apt to need his memory refreshed. The superstition, or belief, has always flourished in Greece, Roumania and thereabouts, but one must confess to some curiosity as to whether the New England variety is a survival or a revival. By the way, it will not detract interest from Owen Wister to mention that he is a grandson of Fanny Kemble.

Onoto Watana, the half-Japanese writer, has entered suit against David Belasco and John Luther Long for plagiarism. Pierre Loti might comfortably sue the whole host of followers after "Madame Chrysantheme." The Japanese story, as we know it in English, is invariably a love tale—one-sided love, between the Japanese maiden and the American tourist, or by preference, naval attache. Pidgin English and purple-eye baby make up the rest of the tale. They all follow the same mode as closely as garments fashioned from Butterick's patterns.

It is too much to expect that every one should know everything, but it does give one a jar to find literary writers blundering in names of books or authors, when their articles are intended to show their familiarity with those very subjects. I found, last week, in the same paragraph, reference to "Mrs. Lirriper's Legacy" and "Nobody's Luggage." Minor stories of Dickens, both, but if they are of sufficient importance to be recalled at all, it is just as well, if not better, to be correct.

A scientific work written by a negro was presented for copyright recently, and the supposition, at the minute, was that this was the first of its kind. A little investigation proved that it has had several predecessors. In all there have been some twenty-two hundred books written and copyrighted by colored men, but there is no deduction to be drawn from this, since no distinction has been made between mulattoes and others of the lighter strain. So far as is known, no full-blooded negro has yet written, or at all events, copyrighted a volume.

Anent the frequent references to "tea topers" and the effect of the beverage which "cheers and not inebriates," one would like to know the capacity of a teacup in the time of Samuel Johnson, the lexicographer. If, as reported, he actually drank twenty-five cups at a single sitting, and the cup of his day was of the same size as ours, that would make six quarts, no less—a gallon and a half.

The "author" of "Miss Petticoats," one of the output of the novel factory which made a bid for popularity on the strength of anonymity, has another book in the field. "Dwight Tilton," the name under which the book appeared, is a combination of George Tilton Richardson, dramatic critic of the Boston Traveler, and Wilder Dwight Quint, music critic of the same journal. As a photograph of the author they make use of a composite.

A Boston publishing house is shortly to issue a new volume by Charles Warren Stoddard—"Exits and Entrances." It will be made up of personal recollections of distinguished people, and will be sure to attract favorable opinions, not only because of the eminent literary ability of the author, but because of the interest in the subject. —The Bookworm

United Railroad Bonds

Since the recent break in the price of the United Railroads of San Francisco 4 per cent bonds, fully $2,500,000 have been purchased in New York for account of San Francisco investors. On Tuesday when the bonds held by Brown Brothers & Co., as managers for the holders of "subscriptions," were delivered by them to the participants, the ruling figures in New York were $80.12 1-2 bid, and $80.50 asked. It is the general opinion that most of the participants who were pressed have disposed of their holdings and some of the usually best informed brokers believe that an improvement in prices will be the natural result. One broker has made a statement that he alone had purchased some $900,000 of these bonds for his local clients from $84 down.

Heard on 'Change

While there has been no special feature of interest in the local stock and bond market during the past week, there has been a good steady movement in trade with a fair measure of activity in all the leading securities. The buying and selling of these industrial stocks appears to be attracting a more wide-spread attention than ever before. For many years this class of investment was confined to capitalists and others who had surplus funds on hand, but this condition of affairs has changed and now people of small means are investing their savings in dividend paying stocks or interest paying bonds, where formerly they merely deposited in the savings banks. This fact is clearly evidenced by the character of each day's sales, the small parcels now being a prominent feature and the low priced stocks being well represented in daily transactions. At the same time, however, the steadily increasing volume of deposits in the city's savings institutions attests the financial growth of the city as represented by the surplus earnings of its toilers. This combined increase in saving deposits and growth of demand for investment securities, also shows how the population of the city is growing. Among the sales of the last week no particular stock seems to be shown any preference and the same may be said of the business for the last few months. Spring Valley Water shares appear to have got back to about their original position previous to the decline. This downward movement in the price of water shares is always looked for during the few weeks immediately preceding the annual fixing of rates by the Board of Supervisors, which always occurs during the month of February. While the probability is that there will be no municipal legislation which will impair the value of the company's stock and bonds, this period is always utilized by a certain speculative interest to depress values on the pretense that rates will be reduced and when prices get back to the normal condition sell out at the advance and realize quite substantial profits. This has been the case for many years past and the recent decline was no doubt caused by the same influence. While the price of Spring Valley shares is comparatively low at present, the bidding price of $84.75 does not bring out much stock, so it is safe to assume that holders are well satisfied with their possessions. Contra Costa Water shares have been selling moderately at $66 to $66.50 with little stock offering and scarcely any obtainable at less than the latter figure. Marin County Water is steady at $65 but as this stock is held in few hands, transactions in it are at no time numerous. Port Costa is in demand at $64, but holders as a rule are standing firm for $66.50, and it is doubtful if any can be picked up at much less than the asking price. Sugar shares have been rather quiet during the week but prices have been held well in hand and the fluctuations have been unimportant and confined within narrow limits. Hawaiian Commercial has changed hands at $43.25 to $43.50, but the offers to sell at this figure have been very small. It is well known that more than two-thirds of the stock of this corporation is held by one controlling interest which is not disposing of any of its holdings, and the small transfers which may be recorded from time to time represent the trading of some small outside parcels. Whether these are being taken in by the controlling syndicate cannot at this time be stated, but rumors on the street are to that effect. It is known that the company's affairs are in first class shape and under conservative management. From time to time it has been stated that a regular monthly dividend of $1 per share was expected, but no action of this kind has yet taken place and whether or not such dividends will be declared is known only to the controlling element, which is not taking the public into its confidence. Hutchison Plantation shares are in demand at $15

Annual Meeting

The annual meeting of the stockholders of the Sierra Railway Company of California will be held at the offices of the company, No. 229 Crocker Building, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on Monday the 9th day of February, 1903, at the hour of 11 o'clock a. m., for the purpose of electing Directors for the ensuing year, and the transaction of such other business as may come before said meeting.

and some sales have taken place at a slight advance over that figure. Paauhau has figured to a small extent in the week's sales, but this was not due to any lack of demand. The fluctuations in Alaska Packers shares have been wider than for many months past, but the stock appears to be gradually recuperating from the decline of a week or two ago. As is well known this depression was due solely to a prospective price-war in canned salmon, but it should be remembered that the competition was confined to two brands of packed stock only, and furthermore that as dividends were assured for twelve months to come there really should have been no depreciation in the value of stock based on the cause stated. Oceanic Steamship shares have been dragging along slowly with more sellers than buyers, in fact, the best bid at this time is $15.50 with nobody anxious to invest even at that figure. The bonds of the corporation comparatively speaking are about as weak as the stock, the best bid being $74, with $80 as the asking price.

Giant Powder

Out of the 20,000 shares of the capital stock of the Giant Powder Consolidated Company, 17,500 shares were represented at the annual meeting of the shareholders. The report of the president states that more dynamite was manufactured and sold during the past year than in any previous year. Owing to the fall in the value of niter, a saving of from $1,200 to $1,500 a month would be effected during the coming year, while the saving of glycerine through the building of recovery works will amount to from $700 to $900 a month. The works both at Giant and in Victoria have been improved and are now in first class condition. The land at Giant, which is owned by the company and stands on the books at $50,000, is worth, according to the price recently paid by the Standard Oil Company for water front property in the immediate vicinity, at least $200,000. The earnings during the year amounted to slightly over $145,000; out of this five monthly dividends at the rate of 75c. per share and seven at 50c were paid, a total of $145,000. In the annual statement the assets of the corporation are fixed at $1,444,552.20.

Financial Notes

An increase in the size of the board of directors and a readjustment of the officers of the institution were the features of the annual meeting of the stockholders of the Union Trust Company held last Monday. The changes were made in order to give large interests representation in the governing body and to meet the growing calls on the administrators of the affairs of the trust company. The board of directors was enlarged from eleven to fourteen members, the new ones being Henry E. Huntington, George A. Pope and Jacob Stern.

Frank Bartow Anderson, the new vice-president of the Bank of California, took his position with that institution last Monday. It is understood that Mr. Anderson assumes the duties of the late Thomas Brown, having full executive control of the bank.

At the annual meeting of the shareholders of the Mutual Savings Bank the following directors were re-elected: James D. Phelan, president; S. G. Murphy, first vice-president, John A. Hooper, second vice-president; James Moffitt, James M. McDonald, Frank J. Sullivan, Charles S. Neal, Robert McElroy and Charles Holbrook. George A. Story was re-elected secretary and cashier. The total net earnings for the year amounted to about $53,000, after paying 3 per cent on deposits. Dividends among $18,000 were paid; $30,000 was carried to the surplus and $5,000 to the contingent funds. The affairs of the bank were reported to be in a most prosperous condition, and the directors expect that the new building, when finished, will give a net return on the capital invested of from 4 1-2 to 5 per cent per annum.

The shareholders of the Humboldt Savings and Loan Society elected the following directors at their annual meeting: George H. Luchsinger, W. S. Keyes, W. I. Lowry, W. C. Fredericks and I. Kohn. Adolph C. Weber, who had been president since the bank organized in 1869, retired and George H. Luchsinger was elected in his place.

Trading in Oil shares has lately improved to a marked extent and sales of the leading stocks during the previous week on the California Exchange aggregated 112,192 shares valued at $102,650.

Stories Old and New

A Grant Story

Mrs. Grant once told a story about her husband that shows how fond he was of a joke. Miss Hulda Bond, a young woman of Brooklyn and an inveterate autograph hunter, determined to have Grant's signature in her little album. He was at the time sick with the disease that resulted in his death. But nothing daunted Miss Bond called at his residence, sent in her card, and obtained an interview with his wife. Miss Bond impressed Mrs. Grant so favorably that when she brought out her album and said, "Do you think the General would add his name to my collection?" the latter replied that she would see, and went upstairs. On returning, Mrs. Grant said: "I told the General of your pleasant call, and he took the album, and, glancing over it, read the few lines written by a little boy five years old, as follows:

"'And me, too, wish in your album to appear,
And do excuse my funny letters, cousin dear;
For I'm only five years old and in skirts as yet,
But, when I'm six, my first pants I am to get,
And then I'll be a big man, I'm sure,
And write as nice as I see Grover Cleveland's signature.
U. S. Bond.'

"After reading them he called for a pen and wrote after the boy's signature: 'And U. S. Grant.' The situation was so humorous," added Mrs. Grant, "that the General burst into laughter for the first time in weeks."

A Court Story

"Now," said the lawyer who was conducting the cross-examination, "will you please state how and where you first met this man?"

"I think," said the lady with the sharp nose, "that it was—"

"Never mind what you think," interrupted the lawyer. "We want facts here. We don't care what you think and we haven't any time to waste in listening to what you think. Now, please tell us where and when you first met this man."

The witness made no reply.

"Come, come," urged the lawyer. "I demand an answer to my question."

Still no response from the witness.

"Your Honor," said the lawyer turning to the court, "I think I am entitled to an answer to the question I have put."

Chaperonage

Being a Society Farce in Several Scenes with Specialties.

The Suggestion.

Boudoir in Mrs. Newrich's home.

Lily Newrich (a bud of the season): Chere mamma, I feel dreadfully distraite today.

Mrs. N.: Why not leave off your corset for an hour or so?

Lily: Nonsense! I'm dismal, mamma, doleful, blue —Comprenez?

Mrs. N.: Oh, well, now it's a human language you're talking. It was the champagne, I guess.

Lily: Mother! Did you notice how few dances I got at the cotillion? I sat by your side nearly all evening, while that ugly little Pennylesse girl was asked out three times for one valse.

Mrs. N.: I noticed her mother was not there, else it could not have happened.

Lily: Mrs. Pennylesse always lets Sybil go unchaperoned to the balls.

Mrs. N.: Chaperonage is the bulwark of society's morals. See how careful I am of you, darling. No one dares offer you a word of disrespect.

Lily (sotto voce): And they don't ask me to dance, either.

Mrs. N.: I am going to the sanitarium tomorrow to take my quarterly rest cure, and I have asked your aunt Mrs. D. Vorsay to matron you during my absence.

The Metamorphosis.

Barroom at the Splurge Club.

Cholly Fastleigh: That Newrich girl appears to be all right since she broke away from her mother.

Willie Iball: Yes, she's off the reservation now, as it were; no barbed wire fence round her any more.

Cholly Fastleigh: Met her out at the riding school the other day. She goes it astride like a thoroughbred.

Willie Iball: I had her in tow at the Shekels ball at the Palace. She slipped out with me and we had a couple of Scotch fizzes. I'll bet that aunt of hers is a corker.

Cholly Fastleigh: Why do you think so?

Willie Iball: She told me a few stories from her aunt's repertoire and they fairly sizzled.

The Result.

Room in Dr. Doems' Sanitarium.

Mrs. Newrich: Oh, Lily, dear, I would get well faster were I not worrying so about you.

Lily: Oh, hang your worry. Just get a move on and get well.

Mrs. N.: What peculiar language!

Lily: Oh, it's the fashion—I had a few tips from Auntie. She's right up to the wire.

Mrs. N.: I hope she does her duty by you.

Lily: That's where you're right, old chappie. She has done her duty so that I'm the favorite now and won out at the last cotillion in an easy walk. I've had six proposals, and my picture in two Sunday supps. My afternoon receptions are crowded to the doors. I'm the toast of the clubs. Well, mamma dear, don't worry any more—but try and get well by Lent, won't you?

The Plague Scare

Though the people of San Francisco are blissfully ignorant of the fact that the bubonic plague germ has been cutting capers in Chinatown, there are many on the Atlantic coast who are so well aware of the fact that they are afraid to visit this metropolis. They have obtained their information from the New York Sun and other Eastern dailies that, since the first of the year, have published many sensational articles about the ravages of the plague in San Francisco. They have denounced the authorities of this State and city for their attitude in the matter, and they have charged the press of California with having concealed the facts through fear of injuring home industries and of deterring immigration. So great has been the fuss raised over the matter of the bubonic plague that J. M. Hill sought to make it the pretext for diverting the transport business and he almost succeeded. Unquestionably he has been instrumental in keeping alive the scare in the East, and that we have been done great damage there is not the slightest doubt, for we have been discriminated against and many excursion parties have faded away through fear inspired by the sensational stories published by the Sun and other papers. From the beginning of the alleged plague scare Town Talk argued that there should be unanimity of action on the part of the medical fraternity and the authorities, and that the news should be published. As it was evident that whatever was the character of the bacilli that had been found in Chinatown they were not to be seriously dreaded by healthy white people living under sanitary rules, it was better to tell the truth than to dissemble. However opinions differ. The course followed was the one which naturally led to the serious consequences from which we have been suffering. The bubonic plague scare became a political issue. Governor Gage sought to make political capital out of reflections cast on the Democratic Administration in this city. With the assistance of a few job-chasing doctors of doubtful standing, and of the J. Winslow Anderson variety, he heaped opprobrium on the members of the local Board of Health. They were charged with having started the scare to extort money from the people through the public treasury. That was a very serious accusation to make against reputable members of the medical profession. It was natural for them to seek to defend themselves. At the same time they were too assiduous in their efforts to convince the world at large that the genuine bubonic plague was here. It should long ago have been apparent to them that the disease had reached us in a modified form. But so anxious were they for vindication that they sought in every way to convince the medical authorities all over the globe that this city was infected with the terrible plague. Unfortunately the press did not give publicity to the facts. The silence of the papers was suspicious. Publicity was essential to show that the particular bubonic germ that had been discovered in this city, and the existence of which was reported by the local health authorities, was not swelling the death rate; that the disease was not epidemic; that there had not been an average of more than four deaths a month from it in two years, and that the victims with one or two exceptions were Chinese. Surely there was no occasion to be scared by a germ that caused a death in a crowded lodging house in Chinatown and failed to attack a single one of the scores of other inmates. Now the fact is that the greatest pathologists in America have pronounced it the germ of the disease known as bubonic plague. They say that it is a modified form of the original bacillus that has devastated Oriental countries, and Dr. Gardener, who recently attended a medical congress in Washington, and who fought against a proposition to enforce quarantine measures against this State, accepted the verdict of the Eastern authorities and decided to return home and proceed to do that which the much maligned members of the local Board of Health have been contending for for two years. There has not been a case of the bubonic disease in this city for over two months, and during the recent New Year celebration in Chinatown that quarter was visited by thousands of white people who invited infection. Nobody here appears to be afraid of the disease. It is evident that it does not thrive here, but while we were maintaining what was believed to be a discreet silence timid residents of the East were afraid to visit us. Could anything more stupid be imagined than the attitude assumed from the beginning by those who have the welfare of this State at heart?

Civil War Suggested

According to Harper's Weekly, "The question is, Shall the military power of the United States be used to force a colored official upon a community against the unanimous consent of its white inhabitants?" "If this question be answered in the affirmative," says Harper's, "we may have to face a renewal of the civil war." These are surprising utterances emanating as they do from such a dignified journal. They are not only surprising, they are ridiculous. They betray a woful lack of confidence in the stability of this Government. It was no such trivial matter as the Indianola postoffice incident that led to the Civil War, and it is not likely that civil war will be precipitated by the efforts of the President to coerce a small community into accepting a colored woman for a postmistress. We believe with Booker T. Washington that negroes should forego office-holding in that section of the country which resents even an approach to negro domination, and we believe that President Roosevelt erred in unnecessarily raising a disagreeable issue, but if disloyalty to the Union may be promoted in the South by the stubbornness of the nation's Executive, then we should deplore the poor quality of the patriotism bred in that section. Unquestionably the people of the South have been made wildly indignant by the President's conduct, but it is a libel on them to charge that they would be willing to secede from the Union on account of what they regard as a brutal affront. In this matter Harper's Weekly is an alarmist. At the same time its suggestion of civil war is significant. It is the organ of the plutocracy, and it has been adroitly seeking to injure Roosevelt ever since he advocated the regulation of monopolistic combinations. Some time ago it was severely censuring those papers that were "engaged in arraying class against class." It deplored a policy that menaced the peace of the country, but its patriotism does not restrain it from giving utterance to the freakish suggestion that civil war is imminent.

Education Along Imperfect Lines

Some time ago Herbert Bashford of the Literary West took occasion to denounce the public school system as a machine that destroys the individuality of the students. Subsequently those ready talkers, President Wheeler of Berkeley and President Jordan of Stanford, were interviewed on the subject. The former approved the public school system and expressed the opinion that it fostered individualism, while Dr. Jordan advocated individualism but deprecated the tendency of the public school to obliterate it. Now comes a writer in the current issue of the Redwood, a brand new and very creditable magazine of Santa Clara College, who fans the flame of discussion by disagreeing with both Wheeler and Jordan in the premises. "What is individualism?" he asks; "certainly not a system that advocates the development of the unassorted lots 'just as they come' with all their faults and vices. Every youth in our large cities has individually the elements of a criminal, he has individually the germs of vice as well as those of virtue, and individually, like electricity, he follows the line of least resistance. The real difficulty therefore that confronts the educators of today is how to develop the good qualities in the young and eradicate or reduce to a minimum the evil tendencies." Continuing the writer in Redwood contends that the public school system does not concern itself with that problem, and he therefore disagrees with those who praise its methods and its work. It neglects the moral development, and consequently it cannot be a success. "The effectiveness for good on the part of the pupil must be the outgrowth of his physical, mental and moral training. His head, hand and heart must be developed; else it is as useless to seek for results as it is to endeavor to gather fruits in the desert."

Those Terrible Fairy Tales

Chicago women and women's clubs are exercising their brains on the subject of fairy tales. Shall the children read them or shall they not? The discussion seems to be becoming perennial and perpetual. No sooner is it disposed of in one community than it breaks out in another, and the result is always the same—a drawn battle. Educators, and advanced women generally, including those mothers who relegate their offspring to the care of nurses until they are old enough to be packed off to boarding schools, make common cause against the stories. They, one and all, affect surprise and disgust at the coarseness and suggestiveness, the bloodthirsty cruelty, and the exaggeration, and profess to find in these dear delights of childhood the microbes of untruthfulness and every degree of crime. On the other hand, mothers who keep in touch with their children, and those other women who see in childhood something besides material for their psychological laboratories and dissecting tables, are in favor of letting fairy tales occupy their time-honored place in the libraries of the new generation. The common fairy stories which we have long recognized as the property of children did not make their advent for the delectation of the little folks. They were part of the common stock of the story tellers who took the place of novelists and newspapers in furnishing recreation and amusement for the people in the earlier ages of the world. Naturally the children often gathered around to hear the recitations, and out of the thousands of stories thus repeated they seized upon certain ones as their own. The over-suggestiveness of the Oriental narrators has, in many instances, clung to the stories, but it has to be a remarkably precocious child who will understand it. The little people care only for the supernatural wonders and feats of magic. If it were possible for a group of children to be brought up on absolutely scientific principles, taught according to laboratory methods, and preserved from the contamination of fairy stories and the demoralization of playthings, the result would be the most pitiful moral and mental deformity that the earth could produce. These careful theorists who sit in solemn conclave, debating the morality of children's amusements, evidently imagine that a fairy story has the same effect on a child that a Pinero play has on themselves.

The Case of Lynch

Notwithstanding the commutation of the sentence passed on Colonel Arthur Lynch for treason, some of the most vociferous of our Irish-American demagogues continue to prate about the cruelty and injustice of England. In their opinion Colonel Lynch should not only be set at liberty but also given a seat in Parliament. It was Lynch's claim to a seat in Parliament that settled all doubt as to his guilt. His defenders should be well satisfied with the commutation of his sentence, for death is the usual penalty imposed on persons guilty of treason. If he was a British citizen when he joined the Boers as a soldier he was guilty of treason. He could not have exculpated himself by subsequent naturalization. While serving with the Boers he was elected to Parliament by the Nationalist party in Galway. If he was eligible he was chargeable with treason, and that he considered himself eligible is evident from the fact that later on he presented himself in London to test his right to sit in Parliament. On his trial it was contended that he became a burgher to facilitate his work as a newspaper correspondent, and not with treasonable intent, but it was admitted that he actively supported the Boer cause, that is to say, he took up arms in the belief that his naturalization was valid and that he had ceased to be a British subject. In summing up the evidence the Lord Chief Justice said that the naturalization of a British subject in war time was a suspicious circumstance, and it was surely sufficiently suspicious to warrant the verdict. The case of Lynch is not one that should appeal to public sympathy. He was one of many soldiers of fortune who joined the Boers and urged them on in the pursuit of a forlorn hope, and deserted them when they were most in need of assistance.

Where Sentiment Avails Not

It gives one a sense of the rigidity of England's laws to note that in spite of all the petitions and pleadings, Mrs. Maybrick still remains comfortably behind the bars. Not comfortably to herself and her hysterical following, by any means, but comfortably to those who have a belief that laws should be executed and sentences carried out. Had Mrs. Maybrick been tried in America there is not one chance in a thousand that a jury would have convicted her, and not one chance in ten thousand that she would ever have reached the penitentiary. Despite the most convincing proofs of her guilt, sentiment would have cast a halo around her, and the law's delays would have been invoked. A new trial would have been a foregone certainty, and between the sickly sentiment of Sunday supplement exploitation, the death of witnesses and the disappearance of evidence, there would have been nothing more than the passing inconvenience of spending a few months, or even years as the guest of the municipality. Our murderesses devote themselves to the production of "literature," or study elocution with a view to the stage or the lecture platform, and so far from any humiliation in regard to their position, it is just the reverse. Whenever a particular sensation is needed for a yellow supplement, miladi is interviewed, photographed and displayed. When President—then Governor—Roosevelt refused to commute the sentence of a vile New York murderess, but let her take her deserts in the electric chair, there was a howl from one end of the country to the other, and when he was nominated for the Vice Presidency there was an effort to make political capital of his outrageous cruelty, and yet, if ever a human being deserved electrocution, it was the same Mrs. Place. England has been deluged with petitions and protests—Queen Victoria, King Edward, and every one between them and the warden of the prison where Mrs. Maybrick is confined, have been importuned to free this "beautiful and unfortunate woman," but the one key which will unlock her cell is proof of her innocence, and that is the one thing not to be had. Wealth, social connection, sentiment and all else avail nothing. It is an example which is good to contemplate, especially in this country, where murder is regarded so lightly.

Morality a Work of Art

What a wonderful aggregation of intellect is the faculty of the University of Chicago. Not a week passes without some one of the sages of Dr. Harper's sanhedrim attracting attention to that institution by the expression of unique opinions. Last week Professor W. D. MacClintock of the Chicago University lectured on "The Moral Life a Work of Art." Among other strange things uttered by the professor were these: "A perfectly dutiful child is not one who merely obeys the authoritative external will of his father, but one who understands the principle of the family life, who enters into it as his own, and who runs forward to meet the work or sacrifice as spontaneously as if he had planned it. He keeps the law without thinking of it as law." If the professor had an interpreter he would no doubt be much clearer. However it is plain that a child such as he describes would be a work of art, the creation of a painter or sculptor clever enough to express in his work the MacClintockian idea of a precocious angel without the wings. When the professor described his "perfectly dutiful child" he had no thought of the merely human youngster who wots not the "principle of family life" and who is inclined to resent its restraints. It is fair to infer that the moral life as understood by Professor MacClintock is as foreign to this earth as the "perfectly dutiful child." He was no doubt speaking "poetically." He also said during the course of his lecture, "To become master of yourself, gain a knowledge of your physical and mental temperament." Quite an easy achievement, no doubt, for a professor of the University of Chicago, but unfortunately most of us are so constituted that we lack the power of introspection, or at least it is not sufficiently developed to enable us to gauge our own temperament with sufficient accuracy. We are therefore obliged to depend somewhat on doctors and our enemies and they are not always reliable.

The Saunterer

Phelan's Ambition

Since his return from Europe Mr. James D. Phelan has been taking a more active interest in society than ever before. He has been doing a lot of wining and dining in the clubs, and to such an extent has he been contributing to the gayety of our swells that the hope that springs eternal is once more rampant beneath the corsage of the match-making mamma. A bosom friend of the ex-Mayor assures me that Jimmy has no social aspirations; that his aims are wholly political. Some years ago he undertook to achieve them by cultivating the friendship of the plain people, but having in a misguided moment alienated their affections, he has concluded that being one of the plutocracy it behooves him to cast his lot with the rich. So he is confining his activities to the region north of the slot. The very latest bit of inside information, divulged accidentally I have been told, by Phelan's fidus Achates, Gavin McNab, is that the ex-Mayor is no longer intent on securing the toga, and that he will be satisfied with a seat in Congress.

He Envied Conkling

This is interesting information, and I would doubt it did I not know on the authority of Mr. Phelan himself that the ambition of his life is to enter into the political whirl of the nation's capital. The inception of that ambition dates from the time that he made his first trip to Washington. He was then a young man just out of college. One morning while breakfasting in a hotel he found himself facing Senator Conkling. He regarded the great statesman with blended awe and admiration. He observed that the Senator was the cynosure of all eyes; that obsequious deference was shown him on all sides, and while sipping his coffee that morning, young Jimmy Phelan incidentally dieted on thoughts of himself some day in the distant future occupying as high a pedestal as that on which stood the great Senator Conkling, bathed in the white light that beats upon the distinguished. And that iridescent dream was by no means evanescent. It imparted buoyancy to the spirits of the young millionaire for many years. In the late campaign, though he was far away in the gay capitals of the Old World his fancy turned to doings in his native State. He was here in spirit, and his money was spent in the interest of Mr. Lane, for he figured that a Democratic victory might mean a Democratic United States Senator, and he flattered himself that in that event the Phelan barrel, which is both wide and deep, would do the trick.

Tropical Ozone from McNab

The sanguine assurances of Gavin McNab, by cable, at Phelan's expense, kept the ex-Mayor's interest at white heat, and consequently Lane's defeat was a crushing disappointment. However, he has regained his equanimity, and Mr. McNab, who knows a good thing when he sees it, has persuaded him that since it has been demonstrated that the Fifth district is not hopelessly Republican he should go into training for a contest over the Congressional seat. In urging him to stand, it was pointed out, that with his conspicuous ability he would soon become a statesman of national importance, and rise perhaps even higher than the Senate. As he has large interests in the Santa Clara valley the voters at that end of the district would flock to his support, but meanwhile the organization has drifted away from McNab, and the battle now on is for control of the machine. Mr. Phelan is expected to finance it.

The Retort Courteous

Having lost his political prestige, McNab's law business, which was formerly in the same groove as that which is now being exploited by Abe Ruef, has vanished. He is no longer employed by deadfall proprietors to elucidate the law and other things to subservient commissioners. Even the coroner's deputies no longer notify him when a dead man comes their way with an estate to administer. So McNab has turned journalist. He is writing political articles for the Bulletin, and he devotes his best efforts to the smashing of the new Democratic organization being reared by James H. O'Brien. In a recent issue he alluded to the fact that O'Brien has several teams working for the Board of Public Works, and he stated that somebody had suggested that the new machine be called the Pardee Democracy. O'Brien, who is somewhat of an epigrammatist himself, remarked, "Gavin is borrowing the thunder that we used when we were out and he was in. We always denounced his gang for voting the Republican ticket but he had control so he didn't worry himself. Now the situation is reversed. As for the horses and carts—well, I'd rather make my living that way than by attending to morgue cases and working public officials in the interest of deadfalls like the Thalia. It's several years since Gavin earned a living as honestly as he did in the days when he was getting fifty dollars a month and his find as a clerk at the Occidental hotel."

They Merely Lack Experience

There is such a dead-level of mediocrity in the present Legislature that an instance of conspicuous ability, made doubly conspicuous by its isolation in a desert of "dubs," is positively refreshing. I refer to Arthur Fiske, Speaker of the Assembly. He has been pronounced the ablest Speaker that this State has ever had, and I have not heard one dissenting voice. His rulings are prompt, firm and logical, and he always has the situation well in hand. There is a great deal of raw material in the present assembly, but veteran lobbyists predict that when the statesmen become familiar with the ways that are dark, there will be some sensational grafting.

A Notable Effort

The Senate is also shy on intellect. A characteristic speech was made in that body last week by Senator Bunkers of this city, who struck a pose and began by addressing his fellow-statesmen as, "Youse fellows—I mean you Senators." During his speech he announced his intention to tell the story of his life and he did. He was advocating the measure which provides that an employer shall be liable for damages to an employe injured by a fellow-employe. He told how his father had been accidentally killed by a fellow workman, leaving a widow and several small children, and he asked, "Do you mean to contend that there was no redress for those kids?" This declaration of kinship to the goat species evoked much laughter.

Hubbell After the Bannings

One of the ablest men in the Senate is O. Z. Hubbell of Los Angeles. He is an enthusiastic yachtsman and is an active member of the South Coast Yacht Club which has been having trouble with the Banning company of Catalina. This haughty corporation arrogates to itself the right to prevent any one landing on Catalina Island without first paying the price of a round trip ticket on the company's steamer. This is regarded as outrageous presumption by the members of the yacht club toward whom Banning is antipathetic. They say that the company pretends to have the right to refuse mariners to land to procure food and water, and that its employes have been very insolent to yacht crews. Yet the island is embraced within the tide lands of the United States, and on it there is a postoffice. Moreover the county of Los Angeles pays for the maintenance of the public roads, of a constabulary and a justice of the peace. Senator Hubbell has decided to invoke the aid of the legislature in behalf of the downtrodden yachtsman, and to that end he has introduced a bill which makes it a misdemeanor for any person to seek to prevent people from landing on any island off the coast of California and subject to the jurisdiction thereof.

Why He's Worth It

Chief Engineer Herman Schussler of the Spring Valley Water Works is not only one of the ablest professional men in America but he is likewise a politician of the first order. Professor Frank Soule who is at the head of the engineering school of the University of California has a high respect for Mr. Schussler's ability. He told his class one day, "Mr. Schussler besides being a very conservative engineer is the only living man who can wrastle successfully with the San Francisco Board of Supervisors. He is paid twenty-five thousand dollars a year and he earns it." Mr. Schussler is at present engaged in his annual "wrastle." There is no man living who can darken counsel more successfully with a cloud of words and he is master of the art of drawing a red herring across the trail to divert the inconvenient inquirer on a false scent.

A Mathematical Triumph

Engineers of a younger school are inclined to scoff at Mr. Schussler's conservatism and they say he wastes money on excessive margins of safety. They say that his great work, the Crystal Springs dam, is merely a triumph of brute force and awkwardness. Anybody, they explain, could have dumped in that mass of rock and made it stick. In contrast they point to the Bear river dam which is only thirteen feet thick at the bottom and two feet thick at the top. Yet it stands as firm as the enormous mass of the Crystal Springs dam. It was built years ago by a Sheffield Institute man who had the courage of his mathematics and made it on the lines of an Arch, the convex side facing the water. The harder the pressure the more firm stands the arch. The same man was employed to build the Sweetwater dam in San Diego and began it on similar lines but the directors got scared at the flimsy look of the high structure and fired him. The new man understood perfectly that his predecessor was right but to satisfy the directors he put in a gravity factor as a guarantee of good faith and a concession to ignorance.

To Reproduce the Passion Play

The news comes from Santa Clara College that the Passion Play which, during the jubilee celebration of two years ago, attracted people from all parts of the State, is to be reproduced in May of the present year. This play, written by Clay M. Greene, an old student of Santa Clara College, as a tribute of love to his Alma Mater, is the only successful attempt outside of Oberammergau to dramatize the great mystery of Christianity. Greene modified the play for production on the professional stage, and it was presented at a public theatre in New York, but provoked harsh criticism from people who object to the sacred theme's exploitation for monetary purposes.

Why, Oh, Why?

What do girls go to college for? If one may judge by the yellow supplements and the woman's columns of the fashion papers it is to pose. We have been treated ad nauseam to every phase of the college girl's existence, plentifully illustrated, of course. We have invaded her room, or rather her den as they prefer to call it. We have assisted at her recitations, her meals, her walks, her amusements, her study hours. We have heard how Miss So and So mends gloves and darns socks, while Miss Somebody else does hair dressing or paints dinner cards during her idle hours in order to eke out her slender finances. And always and everywhere the college girl is posed, she is generally pretty and universally well dressed. From the tone of popular newspaper articles one should imagine that girls go to college to don becoming gowns and mortar boards, and to strike effective poses. And the articles as a rule do not hesitate to tell us that the "dig" has gone out of fashion, the up-to-date girl does not spend so much time over her books that her clothes and her social duties are neglected. Miss Elizabeth Knight Tompkins's articles have driven these facts home as realities, not as jests. Miss Tompkins says the girls take themselves and their social duties too seriously. And again I ask, What do girls go to college for?

Political Labor Leaders at Outs

The political plans of Mayor Schmitz, so far as they related to the patronage of the Health Department, were knocked into a cocked hat when Michael Casey was elected chairman of the Board of Health. Casey and the Mayor are now at sword's points. The Mayor appears to have completely lost the confidence of the labor unions, as well as the friendship of many of the leaders. Indeed considerable friction has been engendered by politics in labor circles, especially among those who are anxious to dictate political policies. The predictions of Andrew Furuseth regarding the consequences that would ensue in the event of the unions taking a hand in politics may yet be fulfilled. Furuseth is the most level-headed of all the local labor leaders. But Furuseth is a remarkable character. He has the confidence of the Sailors' Union because the members are sure of his unselfish devotion to their interests. He is a type of man that one seldom meets in every-day life.

A Singularly Interesting Character

Modest and unobtrusive as he is, Furuseth is little known outside of labor circles, but he is a man for an emergency. Men of his stamp have figured as exponents of the people's rights in times of stress and excitement. There is nothing of the demagogue about him. No public office that Mayor Schmitz could offer him would he accept, and yet his only income is a salary of seventy-five dollars a month paid by the Sailors' Union. Several times a proposition was made to raise it, and each time he threatened to resign if such action were taken. He lives in a little room on the water front where he attends to the interests of the sailors. The man's environment harmonizes in not the slightest degree with his temperament, for though he grew to manhood before the mast, he has the culture of a college-trained gentleman of leisure. Books are his companions and he is familiar with the classics. He is an art critic and he discusses music with the intelligence of one educated in a Berlin conservatory.

Approaching the Ranks of the Martyrs

The denouement has been reached in the scandal that that has been agitating the court of Saxony. The Crown Princess, who a few short weeks ago was dandling in the arms of her lover, congratulating herself on having escaped from the uncongenial atmosphere of the austere Dresden Court, and planning for herself a joyful future, is now in a sanatorium. The fading of a sporadic passion was followed by the revival of the maternal instinct, and in her eagerness to see her children once more, she put herself in the power of her husband's family, and she was quickly thrust behind the walls of an institution which will, no doubt, serve in her case the purposes of a prison. But the world is sentimental nowadays, an attitude of mind somewhat remarkable in a generation disposed to value hard cash more than the noblest attributes and the most persistent virtue. The aristocratic heroine of a cause celebre, though her shortcomings may be glaring and inexcusable, is certain nowadays of hosts of admirers. In the case of the Princess Louise, though the desertion of her children was condemned, she had many sympathizers, for it was known that she had been most shamefully and brutally treated by a lascivious and faithless husband. And now, sequestered as she is, behind closed doors, the probability is that she will soon be enrolled in the ranks of the martyrs.

Her Sad Career

The fact is that when a royal personage steps over their traces popular excitement and sympathy are intensified, for when the divinity that hedges kings is broken down, the gap is naturally more conspicuous than in the case of minor people. The melodrama and the romance of the situation appeal so strongly to the blase, excitement-loving twentieth-centuryite that the unwholesome effect of such a bad example set by individuals whose influence is momentous is quite overlooked. The case of Princess Louise appeals to popular, though perhaps, mawkish sentimentality, because it is believed that she was not inspired solely by a vulgar passion. Her life has been a sad one. Troubles came the moment she left her home among the simple Tyrolese peasants to assume grave responsibilities among strangers. Her father, the Duke of Tuscany, made the match, and she was absolutely forced into a marriage that was repugnant to her. Even before her arrival in Vienna the sunshine had disappeared from her life. It was within a few hours of her first ball that there came the suicide or murder of the Crown Prince of Austria, the details of which remain one of the mysteries of the last century, and her ball dress had to be exchanged for a gown of crape.

The Troubles of Royalty

After all royalties are quite bourgeois, for, like many of their inferiors they look on marriage as a mart where the character of the husband is of less importance that his name and social position. And by the way with the lapse of centuries the role of royalty has not become easier of assumption than in the days when Shakespeare pictured the difficulties that made the head uneasy that wore a crown. The escapades of the liberty-loving Crown Princess and her sap-headed brother, the dissensions between gay King Leopold and his daughter, and the series of catastrophes and misalliances in the Austrian and Russian imperial families would almost warrant the presumption that royalty is about ready to declare the "divine right" a fiction and a snare. It has at least been demonstrated in these days of European correspondents blessed with the American nose for news, that the display of imperial dignity, the pretensions to aloofness from the common herd, and the air of unassailable superiority, are all purely theatrical. To be sure there are rare instances of the born ruler possessed of tact, strength of mind and the ability to weigh the splendor and usefulness of their duties against the obvious drawbacks of a life spent in the limelight, but the cable despatches are constantly leading to the conviction that the average royalty lacks the capacity for his job. The effort to keep up appearances in this giddy age is a strain on the average full-blooded mortal. Even a queen-to-be is as much inclined as her frivolous sister of ordinary society to resent restraint, and pride of race no longer holds men back from sullying the escutcheon of an illustrious family.

Bobby and Bessie

In England it is a well recognized fact that nothing promotes matrimony like private theatricals. It is a long time since society her has gone in for them to any extent, fancy dress balls having had the floor for several seasons. The nearest approach to anything of the sort was the vaudeville at the Tevis house in honor of Mrs. Gus. Spreckels. At that affair Bobby Eyre sang a duet with Bessie Ames, and of course they had to practice a great deal to get in proper voice. So the matchmakers have them next on the list of engaged couples.

Society Girls Balked

I understand that one of the Mizner boys was originally cast for king of the Mardi Gras and that he evolved a scheme of a travesty on the usual order of things with a "King Dodo" and his Court affair that would "josh" everything and everybody. But when it came to getting society girls into the thing Mr. Mizner struck a snag. They wouldn't be cajoled into it, so he gave up the whole thing in disgust and abdicated all royal rights and prerogatives. So good-natured Ned Greenway was forced into the vacated kingship and Ned knows better than to try and get society girls into the court of King Carnival.

Society Reminiscent

It has been announced that the Taylor-Newhall engagement is to be a short one, but the date for the marriage has not yet been set. Mr. Newhall has already presented his fiancee with many handsome jewels which have evoked many "oh my's!" in the smart set. Though the engagement caused no surprise, owing to the fact that it had been frequently hinted at in these columns, it revived reminiscences of Mr. Newhall's devotion t oanother lady not distantly related to his fiancee. It was in the days of the "Reign of the Georges," as the gossips phrased it, and though it may not have been a case of the survival of the fittest, Newhall was the first to abdicate in favor of the George who was regarded as his rival. However, it was all a case of guesswork and Mrs. Grundy doesn't always hit the mark.

Another Spreckels Ball

The daughters of the John D. Spreckels household have decided to give another Mi-Careme ball this season. There has been almost a surfeit of fancy dress balls so it has not yet been decided whether the affair will again take that form. Besides, the Gus Spreckels ball was such a magnificent affair that the other branch of the family would scarcely care to give one that sagged below that mark, and to duplicate it would not dovetail with the plans the Spreckels girls have now in mind—just a jolly entertainment for their friends, not a magnificent function. If the Mi-Careme ball be a fancy dress affair there will probably be very few new costumes as people have such a stock of them on hand. Indeed many of those that have been worn at the recent affairs are hold-overs from the mid-Lent ball the Spreckels's gave last year. Mrs. Gus Taylor, who usually likes to dazzle with the latest sartorial splendor, has worn the same costume to every fancy dress ball that has been given in the last two seasons. "I'll never get another, either," she remarked at the Gus Spreckels ball; "fancy dress is horribly unbecoming to me and if people keep on giving them I'll just patch this same one up and wear it to the last shred."

Generous Papa Hopkins

The Gus Taylors are to have one of the handsomest places at Menlo. Papa Hopkins is building it for them but Mrs. Gus is designing it herself, and it will have the very latest architectural crotchets. There are ten acres of ground to lay out in parks and winding drives so the effect will be very different from the tenement huddling of Burlingame, where it is impossible to play in your own back yard without stubbing your toe on your neighbor's fence. The Taylors are to have all the accessories of the English manor house, even to a porter's picturesque lodge at the entrance. There are only half a dozen people in San Mateo county who have strained at the distinction of a porter's lodge and none of them is as swagger at the Taylors' promises to be. Every one is holding E. W. Hopkins up as a model of the manner in which wealthy fathers should act. Instead of making his daughter wait for the money that will some day be theirs he hands out large slices every now and then and gets some enjoyment himself seeing his children rounding up the good things of life. The house that is being built for Helen Taylor will cost a pretty fortune but evidently it has only whetted the edge of his generosity for the Will Taylors have already been promised one equally magnificent. Work is to commence on it as soon as the Gus Taylor home is finished. The McNears' turn will probably come later. All three of the young matrons prefer to rent their town houses and own country places.

Merely a Fad

It is reported that a "wealthy Scotchman who has made his money in America" is about to purchase Abbotsford as a gift to the Scotch people. The natural inference, whenever a Scotch-American is mentioned in connection with a gift, is that it is Andrew Carnegie. Abbotsford is in an excellent state of preservation, and since it is the fashionable fad to collect memorials, establish museums and erect shrines to literary idols, it is befitting that the great men of literature should be honored as well as the obscurities. It is a noteworthy fact, however, that the pilgrims to these "homes and haunts" are chiefly Americans, and it is also worthy of note that a vast number of them have no definite idea of why they go to these places or what in particular there is to honor. It is a place to visit, and in all likelihood an excursion at reduced rates happens along in the right nick of time, so off they go, and a cross against the name in their guide book marks one more place "done." Their interest is quite as much in the direction of taking advantage of a bargain as in literature.

Partners Married Sisters

Alexander Boyd, who died last week, was a pioneer and one of our richest citizens. He laid the foundation of his fortune in Sacramento in the early sixties, by shaving warrants for the legislative employes. Afterwards he and his partner, the late Jacob Z. Davis, amassed a two million fortune in legitimate business. They married sisters, the McGregor girls of Sacramento, and both made their later homes in this city. The Davises lived in Post street near town while Mr. Boyd some years ago built the large house on Washington street hill, where he died. His elder son, George Boyd, married a daughter of Mrs. Nicholas Kittle. Both the Boyd brothers, George and Sinclair, are college bred and belong to all the smart clubs. They are cousins of the sisters, Mrs. John M. Curtis and Miss Elizabeth Muir, who inherited Jacob Z. Davis's million.

The Rover Returns

Barret Fithian is paying a flying visit to Santa Barbara to look after some of his interests there. Fithian expatriated himself some time ago, and now owns a spacious country-place near Brighton. He rides to hounds and does all the other things in which Englishmen delight. But though he likes England as a place of residence Fithian is not likely to follow the example of William Waldorf Astor by becoming a subject of the King. Fithian is of distinguished ancestry. His grandfather, "Slippery Dick" Connolly, was a power in New York politics during the days of Boss Tweed. His sister married Chester Alan Arthur, son of the late President Arthur. Mrs. Fithian is a daughter of Sherman Stow and a cousin of Vanderlyn Stow. She likes England very much as a place of residence and did not, I believe, accompany her husband on his present trip to California. Barrett Fithian has many friends in this city and they still, I hear, occasionally quiz him about his famous yachting trip and ask him: "Why did Kate Clement come home?"

Hearst Humiliates Chicago

William Randolph Hearst is the player of a big game, of which his board is the United States and his pieces newspaper offices. Certainly no editor in the country has so brilliant a corps of special writers, and probably no manager has syndicated his stuff so thoroughly and so successfully as has the New York Congressman from California. In fact syndicating is a fad with Hearst—a fad which applies not only to his reading matter but to the very names of his newspapers. It is not so strange to see the Katzenjammer kids appearing first in New York, then in Chicago and later in San Francisco, but to have the name of his Chicago paper passed along to the New York publication, and to have the Chicago paper, in turn, take the name of the San Francisco journal, is a stunt surpassing even the originality of Hearst. It was not so long ago that the New York Journal took the name of the New York American, and it has been but a week or two since the Chicago American was changed to "Hearst's Chicago Examiner." Chicago is still talking about it, for the change has kicked up a great hullabaloo among the jealous scribes of the windy metropolis. It is considered a great comedown to Chicago newspaperdom that its leading paper should be given the title of a journal from what they consider a mere provincial town.

Californians Boycotted

The East, indeed, is almost superstitiously jealous of San Francisco. A Hearst writer, recently returned from New York, declares that Eastern newspapermen turn like a nest of highbinders on a man from California—not because they personally dislike him, but because they have been distanced so often by the wild and woolly fellows that they think it time to declare a boycott. The writer I refer to says that things have come to such a pass that if a mistake is made in any department wherein a Westerner is employed the blame is always attached to the interloper and every effort is made to get him out of the business. That they are not always successful is shown by the way in

The Row Over the Ball

Society was split wide open by the bachelors' assembly. It's a funny story. In one quarter you hear that it was a dismal failure, a mere pretext for the boosting of the climbers, a frost, in fact everything derogatory of the function. In another you are told that it was a notable achievement, a brilliant success, one of the greatest ever, et cetera. Two weeks ago I announced, exclusively, that Ned Greenway, the only genuine blown-in-the-bottle (sweet or brut) leader of society, would have none of that bachelors' ball. The question then arose whether it could be a success without the eclat of the Greenway hallmark. Some said it could, others declared it couldn't. The gentlemen in charge of the affair devoted every energy to making it a success, and incidentally and by way of revenge on Greenway they barred his wine. They at least succeeded in demonstrating that it is possible to pull off a bachelors' ball in this city without Mumm, for Moet & Chandon's white seal was the fizz of the function. And by the way the wine question was seriously debated by the committee. Moreover Mrs. Eleanor Martin, who was one of the patronesses, cast her vote for Mr. Pendleton and his white seal, thereby demonstrating her freedom from the Greenway influence.

The German Baron

Echoes of that ball will be heard for many a day. One of the aspersions cast upon it is that it wasn't a bachelors' ball, strictly speaking, for the reason that Baron von Horst, its leading promoter, is not a bachelor and he therefore had no right to figure as a host. The baron is married to an American lady who lives in London, and he came to this country to look after some of the business interests of his wife. The American wives of German barons usually have business interests, and Mrs. von Horst is no exception. However the Baron is a charming fellow and to him and his compatriot, Lieutenant Fuchs, belongs the credit for whatever measure of success was achieved. But involving himself, as he did, unintentionally it is true, in factional strife, he finds himself as a consequence subjected to criticism. The most serious accusation against him is that he danced nearly every dance with one girl. But in view of the list of dowager patronesses who were there with their eagle eyes surely there was no occasion to condemn the German for his obvious partiality.

After the Ball

Notwithstanding all the gossip that the ball occasioned, it opened no sores that cannot be healed. It is true that many of the elite absented themselves but they have no criticism to make of those that attended. The affair demonstrated that Ned Greenway is a power to be reckoned with in the Holy of Holies, for many of the top-notchers of the smart set were on his side of the split. Those that were anxious for its success say that they did not miss the seasoned bachelors that declined to co-operate. "The fact is," they say, "we wanted dancing men. A lot of those fellows come to dances and do nothing but talk. They're too paunchy to dance. We introduced a lot of new blood. The old-timers said we couldn't give a successful ball for less than thirty or forty dollars a ticket. If we charged that much we would have barred out many of the young fellows that dance. We proved that you can give a swell dance for five a throw." There were fifteen bachelors on the original committee of arrangements. Among them, Clarence Follis, Frank Goad, Percy King and Roy Pike failed to act.

Reaching for the Ribbon

So many ribbons of the Legion of Honor are worn in this city that some people have inferred that they are as easy to get as a bad cold. While it is true that some people achieve the decoration through a misapprehension on the part of the French Government, others strive for it for a lifetime without success. Only the other day the despatches announced that it was to be conferred on Miss Godchaux of this city in recognition of her services in stimulating an interest in the French language. It was Coquelin, the actor, who recommended that Miss Godchaux be enrolled in the famous order of merit founded by Napoleon, and her claims to the distinction were promptly acknowledged. But how different has been the experience of George Hall of the Bohemian Club! That, however, is another story.

He Charmed Germinet

George Hall has been in pursuit of the Legion of Honor ribbon so many years that I had the impression that it was conferred on him long ago. It was only a few days ago that I learned of my mistake. The story as it comes to me is that Mr. Hall was in a fair way to gain the coveted decoration when M. D'Allemagne, the French Consul, interposed an objection. The Turkish Consul had been relying on the pull of his friend Admiral Germinet, who visited this city on the French cruser Protet a few years ago. Mr. Hall was the Admiral's host while the ship was in port and entertained him to such an extent that Germinet had no time to devote to the French colony. He left San Francisco with the notion that George Hall was one of the greatest men in America, and he resolved to show his gratitude by securing for the representative of the Ottoman Empire the cross of the Legion of Honor.

A French Knocker

Germinet would undoubtedly have been successful had not the French authorities written to Consul D'Allemagne to report on the merits of Mr. Hall. It happens that the French Consul is not an admirer of the Turkish Consul. I do not know whether he was inspired by mere envy or whether he was incapable of appreciating the many good qualities of George Hall, but at any rate he sent home a caustic letter informing his Government that the Bohemian clubman was a rank pretender, or words to that effect. Meanwhile George Hall was waiting in joyful expectancy for the notification that he had received the distinguished consideration of the French Government, and that the ribbon would arrive in time to be worn at his wedding. But instead, and to his amazement, came the news that he had been "knocked" by the French Consul. He called on the latter for an explanation and it was promptly given.

"You never did anything that I know of to entitle you to one of the greatest distinctions that can be conferred by the French people," said the representative of the Republic.

The author of "The Balloon Ascension by Night" and of the adaptation from Maeterlinck's "Nuptial Flight of the Bees" was staggered by the assertion. Did he not advertise Paris in his book? Did he not compliment Maeterlinck by borrowing the latter's ideas? Did he not entertain Germinet?

"You have done nothing for the French people," said D'Allemagne, and no further satisfaction could George Hall get. However he does not despair. He may write another book.

Exhibiting the Local Great

A new lion has come to town and as usual he is being rushed a great deal. I refer to Charles Page Bryan, our Minister to Portugal, lately transferred from Brazil. Mr. Bryan is about forty-five, tall, florid and with a military air. He formerly lived in Washington, of which city his father is a prominent and wealthy resident. The diplomat moved West to satisfy a desire for political preferment. Being a friend of the Pullmans of Chicago he was taken in charge by the Carolans on his arrival, and they paraded our local high-steppers before him. Laura McKinstry, who is the "Exhibit A" of intellect among the women, was one of the star guests. She is expected to make a brilliant marriage some day. Dick Tobin was there, because he cultivates a foreign air, and the Joe Grants were invited because Mrs. Grant was brought up abroad. She looks with pity on most things American, and Joe Grant himself is a foreigner in sentiment. He bores people talking about foreign parts. So it was a very happy dinner for Mr. Bryan.

When Gus Riled His Father

To those who have watched the breach between Claus Spreckels and his son, Augustus, the fact that Augustus will wait in New York to meet Mrs. Spreckels and Lurline instead of coming out to the Coast for that purpose is significant. It is hinted by some that Augustus will not visit his old home again, and it is through this talk that the real causes that led up to the present estrangement have been reviewed. The row dates, it seems, from the time in which Claus Spreckels was fighting the sugar trust in Hawaii. The fight was getting pretty lively for the old man and it at last came to the pass where he was obliged to marshal his forces for a Waterloo. To each of his sons he had given a million dollars, so he called upon them to give back the fortunes until the sugar trust fight was over. John D. Spreckels, it is said, was the first, and the most willing to comply. Rudolph Spreckels hesitated for awhile, but came around with the money in time to avoid his father's wrath. But with Augustus Spreckels it was different. With a contented sophistry which argued that a million in the hand is worth ten in the sugar cane he held on to his dowry and refused to surrender. The old man found the money loaned to him quite sufficient, carried it into the battle against the trust and won out with great slaughter and immense profits. To John D. he returned the million multiplied some tenfold, to Rudolph he gave the loan with enormous interest, but to the cautious contingent represented by Augustus he gave nothing but the cold shoulder. The latter is still, of course, a very rich man, but if the breach is ever mended and the old man asks for another loan Augustus will probably be quicker to trust in his father's financial judgment.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch had a birthday last week and Henry Heyman, who keeps himself posted on the natal days of the lights of the music world, remembered the fact. In honor of the day he gave a dinner to the young Russian, at the Bohemian Club. Gabrilowitsch was completely surprised, for he hadn't an idea that any one in far-away California would remember his birthday. The guests were all congenial and in the decorations the Russian colors were used.

Oakland Humiliated

Cultured Oakland is ashamed of itself because when Gabrilowitsch played over there last week only about fifty or sixty people attended the performance. Oakland boasts of its musical culture, and it was therefore humiliating that such indifference was exhibited on the occasion of the visit of a great artist. But Gabrilowitsch was partly responsible for the frost. Many Oaklanders believe that no form of amusement is proper if it does not take place in church. The musician should have performed at the Unitarian church instead of at the Macdonough theatre.

Our Way of Doing

San Francisco society people have a way of proving their musical culture. They organize Twentieth Century clubs and give concerts. On such occasions the musical talent (?) in society exploits itself and the unmusical talent sits up and takes notice. Those concerts severely test the amiability and friendship of the audience, but they serve to advertise the fiction that society is filled with clever vocalists and musicians. Occasionally society is guilty of a faux pas, as when it enthuses over a Californian who has returned from abroad with the brand of a foreign teacher and various shortcomings, but the Twentieth Century Club is an institution that will enhance society's reputation for musical culture providing it makes its concerts exclusive functions.

"Charley's Aunt" at an Oakland Tea

Oakland society is still chuckling over the "friend from Indiana" episode at the Wallace Everson tea. Parker Whitney, who has done feminine stunts on this side of the bay with success, is of small size but the Oakland man is of anything but meagre build. He prides himself on his girth, and to get a thirty-inch waist down to twenty-four inches tried him severely. But he did it. The whole hoax was so well managed that few even at the end of the affair knew that the athletically built young woman, six feet tall, modishly gowned, with the latest society walk and voice-inflection, was of the masculine gender. It was just a jest carried to a successful finish by a joke-loving junior of the University of California. He is very popular in Oakland, and his family belongs to the most exclusive set. Addressing one of the girls at the tea he said:

"Perhaps you don't remember me."

"Oh, yes, Miss Mills, I'm very glad to see you," was the answer.

And as she took him for the daughter of the Rev. B. Fay Mills, the U. C. man let her continue in error while he enjoyed a chat of some minutes' duration. As the only man, and that one in cog, at the tea, he enjoyed himself thoroughly, as did the young woman who dressed him and introduced him as her friend from Indiana.

"I hear that he was a hopeless failure in business."

"I don't see why any one should call him a failure. He went through insolvency on the eve of his marriage to an heiress."

Hynes Shocked the Prudes

The much-entertained Bertha Runkle was a guest at the Pioneer Ladies' anniversary entertainment held at Pioneer hall last Saturday evening. Billy Hynes, the amateur monologist, was also there to do a few stunts. Mr. Hynes, for an amateur, has always been a rousing success, but he has been so much the vogue for good fellows' stag jollifications that he sometimes forgets to expurgate his lines for the benefit of the lady prudes who are always among those present in mixed companies. So Billy Hynes did his turn and received an enthusiastic palm until he cracked an old, old one which has been tried and tested on the not-too-sensitive ears of the Orpheum audiences. It goes something like this: "The other day I saw a woman crossing the street in the rain and I turned to my wife and said, 'What's that thing she's wearing?' My wife said, 'Don't you know what that is? Why that's a rainy day skirt.' "A rainy day skirt!" says I, "I thought it was a tuck in her waist." Now I don't think that was very shocking, do you? But there was a great cackling—not of laughter—from the feminine side of the house, and a great ruffling of features from the domestic poultry present. All of which shows that a funny man should not be too funny at family reunions.

May Go Abroad

Mrs. Al Gerberding, so goes the rumor, is contemplating a trip abroad, with a possibility of resuming her literary work. Mrs. Gerberding, when she was Elizabeth Sears Bates, wrote not a little for the Eastern magazines and as a versesmith she ranks high. Her little juvenile, "The Golden Chimney," made quite a hit and met with a good sale. She is the mother of young Bates, who is to marry Gladys Merrill.

She Was for Home Rule

Edna Lyall, the novelist who died this week, probably did more for the cause of Home Rule in Ireland than any other woman of her time. In those of her novels whose scenes were laid in Ireland, she placed the Irish situation very plainly before the public. In "Donovan" and "Doreen" she did perhaps her greatest work for the cause.

When the Marblehead Steamed Away

Paymaster Skipworth of the Marblehead was probably the heaviest hearted man on the cruiser when she steamed out of port last Tuesday on her way to Honduras. Mr. Skipworth had a great "crush" on Lurline Spreckels while the Marblehead was in the stream, and it is said that he received a deal of encouragement. Those that observed the paymaster's devotion and that knew of the many little courtesies that Miss Spreckels enjoyed at his hands were quite certain that a genuine love affair was ripening. But if there was a satisfactory understanding before the parting no one received an inkling. Months and years perhaps may pass before they meet again.

The Man of Many Mash Notes

Sandow, the strong man, is in town, but like Paderewski and other great brains and muscles, his kissing days are over. Demurely he was accompanied by his wife from the steamer which brought him here, and there was no delegation of the fair sex waiting at the wharf to offer him the embrace promiscuous. Perhaps no personage behind the footlights and before the public has been more recklessly adored by the ladies than has Eugen Sandow. In the heyday of his piano-moving stunts he was more flooded by matinee notes than even Henry Miller during a run of "The Only Way." But his most ardent admirers were from the stage rather than from the audience. Lillian Russell, with all her capacity for heart-throbs, had a crush on the giant that was heralded from one end of the continent to the other. That occurred in Sandow's gay bachelor days, and the actress and the athlete were commonly seen together in the boulevards and elevators of New York. Sandow, personally, is a good fellow, devoted to his wife and possessed of more wit than one would look for in a man of his swelling sinew. Speaking of sinews reminds me that some years ago doctors all over the country were prophesying Sandow's early demise as a result of over-development, athlete's heart and a thousand other hyper-healthful causes. He has fooled the physicians, however, and still continues to lift an occasional church without developing any alarming symptoms.

A Daily Question

How often a woman asks herself, What can I do to retain my youthful appearance without fear of criticism and injury to myself? For while all ladies wish to look beautiful, no woman can afford to use artificial means that would in any way detract from her refinement, as is the case by the use of powders and lotions which can not be put upon the face without being noticed.

Mme. Idaline's Face Cream is different from all other face preparations. It beautifies at once, preserves the skin, can be used without the slightest injury, and at the same time being invisible.

The Goulds Have Arrived

The social boycott against the George Goulds in New York society, due to prejudice against the senior, departed Gould and his methods, is off. The George Goulds have quietly arrived. The visit of the Countess Castellane this winter helped them out tremendously. The other night they gave a theatre party in honor of a debutante, Miss Mamie Pomeroy, sister of Miss Greta Pomeroy, who came hither a few years ago with Mary Crocker Harrison. They had all the smart young people in New York at their home —Jean Reid, Miss Morton, Miss Schenck, Miss Rives and the Fish girls. Hattie Crocker Alexander gave a dinner the other night and the George Goulds were present.

Muscagni (on arrival Friday): Oh, how charming, this balmy air; I am in Italy again! (Saturday forenoon): Ah, you have rain here! (Saturday afternoon): Sapristi, you have storms here (as it hails he draws furs about his shoulders): This is not unlike Chicago, is it not? Pile more coal on the fire. (Sunday morning): Ah, Italy again. Is it not ravishing, this warm sun? (Sunday night): The moon here is beautiful but cold—a tr-rifle (teeth chatter) like St. Peter-r-sburg, n'est-ce-pas? (Monday morning): Oh, so—you have the London fog—that is not bad, really. (Monday afternoon): Ah, the grand sun! (Tuesday morning): The sky weeps again! Well, surely I made the gr-r-eat mistake. Instead of saying San Francisco is like Italy, I should have said you have the climate of all Europe!

An Objection to Masks

Madame La Bavarde has entered a protest against the decree that men may wear masks at the Mardi Gras ball. She says that "the managers are making a grave mistake in permitting the men to go masked. There is no use in giving my reasons for so thinking and so saying." Evidently not, for I have just received an advance notice from the press agent of the carnival committee in which he says, "It is known that a large majority of the men are going to wear fancy costumes, now that they are allowed to mask. They will add very much to the brilliancy of the scene. Moreover a great many masking parties are being formed to take part in the revels." And why not? Surely the managers may be depended upon to exclude highwaymen in masks, and also rude men who would be likely to insult women at such an affair. Madame La Bavarde further says: "Let the conservative element of the Bohemian Club consider it over very carefully and say if upon second thought they do not agree with me." Ye gods and little fishes! I cannot believe that Madame La Bavarde is joking, for if there is one thing that she does not possess it is a sense of humor. "Consider it over!" I should suggest "under," since it is the "conservative element" of the Bohemian Club she addresses. I wonder if she means the Harry Grays and the Colonel Trumbos of the Bohemian Club?

Some of the Box Buyers

All of the boxes in the Searles gallery have been sold, while the few that are left in what is known as the House Gallery are being rapidly taken. The following is the list of those who have secured boxes up to the present time: Miss Flood, Mr. Chauncey R. Winslow, Mrs. Henrietta Zeile, Mr. John D. Spreckels, Mr. M. H. de Young, Mr. Walter Martin, Mr. Horace L. Hill, Mr. Willis E. Davis, Mrs. Herbert F. Hodgdon, Mr. James D. Phelan, Mr. Irving M. Scott, Mrs. George W. Gibbs, Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels. The scheme of decorations is an entirely novel one and although just now the galleries are in a state of more or less artistic confusion enough of the general plan has developed to give an idea of the gorgeous color effect that will be produced. Mr. Newton J. Tharp and Mr. Ernest C. Peixotto compose the committee having in charge this part of the carnival and from present appearances the result of their labors will surpass all previous efforts. It is said that the artists are arranging a splendid feature in the way of a mythological group to take part in the procession. All of which promises well for the carnival spirit that ought to prevail on an occasion of this sort. Requests for invitations must be sent in to the Assistant Secretary before Saturday, February twenty-first.

Did Scott Talk Too Much?

There is an interesting story in business and club circles anent the recent visit of Mr. Lewis Nixon of the Shipbuilders' Trust. When Mr. Henry T. Scott went East, so the story goes, he did a lot of talking about his great financial coup in selling the stock of the Union Iron Works for twenty odd millions. From what he said somebody received the impression that the Scotts proposed depreciating the value of the stock and getting it all back at a greatly reduced figure. At any rate a story to that effect was put in circulation, and when it reached the ears of the trust magnates it was decided to send Nixon to the Coast to look into the matter. No doubt the Scotts convinced him that it was a false alarm. Nevertheless it was a lesson for Mr. Henry T. Scott in the wisdom of holding one's tongue with both hands.

Didn't Use "Property" Weapons

Landers Stevens, the melodramatic hero who leads a strenuous life at the Central, figured in the most realistic drama of his life the other night, and without the aid of a calcium or make-up. Mr. Stevens's intentions are always good on the stage, and therefore I should dislike to attribute any bad motives to him on the occasion of his wandering afar from the footlights, but candor compels me to assert that he got into bad company. When Mr. Stevens encounters ill luck on the stage, the babies in the galleries weep aloud, and the adults thirst for the villain's blood. But the other night the actor's friends were far away, and he had no sympathizers in the thrilling scene, which was located in an Eddy street lodging house whither he had gone in search of atmosphere. There were two villains in the play—both Japs—and they had deadly weapons with which they beat the histrion over the head. The curtain fell just as Mr. Stevens started in search of a policeman, with blood in his eye and also dripping from his luxuriant locks. The policeman was found and he arrested the Japs, but the actor was busy rehearsing another part, so he didn't appear to prosecute the villainous twain.

Criminal Journalism

The dailies published startling disclosures made at a Coroner's inquest the other day, of the quack methods of an unscrupulous physician who represents that he is able to cure cancer. It was shown that the scoundrel was responsible for the death of a woman, and the evidence warranted the suspicion that he had many victims. Some months ago I called attention to the advertisement of the disreputable quack, which appeared in one of the dailies. He set forth in his advertisement that "any lump in a woman's breast was a cancer." The publication of advertisements of that character is a disgrace to journalism. The newspaper proprietors that prostitute their journals for hire in the interest of the fiends that are engaged in endangering the lives of people are morally guilty of the crimes perpetrated, for they aid and abet the dastardly practices. To sell editorial space is bad enough, but it is not a more vicious practice than that of exploiting in the advertising columns the misrepresentations of scoundrels of the type of the fake physician who was responsible for the death of an unfortunate woman in a Third street lodging house.

The Eye on the Dome

Large-hearted and devoted philanthropist as Mrs. Leland Stanford is, her closest friends cannot deny that she is a bit old-fashioned when it comes down to a matter of art and decoration. True, the new chapel at Stanford is almost an inspiration of beauty—probably the finest church of its size in the world. Yet it took a world of tact on the part of builders, contractors, decorators and architects to keep some of the dear old lady's peculiar ideas in form and color from marring the marvelous structure, and even as it is, one of her hobbies is being ridden on the summit of the chapel dome. It seems that while she was traveling abroad she visited a Greek church and saw, looking down on the congregation from the center of the dome, a great, blue, stained-glass eye. The thing compelled her attention and she asked her priestly guide what it was intended to sympolize. He explained that it was "the all-seeing eye" and it represented the omniscience of the Divinity looking into the minds and hearts of men. The idea was a fine one, and it so impressed her that she went to an Eastern glass house and ordered an eye like the one she had seen. The order was filled, and as a result the artificial orb was set in the chapel dome at Stanford.

Merely a Suggestion

But the students, sad to relate, failed to regard the eye in the spirit of reverence which it was intended to inspire. Some of the incorrigibles suggested oculists' advertisements, single-barreled eye-glasses and patent eye-water until the joke became a standing one. The best one, however, occurred at the chapel dedication a few weeks ago. On that occasion a university wag in talking to Mrs. Stanford suggested as follows: "Why don't you have a sponge or a rubber bulb attached to that eye with an electric wire so fixed that a few drops could be squeezed from it at the will of the operator. Then, when it comes to an affecting passage in the sermon the eye could shed real tears. It would be very touching." It is not recorded whether or not the generous patroness of the university saw the joke.

The Husband of Rosa Gore

Frank Locan, who passed away in Fresno last week, was once a prominent figure in San Francisco. It was he who became the second husband of that belle and beauty of early days, Rosa Gore. Those who become mentally snarled when they try to figure out the relationship of the Locans, Bonners and Redingtons, find the unraveling easy when they remember that Charles Bonner, the mining man, was Rosa Gore's first husband, and that her sister was the first wife of John Redington. Frank Locan for many years kept the leading fancy goods store in San Francisco, in Clay street between Montgomery and Kearny. It was on the direct line of the then fashionable promenade from Sutter street along Montgomery, up Clay through the Plaza to Washington and return. When the Lick House was built Locan moved to one of its large stores and there one could always be sure of meeting the very cream of society folk. He was a dapper little fellow, suave in manner and speech, and a great favorite with the ladies. But even so it was somewhat of a surprise to the exclusives when he became the husband of Charles Bonner's widow.

The faculty of the University of California had a housewarming at their new club last week, and nearly a hundred people were present. Mrs. Hearst and Benjamin Ide Wheeler have taken out life memberships, at the cost of one hundred and fifty dollars each, and their action is looked upon as a "godsend" by the struggling club.

Between O'Farrell and Geary

The Two Bohemians

Apparently there are two Bohemias, one having the atmosphere of wealth and culture, the other an atmosphere compounded of everything offensive to the normal olfactory nerves. Maynard Dixon, the artist, is now of the luxurious Bohemia. Once upon a time he reveled in the atmosphere of the other. The other day the impulse came upon him to visit old haunts, that he might perhaps gauge more fully and exult more thoroughly at the extent of his rise. The old Spanish janitor of the building in which Mr. Dixon's old studio is located gave this account of the visit to a crowd of art students:

"That Dixon, he was here today. I think he must have quit painting and gone to work in a bank. He have all new clothes and he carry a cane with gold top, and he give me a quarter. He go on the roof and he smell the hamburger steak cooking next door and he come down and say, 'God, Manuel, but that smell make me sick.' Once, long time ago, he go on the roof and when he come down he say, 'God, Manuel, but that smells good.' But now Dixon, he must work in a bank and he carry a cane with a gold top."

Though Mr. Dixon's desert pictures have "made good" all over the country no one can convince Manuel that he earned any money through his art.

A Notable Engagement

The engagement is announced of Mrs. Margaret Fenn Robinson, of Berkeley, and Mr. Oscar Maurer of San Francisco. Mrs. Robinson lives with her mother, Mrs. Volney D. Moody in Weltevreden, one of the most artistic homes of the college town. She is an active member of several of the clubs, and her interest in the fine arts is not feigned and fashionable, but sincere and innate. Oscar Maurer is one of the most successful of those who have attempted the difficult task of raising photography to the dignity of a fine art. His work has style, that indefinable impress of personality which causes us to idealize the doer and keeps us unconscious of the camera. The many friends of the betrothed couple are rejoicing over the affair which is considered unusually felicitous. The wedding will take place some time in the present year.

The Mascagnis' Arrival

Though Mascagni was cordially welcomed to San Francisco, the demonstration was not so great as that which greeted him on his arrival in New York. The American pier on October fourth of last year held the most excited crowd that had assembled there since the departure of Sir Thomas Lipton after the big yacht races of nineteen hundred. The Italian ladies kissed Mascagni and Madame Mascagni impartially, and there was a great to-do over them. But how speedily the composer's welcome cooled, and how cruelly he was treated even by his own countrymen in the sad sequel! The "Hope of Italy," as they call the composer of the famous intermezzo abroad, was even carped at in print by a fellow Italian who does critical articles for one of the literary monthlies. Let us hope his treatment in California will chase from his memory those unpleasant incidents of his sojourn in the East. Mascagni is a fine-looking young fellow, and his wife, whom he calls "Lena," is a sprightly woman with a decided will of her own. She is quite pretty, with dark blue eyes shaded by black lashes, and red brown hair. When she smiles she looks the picture of good humor.

His Greatest Achievement

Mascagni has come here at a time that should be favorable for estimating fairly his achievements and the place he is destined to occupy in musical history. Born in 1863, at thirty-nine he ought to be in the prime of his powers, producing the best work of his career. Yet a dozen years have passed since he took the Sonzogno prize with "Cavalleria Rusticana," which remains his most significant work. Since then operas in plenty have come from his pen which have obtained at best a succes d'estime. He has never equaled his first flight, which marked a new departure in operatic realism. It was achieved in 1890, before Verdi had uttered his last word about operatic art. It preceded "I Pagliacci," the later works of Puccini and the short operas of Spinelli and the other young writers of Italy. It has undoubtedly had its influence on musical history in the last decade for operas have been written both in France and Germany that trace their ancestry to the Italian school led by Mascagni. He astonished the world once and he may do it again, but he has wasted many years in indifferent work, and his opportunity is passing.

His Eccentricities

Many stories come from Italy of Mascagni's eccentricities, and if half of them are true he is certainly original. His fad is a big collection of bewilderingly beautiful cravats. He also has a penchant for rings on his toes. It is related that he once visited the house where Verdi lived, entered the latter's room as soon as the famous composer had arisen, and crawled in between the warm sheets of the bed, saying that he wanted an inspiration. The quaintest story told about Mascagni is that once he went unattended by his wife on a South American tour, and while there became infatuated with a beautiful cocotte of the tropics. He insisted when he conducted a performance that she have the seat of honor at his side. The impresario and he quarreled because of a difference of opinion about the propriety of this exhibition and Mascagni indignantly ended his engagement and went home to Italy. As he is now chaperoned by his wife, who cares nothing at all about music, it is not likely that Mr. Greenbaum will have any trouble.

Anna Held, again you're with us,
And if I may be so bold,
I'll remark where Anna held us
Anna Held again may hold.
You may show your Frenchy accent,
Dainty hosiery and silk,
But, dear Anna, as you love us,
Prithee, do not bathe in milk.

There's a famine in our dairies,
And a Trust, with wolfish talon,
Hold's poor bossy's lachtyl fluid
Up at forty cents a gallon.
Bathe in attar, Anna darling,
Or in champagne's bubbling ilk,
But we beg you as you love us,
Do not take your baths in milk.

By the infant at the bottle,
Waiting for his nourishment,
By the mush that pants for liquid
With the milk already spent,
By our hearthstones and our milk jugs
That your lavish tastes would bilk,
Anna, spare our finer feelings
And refrain your baths in milk!

Two Distinguished Plungers

John W. Gates, a distinguished Captain of Industry who gambles in the stock market, and "Pittsburg Phil," a noted plunger who confines his operations to the race track, are at present objects of much interest to local "pikers." "Pittsburg Phil" graciously exhibits himself to the turf "pikers" at Ingleside while Mr. Gates flaunts himself to the money-market "pikers" at the Pacific-Union Club. The homage paid Mr. Gates in the luxurious home of the millionaires and their claqueurs is no greater than that which Mr. "Pittsburg Phil" receives in the betting ring on the shores of Lake Merced. Both men are of the same temperamont, and the same habits except perhaps that Mr. "Pittsburg Phil" is more refined than Mr. "Chicago" Gates. Of the latter it is related that he was barred out of a London hotel for spitting on the carpets while smoking fifty-cent cigars, a way he had of proclaiming his Chicago breeding. Mr. "Pittsburg Phil" has the entree to the best hotels in the country and I believe that he not only refrains from soiling carpets but that he even eschews cuspidors because he regards them as hallmarks of vulgarity. Yet—mark the anomaly—Mr. "Chicago" Gates is the guest of the Pacific-Union Club, and Mr. "Pittsburg Phil" is denied entrance to that institution. At least he is not invited to visit the club and spit on the rugs.

"Is he her husband?"
"No, he's the other fellow."

The Clarks Are Coming

Captain and Mrs. McKittrick are expecting an early visit from Mr. and Mrs. Ambrose Clark of New York. The Easterners are a newly married couple. Mr. Clark is the stepson of Bishop Potter. The McKittricks will entertain for the Clarks and society will do its breakneck best to pay homage to the strangers. Lieutenant Robert Stirling Clark, a brother of Ambrose Clark, has lately been invested with a romantic interest because of his unrequited love for a poor but beautiful girl in the capital. The whole city is sympathizing with him and he has made a request to be transferred to Peking.

She Puzzled Her Dressmakers

Miss Dean came to the relief of her dressmakers the other day. All winter they have been trying to solve the problem of how to make thirty or forty white dresses for her without making her look always as though her wardrobe lacked variety. After several months of white, when each frock was worn but twice, she made her appearance last Wednesday evening, at the young ladies' dance, in a pink embroidered chiffon. She first broke away from the style prescribed by her mother by wearing scarlet poppies on a white frock, then golden sunflowers, and now she feels like a belle instead of a bud.

Why Keith Was Omitted

Bailey Millard deplores in the Examiner the failure of Mr. Coffin to mention Mr. Keith in his book, "American Masters of Painting." The reason of the omission is clear enough. Mr. Keith studied under Innes, and the effect of Innes is apparent in his style. To be classed with the American masters of painting Keith must first exhibit evidence of individuality that cannot be traced to Innes. Eastern people regard Innes as Keith's master and therefore Innes figures in Coffin's book while the Californian painter is omitted.

Stone Prefers Fife and Drum

Adjutant-General Stone is quoted as saying, "I am in favor hereafter of fife and drum playing in place of band music in the National Guard." The opinion has long been prevalent among national guardsmen that Stone was too antiquated for his job. What would the Guard be without the band? Those good old days when the General "fit in the war" behind a fife and drum have passed. The value of band music in modern soldiering is too well established to return to the fife and drum—inspiring as they are. The Government is now preparing to put the National Guard and Naval Reserves on the basis of regulars, yet General Fife and Drum Stone wants to go back to the Revolutionary period. Perhaps he will also recommend the old flintlock gun. With the frills and trimmings eliminated from a guardsman's life perhaps our back-number General will, in time, find himself alone in his dignity, a militia Napoleon at Elba, silent, troopless, and alone with his clerks and records on the bloodless fields of Sacramento.

Nerney and the Band

Life on the ocean wave in the old Marion is not smooth sailing to Captain Nerney. Probably no other man in the service could have made so much out of the Naval Reserves with the funds at his command. Nerney is an enthusiastic guardsman and he loves the military life, but not because of its parades. Had he lived among his Irish ancestors, in France, he would have been a Porthos, Athos, Aramis or D'Artagnan, fighting the battles of the King or Richelieu. He saw service in the Cincinnati riots of '85, faced the mob, smelled powder and hankered for more. For fifteen years he has held a command in California under less competent men, from the picturesque Colonel Spileman of the old Ninth Regiment, who told his Lieutenant to "march them forces behind the barn and form 'em agin," to General Last. He organized the Naval Reserves on this Coast, now commands the battalion, is a licensed pilot, ready to stand naval examination in seamanship, and yet the band disbands on him. Instead of Nerney's not paying out the measly few dollars the State allows him, it's a safe bet that he spends an extra hundred a month out of his own pocket. No one who knows Captain Tom Nerney will take any stock in the band complaints, and as for that other complaint, everybody knows they buried poor old General Seamans on tick. And Seamans was a good old soul who tried to be a gentleman and an Adjutant-General.

Gossip of the Service

The Department of California is to have a lot of new officers in the near future. Among them are Major General Arthur MacArthur, who will succeed Major General Hughes in command of the Department in April next when General Hughes retires, Major William E. Berkhimer, who has been appointed to act as Judge Advocate at Headquarters, filling the vacancy caused by the death of Lieutenant-Colonel Jasper M. Morrison, and Major H. S. Kilbourne, who will soon be promoted to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel and who will be the new chief surgeon at Headquarters. When Major General MacArthur assumes command San Franciscans will have the pleasure of coming in contact with one of the most gracious and courtly men in the army. Known as the "Prince" by the enlisted men who served under his command while captain of a company about twenty years ago, he retains in his advanced rank all that suavity of manner and kindly consideration for others which won him the title.

Mrs. Andrews is visiting her sister, Miss Edith Henrici, in town for a few weeks. The former was Ilse Henrici and her marriage with Major Andrews, U. S. A., was one of last year's events. The Andrews' entertain charmingly at Leavenworth, which is their home.

Connoisseurs of perfect goods appreciate "Jesse Moore" Whiskey for its purity and delightful flavor. It is without a peer.

Fine Linen For Ladies

Grandmamma, one of the characters in the clever Mrs. Glyn's latest novel, "The Reflections of Ambrosine," remarks that "a lady, however poor, should wear fine linen, even if she has only one new dress a year." This falls in with the prevailing feeling among "nice" people. A lady is known not by her manners, in this jeune siecle, but by her lingerie. Like her great grandmamma, she sets great store by her collection of exquisite hand-sewed underwear. But nowadays, unlike in great-grandmamma's day, miladi does not have to sew her eyes out, or employ the constant services of a seamstress, to provide herself with an outfit of beautiful underwear. She knows where in San Francisco she can buy her outfit and be entirely satisfied. Hand-sewed underwear, which to be correct, she must now wear, is shown in delightful variety at I. Magnin & Co.'s, 918-920-922 Market, the pioneer and most popular manufacturers and importers of ladies' and children's lingerie in this part of the world. Not even in Europe does one find more exquisite work in linen and cambric than can be seen at this store. One cannot find here, it is true, any of that cheap "slop-shop" stuff, that suggests underpaid workwomen. Skilled needlewomen do the sewing on Magnin & Co.'s underwear stock, and they are well paid for it. This season's brides are provided with the loveliest trousseaux, and one can always be sure of getting the latest thing in bridal lingerie here.

The Price of the Drawing

It is somewhat difficult to keep up the illusion that the heart is young and free when that organ, by birth and environment, is wizened and bound about by bands of gold and rare jewels. There are methods of recalling the illusion, however, as witness the revelers of the venal old French court who brought a Pastoral to Versailles and played at shepherd and shepherdess in the vain hope of coaxing back the dream which their luxurious vices had forfeited. In the same dream-hunt we have conjured a Bohemia out of a land that never existed and never will exist,—Bohemia, a land of artificial freshness designed to bring artificial youth to souls artificially past their prime. It happened in a studio:

She—Do I disturb you sitting here watching you paint?

He—Disturb me! It is seldom that I have anything so beautiful about.

She—You are a flatterer.

He—I am not a flatterer—I am an artist.

She—You are an artist—I wish I were an artist. Do you do nothing but stand here and paint, paint all day long?

He—Oh, no, not always. Sometimes I am lazy and sometimes I have to paint advertisements to pay for my rent and clothing. At other times I have no ideas—then I usually get drunk.

She—Do you enjoy it—getting drunk?

He—Yes. I enjoy most things.

She—Would you enjoy drawing my picture? I should think you would like it.

He—(laying down his brush and taking up a drawing board which is close at hand)—There. Stay just as you are and I will sketch you.

The Artist sat bending over his board and gazing up at her occasionally with clear grey eyes. It occurred to her at that moment that she had seldom felt the quality of the eyes of the conventional men who danced in her world. The Artist sketched quickly with decision in his strokes. Presently he was done and she arose to look at the sketch.

He—(retaining the sketch as she reaches for it)—Wait a moment. You cannot see it until—

She—Until what?

He—Until you thank me for what I have done.

She—I thank you.

He—(taking her hand)—Not with your voice—with your lips.

She—Give me the drawing and let me go.

He—Will you kiss me?

She—No. Someone might—

He—Who? You are not in your own world. Your friends and mine never meet. A moment later you will leave me and we will never see each other again. I love you—do you want the drawing?

She (faintly)—Yes.

* * * * * * * * * *

She (a moment later)—Now give me the drawing and let me go.

(She departs.)

* * * * * * * * * *

The next afternoon her Conventional Betrothed called, as was his ardent habit on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays. He saw the sketch lying on a table and admired it, for it was a good enough likeness to be beautiful.

He—Ah, what a lovely portrait sketch of you, dear.

She—Yes. One of the artists in the Quarter did it for me.

He—The Quarter—what artist?

She—Oh, I do not know his name. There are so many of them there and they are all alike in the important details.

He—I hope you paid him for it—they all need the money, poor devils!

She (hesitating slightly)—Yes—I paid him for it.

* * * * * * * * * *

On the same afternoon in the Quarter a Friend dropped in to the studio of the Artist.

Friend—Who was she?—a new model?

Artist—Not professional. She paid me for her portrait. Let's go out and have a drink. —The Impressionist

Dutiful Husbands Make Happy Wives

Husbands' Uses are to Shield Their Wives' Sins.

(The Text is Our Own.)

Mr. Delancey Montford had long labored under the delusion that he was a puppet. Not that he was a puppet,—which is a term full of idiosyncrasies—while he was in the company of his wife, for, when a man is a husband, at home he is a man.

Domestically, Mr. Montford plumed himself upon his honors.

In his home castle, only one impulse reigned, and that he was satisfied to christen, "the spirit of Montford."

However, a discriminating man, of the sort of which Delancey is a type, does not allow local success to blind him to wider deficiencies. He felt that he amounted to nothing in the world of finance.

His partner was a member of the Stock Exchange, and Delancey's reputation through New York arose from the general knowledge that he was his partner's partner. The difference between them was simply relative: while Delancey Montford was laboriously endeavoring to distribute conveniently the piles of gold his father had entrusted into his safe-keeping, his partner was earning eight dollars a week as an underling clerk in his own firm, also laboriously. But at the present time Montford's investments were systematically making tremendous dividends, and the former clerk wrote his name along in the firm. The difference between them was old and simple. Montford the money, Frochard the brains.

Frochard had never felt that the time was meet for matrimony.

Montford imagined that were Harry married he would have been a puppet; simply on the speculative assumption, however, that Frochard's luck would be different with a woman from on 'Change.

Frochard had always considered the senior partner a dreamer.

Marriage had appealed to Montford as a great feat,—of which dreamers, however, sometimes make a guilty success.

Montford, through Frochard, had organized a Western Improvement Association, and he was now determined to cross the Mississippi and make a million, simply as a financial feat, duplicating his domestic one. He did not need the money; he needed the eclat of distinction as a tonic for his pride, after seeing Frochard make money for six years.

Elsie, when Delancey was gone, laughed out loud, and her merriment stole away the suppressed decorum of the castle walls. She was free. Not that she had not done precisely as she pleased, Montford present or absent, but she was free from the secrecy that must be observed by sin. The terrible strain was relieved, after having grown tense under the continuous deception demanded by discretion. Free, since infidelity could raise its wings.

She had wondered why she had so submitted to the slavery of domesticity; but when, in one direction one's conscience is troubled by one's morals, it is a relief to be a martyr, in another.

There is a great deal more happiness in one's cup when it floats over the dregs of pain.

However anamolous this may be compared with the decalogue, it is surprisingly real in its nervous effect.

Elsie knew herself by her nerves. She knew the law through its name. She understood happiness from experience. She believed in a man when his existence conduced to her contentment.

She sat down to the desk in her boudoir and wrote a formal note to Frochard, inviting him to dine.

She seemed to herself dreaming,—so spontaneously did she act. We interpret ourselves to ourselves not out of impulse, but from the outward semblance.

They dined together in the castle, chaperoned by Montford's ghost.

They talked mostly about the West, till ten o'clock, up to which hour conventionality is man, and after which hour man is bohemia. At ten o'clock they went out for a drive in a cab.

And after the drive—supper. And after supper—a kiss.

And after the kiss two dreamers, each dreaming of that kiss. And at the morn two wakers, waking with the dream of that kiss. And all through the day two lovers, each alone, living on the memory of that kiss. And at night, two demented beings beginning—where they left off.

Now for a month they lived in a whirl of happiness. To exist on an insane plane, for the good of yourselves, and not for the general census, seems like the only sensible life, and divinity itself. Their error was impeccable, it was so stupendous. Happiness blinded the sin itself.

And for a month they thus disorganized the usual universe.

They had the future planned: After a year she would get a divorce, Montford then being about due. But insane people are subject to these plans. They are symptonic attacks. The guilty talk about happiness, others of love, and everyone of divorce. Did we not imagine these ultimate relationships of the future, there would seem no reality in the present, with which we play.

So they talked as though they were married, had been married, and would be married; as though she had never been married; and as though they were engaged. They toyed with imagination; they were children; they had always loved; they were innocent; they were spending but this part of the future together. They lived for years in foreign countries, gave up society, forsook faithless friends, built palaces out of their love. And they spun time.

When all this brittle glass was shattered both seemed wiser; each considered himself a fool; and observed that the clouds of love's incense shut out for a moment the real world.

The day a fate that had long been running after him overtook Frochard. He saw a pure and beautiful girl whom he loved as he did the sun; for whom he was courageous enough to defy Elsie. And after he had swiftly told her about it he married the girl.

He had left Elsie fainting. When she recovered she could nowhere find Frochard. He was out of New York that afternoon, getting the girl away from her parents. Though he was rich, he had appeared peculiar, simply because he had had originality enough to effect an entrance into society on account of his affectations. Though father and mother were prejudiced by result, the girl divined the means; and she skilfully planned the elopement over to Greenwich.

When they returned they were forgiven at the Waldorf-Astoria, a social sanctuary.

Elsie had not forgiven Frochard. She wore the weeds of tears and of a great wrong.

She saw Frochard, in a secret audience that she had contrived with great cunning.

When he went out he was pale and grave, and he handed her with courteous ceremony into the coupe.

After that they were seen occasionally driving together, and even lunching together. Frochard's wife never considered it seriously enough to object. He was so utterly open about it, and it began at the very time she was unquestionably certain that he loved her most.

Ten years afterward Frochard, solitary in the world of finance, was the great character of Wall Street. His firm dictated national policies, and his wife was the queen of the elect ladies.

And his friend, the staid element in Harry Frochard's life, still was Elsie.

He met Montford, now that their business was apart, occasionally in the drawing rooms of their wives.

Elsie had one child, a son.

She was talking one evening with Harry's wife, her arm around the boy, Frochard standing near.

"He has his father's eyes," said Frochard's wife, looking at the boy.

For a moment Elsie grew white as the wall.

Harry pressed her hand, while his wife leaned to caress the boy, and she steadied,—she recovered from her faint.

Nothing happened after this.

If all had not found happiness, peace appeared.

Montford, who had the idea that he was not a puppet at home, grew rich at last through his own brains,—preened and plumed himself.

New Banks

The first of the new banks to be organized and controlled by the Bank of California for the purpose of furnishing banking facilities to the outlying business districts of San Francisco has been incorporated. It has been named the Mission Bank and is to be erected at the northwest corner of Sixteenth and Julian avenues, between Mission and Valencia streets. The capital is placed at $200,000 in 2,000 shares of $100 par value each. The Bank of California is named as subscribing for 1,965 shares, and the following who will serve as directors, for five shares each: Frank B. Anderson, vice-president of the Bank of California, A. Borel and E. W. Hopkins, directors of the Bank of California, George L. Center and James Rolph. Plans for the erection of an attractive one story building in the old mission style of architecture are being prepared.

Another new bank will be opened at 1143 Market street, early in March, with a paid-up capital of $50,000, and a paid-up surplus of $50,000. The institution is to be called the Bank of San Francisco, and it will be operated under the charter originally granted to the old Bank of Kingsburg. The latter institution moved to San Francisco some years ago and operated under the title of the Market Street Bank for a short time and in 1895 closed. This charter has now been acquired by parties interested in the new bank, amongst whom are E. Aigeltinger, W. S. Upham, E. D. Dudley, H. Sipple, Daniel McPhee and William B. Nash.

Active Trading on 'Change

Generally speaking the past week has been the best week since the beginning of the year in the stock and bond market. There have been no specially large sales in single parcels but trading has moved along steadily and the numerous small transactions in the shares of nearly all the leading securities attest the popularity of this class of investments among the people. Another feature of the market which continues to be prominent is the numerical strength of the buying element. People with small amounts of money are seeking dividend paying stocks and bonds with greater avidity than for a long time past. The industrials are in particular favor and the activity of the market keeps nearly all of them at good prices and within narrow limits of fluctuation. It is also a noticeable fact that there is an utter absence of all spasmodic changes incident to operations of the boom order. In sugar shares there has been a fair measure of activity and the changes in prices have been few and unimportant. Hawaiian Commercial shares have changed hands in small parcels at prices ranging from $43.50 to $44. Makaweli is offered at $28, but buyers seem inclined to be rather backward and usually seek to purchase at not exceeding $27.50. Holders on the other hand are equally confident and as they are firm in their asking figures but a limited number of sales have been recorded. Paauhau has ruled very steady at $16.25 and it is stated that some transfers have been made between sessions at $16.50. Honohaa is in demand at $13.75 with no sellers. Onomea is offered at $25, but as buyers only offer $20, there have been no sales. Recent advices from the Islands are all reported to be favorable and as this city is now in cable communication with the plantations, local brokers and operators can keep in close touch with actual conditions there. Bank stocks have been receiving some little attention, shares of the Anglo-Californian Bank selling at $97. This is probably due to the fact that there are rumors current on the street that the institution has had an unusually prosperous year, with the probability that at the annual meeting the dividend rate will be increased. Bank of California shares are much sought after and the bidding price has reached $485, the highest figure on record. Even at this though there are no holders willing to part with their shares. Active steps are in preparation for the establishment of auxiliary banks and the first to be established will probably be the one at the corner of Sixteenth street and Julian avenue. For London, Paris and American shares $164.50 is bid, with no sellers at less than $167. California Safe Deposit shares are wanted at $137.50 but no holders are willing to accept that bid. Savings Bank shares have remained about steady with few transactions. Gas and Electric stock have been fairly well represented in the week's transactions, and generally speaking prices have ruled steady. Pacific Lighting Company is offered at $56 but buyers have been loath to pay more than $55 as an extreme. San Francisco Gas & Electric have been represented nearly every day in transactions and the ruling price has been from $42 to $42.50. Stockton Gas and Electric shares are in demand at $34.50 and Oakland Gas, Light and Heat is wanted at $75.50, there being no sellers, however, in either case. Spring Valley Water shares made quite a little improvement during the last few days, the bidding price touching $86, the highest figure for a number of weeks past. This price, however, did not bring out much stock and as holders are quite firm in their ideas it is more than probable that a further advance will have to be made in the bidding price in order to effect purchases. Contra Costa Water is firmly held at $67, but there have been instances where sellers have shaded their price in order to do business. Port Costa Water remains steady at $64 bid, with $66.50 asked. Giant Powder stock has eased off a trifle and $65 appears to be what buyers consider their best bidding price. Alaska Packers has been selling in small lots at $155.50 to $156, but holders generally are well satisfied and there is not much of the stock obtainable. The action of the company in cutting down the price on two brands of packed salmon appears to have had a longer continued influence in bearing the stock than was expected. As the lower prices, however, can have no effect upon the financial status of the corporation the depression in values of shares is really fictitious and doubtless will soon come to an end. —The Financier.

DIVIDENDS DRAW NEARER

As the Treasure Search on the Great Tarasca Mines of Mexico Continues

A Practical California Miner Invests and Then Makes a Trip to the Mines to Investigate Without the Knowledge of the Company

As the time draws nearer when the Tarasca mines of Mexico will once again be yielding up their fabulous wealth in dividends the stockholders become more interested.

One stockholder, who purchased a small block of stock, concluded to visit the property with a view of investigating for himself and friends, who were also shareholders in the company. This party was J. B. Compton of Williams, Colusa County, and he is a practical California miner of many years' experience.

That Mr. Compton was delighted with the prospect for early dividends on his investment, after he had thoroughly examined the mines, is amply proven by the following unsolicited report of his investigations written from Torres, Sonora, Mexico:

TORRES, Sonora, Mexico, January 29, 1903.

To Whom It May Concern: This is to certify that yesterday I visited the mines of the Tarasca Gold Mining Company of Mexico, situated about twelve miles west of Torres, and found the property in every respect up to my expectation, and fully as good, if not better, than represented by the statement made by the president of the company.

Having business in this part of Mexico, before leaving California I bought 200 shares of this stock as a flier, and upon my arrival here I went out to the mines to investigate. I found Superintendent Barnett ready and willing to give me all information concerning the property, and it affords me pleasure to assure those whom it may concern that I believe this property has a great future and ere long will be on a dividend paying basis. I have been in the mining business of California for over six years and think myself a fairly good judge of a mine.

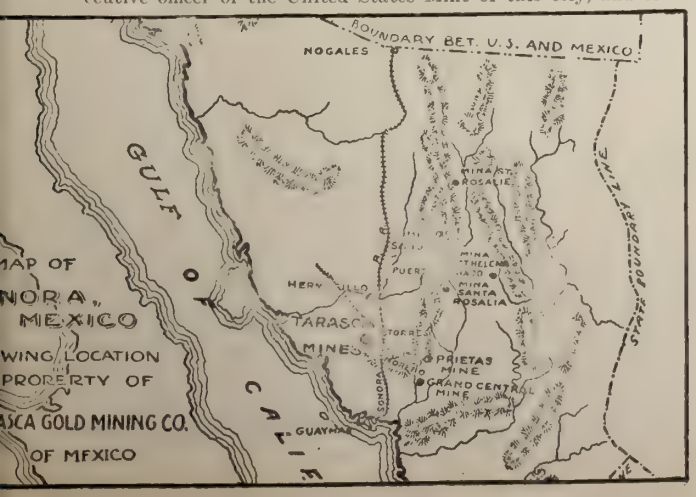
My home is in Williams, Colusa County, Cal. Yours truly,

J. B. Compton

There is, perhaps, no more famous mining property mentioned in ancient history than was the long lost Tarasca mine of Sonora, Mexico, which is now being opened up in a modern way by American capital. This mine is spoken of by Von Humboldt in his history of Sonora, as well as in Ward's history of Mexico, as having contributed very liberally to the support of the Spanish Government a couple of centuries ago, when the precious metals were being carried out of the mine in rawhide buckets in the crude manner of mining at that early period.

A Wealthy Section

This rich mineral section of Mexico has been the means of enriching many Californians, and the Terasca mines will add many more to the list of lucky investors in Mexican stock. What makes this Mexican strike more than usually interesting to Californians is the fact that a local company has secured control of this rich property, and Robert Barnett, formerly a trusted executive officer of the United States Mint of this city, and one of the best known and most conservative men in the State, has accepted a position as superintendent of the mine.



He is now in Mexico, and active operations toward opening up its rich ore bodies are moving along rapidly, as evidenced by his weekly reports covering the work, which are mailed to each stockholder. This is the same successful Barnett who for nearly two years superintended the development of the famous Santa Rosalie mine, which paid dozens of stockholders here in California and hundreds in the West, 10 cents a share per month for many months on stock in that company which only cost them 18 cents a share on the installment plan, and this stock advanced from 18 cents a share to $5 a share within twelve months after purchase. Mr. Barnett is also thoroughly familiar with the values and ore bodies in the great Tarasca mines, he having already superintended the only modern development of the property, and he makes an affidavit—supported by the best evidence—returns from the smelter—relative to the richness of its immense ore bodies.

The property is contiguous to the richest paying mines in Sonora, the richest state in Mexico, as shown by the accompanying map, and is now equipped with steam hoists and all necessary machinery for present needs, and work will be pushed rapidly until this valuable property will once again be yielding up its fabulous wealth in dividends.

Associated with Mr. Barnett in control of this property are some of the most reliable and conservative men in the State.

A Rich Strike

The above is a photograph of a specimen of ore just received from the mine, weighing 135 pounds, which carries values of nearly $800 to the ton. This piece of rock was taken from the 300-foot level before the cave occurred which stopped work and compelled the owners to place stock on the market to raise the necessary money to repair the damage.

Hugo Reichenbach, a well-known German mining man, is president of the company, and it was through his efforts that a small amount of the treasury stock was placed on the market within the reach of small investors on monthly payments, if desired, on the following terms:

No. Shares.	Price.	Monthly P'm'ts for 10 Months.
100	$ 30	$ 3 00
200	60	6 00
300	90	9 00
400	1 20	12 00
500	1 50	15 00

Each additional 100 shares $30, payable either in cash or on the same terms, $3 00 down and $3 00 per month for 9 months; but this price will continue to advance rapidly as dividends draw nearer.

The stock is absolutely non-assessable and non-forfeitable—if any subscriber is unable to meet the deferred payments it is arranged so that stock for every dollar he has paid will be issued to him.

Although nearly all the shares have been sold in small blocks already, more than three-fourths of the stock offered for sale has been disposed of.

If there are any readers of this paper who desire to stand in in a small way on this wonderfully rich mine they are advised to put in their application at once, as this is positively the last opportunity they will have to buy at 30 cents per share, as the price has already been raised once, and a second advance is expected March 1, as the time for dividends approaches.

Maps, pictures, affidavits and information regarding the property and work now being done will be furnished free upon application to Hugo Reichenbach, 620 Market street, San Francisco, Cal., who will aid those who wish to get in before the advance in price to secure a small amount of stock.

STAGE

A Spectacular Triumph

The effect of the Anna Held glance and its ravishing accessories, on some of us, reminds me that morals and geography are cognate themes. When Belle Baya came hither and revealed to us the salacity of the danse du ventre we successfully struggled to view her philosophically, and in the same spirit with which we contemplate a nude picture. We pronounced her an artist and flattered ourselves that we could applaud art for art's sake. When Belle Baya went to New York she was arrested for giving an indecent exhibition and we deplored the prudery of the great metropolis. Belle Baya had not studied her geography to advantage. We boast of our French restaurants, the unconventional establishments that emanate atmosphere and proclaim our freedom from restraint. That New York wouldn't tolerate them is proof conclusive to us that the bulging metropolis is a bit provincial despite the volume of its Clearance House business. But New York stands for the Anna Held glance without flinching. Nobody ever suggested in New York that the heldian glance was a tonic for the senile. Indeed the whole show as you see it at the Columbia has the genuine New York atmosphere. It is redolent of Broadway. It has all the elements that make for success in the Eastern city. It is a sample of the theatricals that the opulent hostess of Newport pays a high price for when she closes up a Broadway show for a night to entertain her guests in her own palatial home. The fact is that New York is as broad-minded in matters theatrical as we are when it comes to straining our morals to the point of tolerance where our French restaurants are concerned. The Anna Held show is an appeal to the grosser senses mainly for the reason that it is the incarnation of voluptuousness. It doesn't menace the morals like a Pinero play that calls your attention to the fact that vice has the approval of cultivated people. You are never for a moment insensible to the fact that you are looking at stage people whose business it is to amuse. The atmosphere may be intoxicating but there are no illusions to corrupt your philosophy. You see a dozen or so of beautifully moulded creatures whose curves are deliciously outlined, and who keep up a continuous fire of eloquent glances that are more piquant than polite. They say things with their eyes that are too risque for publication, or even for repetition outside of the Bohemian Club. However, if you have no objection to being flirted with collectively you can sit in a Columbia seat, and rhapsodize over those female forms divine, especially when they modestly turn their faces to exhibit the perfection of the fit on the other side. And as for the gowns—well, we have never seen anything like them on the local stage. Indeed, "The Little Duchess" is an opera that may be truly said to be more of a spectacular than a musical triumph. So lavish is the display of dress that one might suspect that Anna Held, having concluded that as she lacked the voice of a prima donna and the histrionic talent of a great actress, it would be a sublime stroke of strategy to dress herself into the hearts of theatregoers. And what a strenuous life it must be for her on the stage to squeeze into half a dozen of those gowns that are so tight-fitting as to give the impression that they were hand-painted on her person! But she works no harder in that respect than do the other feminine members of her company, for they all combine to give a bewildering object lesson in the modiste's art; also in the art of wearing a becoming gown becomingly. They are only chorus girls but they can give many a society woman points on poise and carriage. It is evident throughout the Held show that the management depends for success more on the sensuous sugestiveness of the shapely women, and the sumptuousness of the dress display, than anything else. And in the latter respect it appeals to women more than men. But of course there is a good deal of piquancy in the method of the display. It is pronounced in the scene in which the young women remove their hosiery, and again when they flit their trains to show you that they wear no petticoats, but that they sport passionate stockings. Throughout the show Anna Held is subsidiary to the spectacular features. She never intrudes. And, by the way, as if to make a concession to our morals, she eliminated, since leaving Broadway, the one song in which she stimulated the jaded passions of the New York johnnies. It was a song in which, while suiting her eyes to the theme, it being a ditty about "Those great big eyes," she accompanied herself with her hips, which are by no means the least inconspicuous feature of her personality. Her cleverest work is done in the last act when she is in boy's costume, and this is perhaps the most amusing act in the play. A pretty feature is the fencing girls' chorus, and an amusing one is the travesty on the French duel. There are several clever comedians in the comedy, and also an old favorite in the person of Louise Royce who was quite popular at the Tivoli not many years ago. She has a character part, and plays it effectively. On the whole Anna Held has supplied us with more material for discussion than anybody that has come this way to amuse for many a day. As an artist she is crude but she is under superb management.

Of the newest papers the Linen Bonds displayed by COOPER & Co. are most effective.

Gowns that Wern't Copyrighted

The prototype of that striking red gown worn in the second act of "The Little Duchess" was the conception of Lillian Russell's dressmaker. The airy, fairy one made her appearance in a fac simile of that gown in "Hoity Toity," and it created a sensation. All the papers described it and Lillian was happy until Anna Held's manager had it copied for one of his chorus girls. Lillian became indignant and cast it aside. Later on when Fay Templeton appeared in a picturesque garment in the burlesque of "Madame Butterfly" Manager Ziegfeld purloined the idea and dressed his entire chorus in a copy of the Templeton gown. It is worn in the second act and is a cherry-blossom gown of the kimona type.

The Old Familiar Spectacle

Extravaganzas may come and extravaganzas may go, but the "Devil's Auction," that dear old delight of childhood's unsophisticated hours, like the mighty river runs on forever. It ran into town from the damp and muddy road last Sunday and drove the chilblains away from a crowded house at the California. There were in that audience many venerable men who had, perhaps, eschewed the theatrical dissipation for years, but with memories of the "Devil's Auction" came visions of fleshly spectacles that enthused them in their knickerbocker days, and they could not resist the temptation to renew acquaintance with the viruble bespangled ballet. But times have changed. The "Devil's Auction" has been modernized. It has the antique trimmings, but it has been rejuvenated in some respects, probably to prevent mortification from setting in. It is still long on legs and somewhat short on voice. The most intelligent pair of legs in the whole show is possessed by a young woman whose name I could not find on the program. She is so tall and slender that when she comes in your first impression is that she's on stilts. Her height is accentuated by a diminutive pug with a ribbon on his neck and a cold in his head. Together they do a novel stunt. The extenuated female is a graceful contortionist, and the pug is an acrobat. He performs on the lady's body while she is engaged in demonstrating the elasticity of her bones. The blase indifference of the pug as he meanders over her person to and from all quarters is almost thrilling. The performance includes all the old familiar pantomime work and mechanical effects, and in the company are several clever specialty people. The production is highly reminiscent, and is replete with suggestiveness of the gorgeously spectacular without approximating sumptuousness. In other words, the tinsel is there, but it looks as though it has done long service.

Dramatic Debutantes

Whenever Mrs. Julia Melville Snyder gives a pupil entertainment one is moved to reminiscence about her many pupils who have attained name and fame in the profession, her daughter, Emelie Melville, Eleanor Calhoun, Katherine Clemmons (now Mrs. Howard Gould), Elizabeth Rowellan Hall, Fanny Bowman Hall and the others. All of those pupils made their debuts with eclat, at prominent theatres, supported by professionals. Nowadays, when the dramatic debutante is not such a novelty as she was twenty years ago, Mrs. Snyder brings hers out in a more modest way. But frequently one finds among them a young man or woman of real talent. The other night Mrs. Snyder gave an entertainment at which, among the pupils taking part, two are worthy of more than passing mention. Miss Helene Wallace, who essayed the role of Camille in the gambling scene from the familiar play, acted with much intelligence. She is a pretty girl with a good stage presence and her reading of the part showed that she had given it careful study. And Ruth Dahlgren as Mrs. Honeyton in the comedietta, "A Happy Pair," exhibited decided talent for comedy work. Raymond Dean recited two of Kipling's poems, "Gunga Din" and "Tommy Atkins," with good expression. A pleasure of the evening was the violin number of Mrs. Louise Douglas, who is a graduate of the Royal Academy of Music, London.

A Voice from the Auditorium

A laughable incident at the Alcazar on Tuesday night was in its way a tribute to the realism of Hastings's and Osbourne's acting. As Zeke Stevens voiced his quiet defiance to Injun Jack's knife, with the concluding "You sabe?" a man in the back part of the dress circle yelled, "Yes, I sabe." It was an involuntary outburst of interest in the plot. The audience tittered, rubbered, and the act went on. The big houses packing the Alcazar to see "Chispa" are a proof of the life there still is in Clay Greene's old play. Phoebe Davies was the first Chispa, the part being I believe written for her. Alice Treat Hunt's big black eyes are not unlike the soulful orbs of Phoebe Davies and she is well fitted to the role of the unaffected Western heroine. The cast throughout is good, and the scenic accessories most effective. In wholesome American plays, with mountain or rural background, the Alcazar people are at their best.

Patience at the Tivoli

"Patience" is more old-fashioned and trite today than any of the Gilbert and Sullivan operas because the esthetic craze which it satirizes is unknown to the present generation, but its music and its epigrams are as inspiring as ever. The Tivoli management has put it on attractively, and from an artistic standpoint the ensemble numbers are a notable feature of the production. The Tivoli chorus has seldom been heard to better advantage. The climax of the first act is most effective, and it stirs up enthusiasm that compels several curtain calls. Miss Marie Welsh is a valuable acquisition to the company, for she is a talented vocalist, and to her is due much of the credit for the success of the concerted numbers. Hartman's Bunthorne is marked by that same originality that distinguished his "Mikado." His work is suggestive of a travesty on Henry Irving in "The Bells." The singing of Arthur Cunningham and Caro Roma are pleasing features of a production that merits the approval of all Gilbert and Sullivan enthusiasts.

Vaudeville Still Alive

The Orpheum has waked up to such an extent during the past fortnight that the question "Is the vogue for vaudeville dying out?" is emphatically answered in the negative. The S. R. O. sign has been displayed more than once this week. It is hard to say which of the acts is the head-liner. John T. Sullivan's debut in vaudeville shows him still the admirable actor, and his sketch, "Captain Huntington" is charming. So is his leading support, dainty Margaret Atherton. Cole and Johnson do a clever coon stunt, and the applause they receive, and the encores demanded of them, stamp with the lie direct the oft-put-forth assertion that the public is tired to death of ragtime. The Martinettis are as wonderful as ever, and have some new turns in acrobatics. The Dumonds give good music.

A Benefit to Friedlander

It is a pleasure to note that Sam Friedlander, the successful manager, is to have a "testimonial performance," tendered to him by his grateful employers, Fischer and Rebmann. It has been suggested by some cynical people that gratitude is a lost virtue, but this is evidence to the contrary. Every one knows how Fischer's seemed, a year and less ago, to be "up against it." The lease was hardly worth taking as a gift. Then Friedlander was secured as manager, the Weber and Fields amusing burlesques were put on, and, presto! the "S. R. O." sign was dragged out of the dust heap and hung on the outer wall. Such a record merits recognition. And Friedlander, who has showered countless favors on countless friends, deserves that those friends now come to the front and help make his testimonial a success.

At the sixth subscription performance under Madame Fabbri-Mueller's direction, next Friday evening, the program will include "The Little Rebel," a French song and dance, a German farce with ballet, and "Drifted Apart," a playlet.

Agnes Ranken, who has done such good work with the Alcazar and Central stocks, goes on the road with Nance O'Neil next week. Eliza Oldfield, another San Francisco girl, also accompanies the company.

Mr. Harry James has returned from his trip to Australia and will again occupy the director's chair at Fischer's.

No headache, no gastritis, follows the use of "Jesse Moore" pure whisky. It does one good. There is none other to equal it.

Dr. McIvor-Tyndall will leave for Honolulu on the nineteenth by the steamer Sierra, to fill an engagement for a series of demonstrations and lectures there. He expects to be gone about a month and on his return is booked for a second engagement in Los Angeles, before going East and thence to Europe. Dr. McIvor-Tyndall has interested—as probably no one else could—large audiences in his theories and demonstrations. His closing lecture will be given tomorrow night at Steinway hall, and in addition to the lecture Dr. McIvor-Tyndall will make further experiments in telepathy and thought-transference. The subject of the lecture will be "Personal Magnetism: How to Compel Success."

The divorce question figures in "Lover's Lane," and in Sioux Falls, S. D., where the Clyde Fitch satire is due in March, the coming of the play is being looked forward to with interest. The residents of that centre who are awaiting the striking off of their matrimonial shackles are naturally interested in anything bearing on the divorce question. There are several "literary folks," by the way, in "Lover's Lane" companies. Angela Ogden is a poetess of passion, who out-Wheelers Ella Wilcox, and her poems get into type. Mary Karr, a Northwestern University graduate, contributes to several magazines. Her "Abandonment of the Twins" is now in press for spring publication.

The Drummers' Minstrels

Freeman and Lynn's Commercial Men's Mastodon Minstrels, composed entirely of drummers for the leading mercantile houses of the State, will make their first and only appearances in this city at the Alhambra, next Friday and Saturday evenings, with a matinee Saturday. This organization is just finishing its third successful yearly tour. Cassassa's band accompanies the show and the orchestra of sixteen pieces is under the direction of James H. Doolittle. There is a clever first part, with an interlocutor, bones and tambourines. Their bon mots have been praised from Willows to Carson City. The vocal corps includes William McDonald, late of the Bostonians. The olio has an exhibition of scientific bag-punching, a rapid-fire monologue, an amusing stunt by the Comedy Four, a comedy musical act, and some unique club juggling. The street parade, to take place Friday at Dolmetch is the name of a musician who has created something of a sensation among concert goers in the East. He plays upon obsolete musical instruments. Some one has called these affairs "hearing tests," so faint are the sounds emitted.

Cissie Loftus has again deserted the field of mimicry for "the legitimate." This time she is leading lady in "If I Were a King," written by her divorced husband, Justin Huntly McCarthy, ex-member of Parliament.

In the Hungarian National Opera House at Budapest, artists are not allowed to sing in the German language. Andreas Dippel is learning Wagnerian tenor roles in French, as he has been engaged to sing there.

Juliet Crosby (Mrs. Fred Belasco) has returned from her Southern trip. When in the South she was very extensively entertained.

A CRACK PHYSICAL CULTURE EXPONENT.

Physical culture is receiving more attention these days than was ever vouchsafed it before. Its advantages are so well recognized by medical men that in many instances they prescribe it, but there are many physical culture exponents who inflict injury by their methods. One of the few competent exponents of physical culture in this city is Professor Julian Brandon of the Lurline Baths, who has the endorsement of all the leading physicians. His correspondence course is never undertaken except after the applicant is examined by a physician. Upon receiving a medical report Professor Brandon instructs the applicant as to the form of exercise which should be taken. He is a clever athlete himself, and has had many years' experience.

Miss Alexander's Recital

Miss Clara Alexander has been fortunate in her poster for her recital in Century hall next Tuesday afternoon. Haig Patigian did the poster, a stunning design in vivid scarlet, with a darky lady and gen'leman emerging from a doorway. Miss Alexander's specialty is darky characterizations, and as no one here has yet entered that field, she has as it were the monopoly of it. It is doubtful whether any one else could give the darky dialect with the same touch. This young Southern girl heard the real darky mammies and Uncle Toms talk, in her childhood, and in her readings she reproduces that dialect as she heard it. She catches the humor and pathos of the sketches she recites and wins an instant sympathy from her audience.

Features of Next Week's Bills

"Hoity Toity" will be quite different from its predecessors at Fischer's, but as it will give Kolb, Dill and Bernard a chance to shine more brightly than opportunity vouchsafed them in "Barbara Fidgety," it is sure to please. "Hoity Toity" is in three sections, the first with the scene laid in front of the casino at Monte Carlo. Felix O'Dowd, an Irish sailor, Rubin Hunter, a sharper, and Lady Grafter, a society leader, are prominent characters, with a trio of New York delicatessen purveyors who, having acquired a fortune through cornering the sauerkraut market, are in Europe exchanging money for experience. The act ends with the arrival at Monte Carlo of Harvard Yale, his troupe of college minstrels and female brass band. The second act shows the interior of the casino, and introduces General Steel, an American billionaire with his four daughters, also an American coon-shouter with her picaninnies. The last section has its scene laid on the campus of Stanford University, and introduces a travesty on "The Gay Lord Quex." There's any amount of pretty music in the piece, including a new coon song, and good parts for all the clever company.

The Grand will have Charles Erin Verner as its new star beginning Monday night. The eminent Irish actor will appear in "Robert Emmet," in which occurs the famous address of the patriot before the judges of the Tribunal before whom he was tried and condemned. It is a gem of oratory and a jewel of eloquence, and every schoolboy knows it as well as he does his Lincoln's farewell address and Mark Antony's speech over Cæsar's dead body. During Verner's engagement prices will revert to the popular standard, ten to seventy-five cents, with matinee seats in the orchestra at twenty-five cents.

"Lover's Lane," W. A. Brady's production, promises to draw big houses at the California. We have heard so much of the play, which had a genuinely enormous run in New York, that every one wants to see it. It will be at the California but one week.

Ralph Stuart will be D'Artagnan next week, young Salvini's favorite role, in "The Three Musketeers" at the Republic. It is long since the stage version of Dumas' most popular novel has been produced here. It is full of action, and has good parts for all the company.

On Wednesday evening the Little Sisters' Infant Shelter will take a benefit at the Tivoli. "Patience" will be the bill. The Gilbert Sullivan esthetic satire will continue next week; "Iolanthe" is in preparation, the skit on the wards in chancery.

One of Ernest Hastings's old successes was Hosea Howe, Sol Smith Russell's part in "Peaceful Valley." He will play the role next week at the Alcazar, Miss Hunt being Virgie Rand. "My Partner" is in preparation.

Anna Held and her Sadie girls will stay at the Columbia all next week, when will come "Arizona" with what is said to be a stronger cast than that of last season. Gillette is a near future.

Lola Yberri, known as the "Spanish Whirlwind," who, Phil Hastings says, combines in her dancing the grace of Ellsler, the fantastic lightness of Taglioni, the passionate, stealthy movements of Carmencita, and the pure, classical art of Amelia Glover, will make her first appearance in this city at the Orpheum in her floral terpsichorean fantasy, "A Dream of the Dance." She carries a special portable, sectional stage which is erected for each of her performances, and has a staff of five people, including three maids who are not superfluous considering the dancer's seven costumes and the variations of her representations, which include illustrations of the weird incantations and dances of savage tribes, an Oriental dance, a Spanish dance, a minuet and an allegorical twentieth century dance. Yberri comes direct from London. The Jimmie Barries, last here three year ago, have a new sketch. Franco Piper, banjoist and Miss Fyfe-Dench, an Australian contralto with a range of two and one-half octaves, will be new. Cole and Johnson, Sullivan, the Dumonds and Martinettis will remain.

A troupe of performing Arabs will be on the Chutes bill.

Charming Zelie de Lussan

"The joy of living"—it is that that Mlle. Zelie de Lussan typifies. It is in her beauty, her manner, her smile and her voice. She is queenly and sweet, gracious and radiant. A fair-sized audience greeted her Tuesday evening and listened with delight to her well-chosen program. Mlle. de Lussan is an artiste of the first rank and is as charming in concert as she was in opera. Her voice is fresh, strong and true, and she controls it with the art that comes of skill and experience. Her enunciation is delightfully distinct and she phrases her songs as only a singer of heart and brain can. Of course she sang the two songs for which she is famous, the "La Boheme" valse and Habanera from "Carmen." Other numbers were by Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, Tosti, Nevin, Franz Abt, Schumann, Hawley and Allitsen. She sang the perennial "La Paloma," too, but in a way to make you love it though you execrated it before. Her accompanist was Angelo Fronani, a young man who plays with exquisite grace and finish. He gave three or four solos with charming effect. As usual there were many "jays" in attendance who seated themselves during the rendition of numbers, and who began putting on hats and wraps before the end of the last song.

Gabrilowitsch's Farewell

At the extra Sunday night recital given by Ossip Gabrilowitsch the audience was not so large as at the preceding recitals, but it was a musical and appreciative assemblage. The applause was of the discriminating kind, except in one instance where a too-enthusiastic auditor interrupted a composition to express his approval. The program included the Pastorale sonata by Beethoven, the Chopin compositions—the B major nocturne, valse in E minor and the ballade in A flat major, all familiar works and as such no doubt the more enjoyable to the many—and a request group consisting of the pianist's own Caprice-Burlesque, the Rubinstein Barcarolle in G minor, Henselt's "Si Oiseau J'etais" and the Schubert-Tausig "Marche Militaire" which was made almost a "popular" selection here by Carreno and Josef Hofmann. Repetitions of the Chopin valse, the Henselt and his own composition were given, also an encore after the Chopin group and again at the end of the program, Gabrilowitsch being most obliging in this respect. After the military march, however, anything else is in the nature of an anti-climax, and I do not think the audience should have insisted upon an encore to this. The Thursday concert and Saturday matinee drew large audiences, the programs being of variety and interest. Gabrilowitsch has made many friends here and as a Chopin interpreter it is not likely anyone will be able to usurp his place. At first you say, "Oh, he plays very much like Sauer," then as he goes on you add, "He has the poetry of Paderewski," but as he continues to play you find that he is Gabrilowitsch after all, and with the grace and poetry of his playing and the perfection of his technique is knitted the soul of the player himself. When he finishes his program you have become so thoroughly impregnated with the young Russian's motives and spirit that you are loth to leave him. You long for more. How beautiful are his caressing pianissimos, and his arpeggios like showers of diamonds. No matter how rapid or how subdued the passage, his rendering is absolutely pellucid. Some of the familiar numbers received new readings; the well known Ballade in A flat was given with a cumulative dramatic intensity, and the Schubert-Tausig Marche Militaire was not pounded to a pulp as usual. Technique is the last thing one thinks about in listening to the young Russian, although some of his numbers called for a high degree of digital dexterity.

Her Latest Work

Leila France—Mrs. W. P. McDermott of this city—has published her "El Salero" march and two-step, which was composed for the dancing club of that name in the Mission smart set. "El Salero" has a fine swing to it, and the elan that makes a two-step "go." It will likely become especially popular with the military bands. But this is by no means the first of Leila France's compositions to become popular. Her songs, "Baby Pink and White" and "The Sweetheart of all the Year," are still sung in the East, finding their place on programs at song recitals, and her "Palm City" schottische is also a favorite.

Last Sunday Miss Ella V. McCloskey and Otto Wedemeyer were the vocalists at the vesper service of the First Unitarian church in Alameda. Their numbers were "Abide With Me," contralto solo by Liddle, "Is Not His Word," baritone solo from "Elijah," and a duet, "I Sought the Lord," from "Naaman," by Costa.

A Treat at Heine Hall

All men, whether they know it or not, wish to be moved. We are every one of us ecstasy-hunters, on a quest of golden emotions. These emotions, as a wise man has said, the wise seek in love, in art, and in song. Of all the arts, it is music that makes us most exquisitely aware of ourselves, causing the limitations of the flesh that is for the moment charmed into self-forgetfulness, to fall back into infinity and leave the soul free and supreme. The many music-lovers whose hunt led them to Heine hall last Tuesday evening found what they were looking for—an ecstasy—in Henry Holmes's interpretation of the Beethoven Serenade. Those whose love of music has that touch of religion which marks the true child of light leaned and listened like rapt seraphs that adore the greatest joy-maker San Francisco owns. In the same mood they heard the Hungarian Dances of Brahms-Joachim played by Kathleen Parlow, violiniste, aged twelve years. By shutting one's eyes, it was easy for the weakest imagination to double the age and change the sex of the young artist. She has the mastery of a man. Like all youth for which fate has big things in store, she produced broad, rugged effects, letting the little things look out for themselves, and then surprised and delighted her hearers by undreamed of delicacies, little divinities like those lines in Shakespeare which seem written by a baby god. There was in her playing none of that finished littleness which is fatal—the death of hope. Once or twice she so far remembered her audience as to forget her music. It takes years to learn that so long as you front an audience it doesn't bite. Miss Parlow was accompanied by Mr. Fred Maurer, whose part of the program was perfection. When Mr. Maurer takes his place at the piano, the instrument, as if aware of the fact, immediately becomes instinct with life and expresses its pleasure in a hundred subtle, beyond-word ways. To say that the audience shares the pleasure with the piano does not half say it. For Fred Maurer the veiled face of the future wears a smile.

The Magic Flute as Oratorio

"The Magic Flute," Mozart's grand opera, will be performed as an oratorio for the benefit of Mr. J. de Witt, stage director of the Tivoli Grand Opera Company, by the advanced pupils of J. Greven's Operatic School. Other numbers on the program will be the "Rigoletto" quartet and the act of "Lucia" containing the celebrated sextet. The orchestra will consist of members of T. D. Herzog's Ensemble Club. The affair will not take place until March eleventh, but rehearsals are now diligently under way. It will be given in the Alhambra.

Their Forty-third Concert

Harry Barnhart and Arthur Weiss will assist in the program of the Music Teachers' Association next Monday evening. The program will include introductory remarks by Madame Ellen Coursen-Roeckel; piano solo by Miss Marsh Brown; songs—"Love Me or Love Me Not," Lecchi, "Garden Serenade," Levi, and "Gypsy John," Jordan—by Mr. Barnhart; song cycle, "Eliland," and MacDowell's "A Maid Sings Light," Miss Elena Roeckel; 'cello solos—"Polonaise de Concert," Berceuse and "Chanson villageoise," Popper—by Mr. Weiss; piano solo, Chopin's Polonaise op. 26, No. 1, Mrs. J. H. Jordan; violin solo, Bolero, Christofaro, Miss Gladys Couth; song, "Merrily I Roam," Schluffarth, by Miss Marie Bernard, pupil of Miss Ida Valerga; duet for two pianos, Mrs. P. O. Peterson, Miss Amy Peterson.

An Adelphian Program

The storm caused some changes in the program of Alameda's Adelphian Club's union meeting last Saturday. But the president, Mrs. Young, very cleverly rearranged the program so the missing numbers were not missed, and turned the affair into an at home which was very enjoyable. Miss Una Fairweather sang, and it was commented upon that she had improved in voice and singing since her last appearance there. Miss Fairweather keeps herself very closely at her music, and appears to have a bright future. Miss Grace Wastell, who has just returned from a two years' absence in Europe and Africa, read one of her letters, which was bright and interesting.

Miss Else Cellarius, a sister of Miss Aimee Cellarius, will give a piano recital next Saturday evening in Steinway hall. Miss Cellarius recently returned from two and a half years' study abroad under the Leschetizky method and under Madame Varette Stepanoff in Berlin. In Paris she studied under Moskowski and also took up composition. She has composed a number of marches and other works. Miss Aimee Cellarius will assist her sister at the recital. The program in full will be: Etude (Op. 25 No. 3), Chopin, Melodie a la Mazurka, Leschetizky, La Fileuse, Raff, Valse Allemagne, Rubinstein; Etude (Op. 25 No. 3), Chopin, Etude (Op. 25 No. 2), Chopin, Etude (Op. 25 No. 12), Chopin; Gavotte and Variations, Rameau; Regatta Veneziana, Liszt, Liebestraum, Liszt, Miss Aimee Cellarius; for left hand alone, Pirkhert, Barcarolle (Op. 27 No. 1), Oriental Love Song, Else Cellarius, Second Novelette, Schumann.

Mrs. Lenore Snider-Johnson will give a song recital next Monday evening in the Y. M. C. A. auditorium. A very interesting program has been arranged for the event, Nathan Landsberger, violinist, and Dr. H. J. Stewart will assist.

The Mascagni Concerts

A fine orchestra has been engaged to play under Mascagni's baton at the Alhambra next week. Mascagni, as the Eastern critics all granted, wields a baton possessing the magnetism that draws the right kind of music from his men. At the Tuesday concert the program will be the overture to "William Tell," by Rossini, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique" symphony and the suite to Hall Caine's "Eternal City" by Mascagni; the "Dance of the Dolls" and the "Hymn to the Sun" for orchestra and chorus, from the Japanese opera "Iris." Thursday's program will include Wagner's introduction to the "Meistersinger," and "Liebestodt" from "Tristan and Isolde," Goldmark's second symphony (for the first time in this city); overtures from Mascagni's "William Ratcliffe" and "L'Amico Fritz," and Tschaikowsky's overture to "1812." On Sunday afternoon a grand chorus of one hundred and fifty voices and a quartet of soloists consisting of Grace Northrup Davis, Mrs. M. E. Blanchard, J. F. Veaco and G. Wanrell, will assist in rendering Rossini's "Stabat Mater." In addition, the following orchestral numbers, Beethoven's overture to "Leonore" No. 3, and Mascagni's "Hymn to the Sun" will be rendered. A big popular concert at Mechanics' Pavilion will be given on Sunday night, arrangements for which have not yet been completed. Seats for the concerts at the Alhambra are now on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

"The Kilties"

Beginning with a matinee Monday afternoon, February twenty-third, the "Kiltie" band, Gordon Highlanders of Canada, will give a week of concerts. Each of the fourteen programs will be different. The band, while it makes a specialty of "Auld Scotia," has an endless repertoire of music of all classes, from Wagner to rag-time. Program books will be issued, containing complete programs for every concert. In addition to the usual military band equipment, this organization includes a vocal choir of sixteen voices, ten instrumental soloists, a tenor soloist, six Scottish dancers, a boy dancer, pipers, buglers and other novel features. The band will parade every day in its full kilted Highland uniform, the music on march being the stirring war melodies of the Scottish chiefs, played on bagpipes, bugles and drums. The band master, F. Robinson, is probably the best musician touring with a musical band, having been prominently identified with symphonical and choral work in Toronto. The sale of seats begins Wednesday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, and popular prices for reserved seats will prevail.

Mr. Zech is in Los Angeles where he has been giving symphony concerts with great success. He will return shortly to begin rehearsals for the concert to be given at Fischer's. There is a movement on foot to place the Zech symphony concerts on a solid basis and many prominent lovers of music have signified their willingness to guarantee Mr. Zech from any loss.

Mr. Louis Eaton's fourteenth free organ recital will be given at Trinity church next Thursday evening at eight o'clock. The program will consist of numbers by Bach, Guilmant, Handel and composers of the sixteenth and seventeenth century.

Oakland, the home of culture, turned out a most attenuated audience to hear Gabrilowitsch. There were less than seventy-five people in the house. —The Music Critic

LETTERS

Revelations of the Hand

"In behalf of palmistry," says Dr. Alex J. McIvor-Tyndall in the introduction to his book, "Revelations of the Hand," "I hold that any one who gives the subject intelligent study will readily become convinced of its accuracy and importance * * * I cannot impress too forcibly that palmistry is not in any sense mere 'fortune telling,' depending upon some intangible and mysterious power possessed by the palm reader. Palmistry is a science based upon a thorough knowledge of the shape and lines of the hand. Clairvoyance and mediumship are indisputable facts, but they have nothing to do with palmistry and should not be confounded with the science." Dr. Tyndall's book is the most comprehensive work on palmistry that has yet been published; it is the most easily understood because nothing is omitted that will give the reader understanding of the science. I have seen works that contained more words on the subject, but never one whose words are all so valuable. With this book properly studied any one can acquire all that is necessary to read characters by the hand. In his preface Tyndall recommends the study of palmistry particularly to physicians, teachers and parents, as an aid to diagnose disease, temperament, talents, capabilities and faults of children. He does not recommend its study as a profession, chiefly because though it should be regarded as the most honorable of callings, it has in this country been cheapened by the vast army of fakirs who, having but a surface knowledge of the science, call themselves "palmists" and practice on the credulity of the people. The volume contains one hundred and sixty-nine pages, with an appendix of illustrations and readings of hands of prominent subjects. It is divided into two parts, Cheirognomy, containing sixteen chapters devoted to the types of hands, with their characteristics, and Cheiromancy, which tells of the lines and their meanings, in eighteen chapters. Every chapter is interesting, and the facts are framed in such delightful language as to hold the attention of even the skeptic. The introduction and some of the thoughts therein expressed are worthy of remembering:

"With every forward swing of the pendulum of Time we succeed in coming a little closer to the ideal of perfection which we call God.

"We move in cycles. An age of intellectual development follows that of materialism; an era of faith follows one of unbelief in natural sequence. And so we live and learn and pass on—to graduate perhaps into the higher school of life in some other world.

"Intelligence and education are by no means synonymous. Education seems to be a parrot-like ability to learn and recite the thoughts and expressions of others, under the mistaken impression that they are our own.

"The man who has attained pre-eminence in some special study is the less fitted to pass judgment upon a subject of general interest, for the very natural reason that his mental faculties have been so concentrated upon his chosen subject as to make him incapable of receiving an unfamiliar one unbiased by the influence of his own special study."

In another part of the book occurs this:

"The only true education is that which teaches self-knowledge, enabling us to foster and cultivate our talents and crush out the tendencies which lead to evil."

And this:

"The object of earth life must be the growth of the soul; the development of the consciousness that we are each and all a part of the Great Whole. This knowledge can be gained only through experience. The perfection of character does not mean the walling ourselves about with so-called virtue and abhorrence of error. Of what benefit to the world is goodness if it does not help? And how can we help when we cannot sympathize or understand? And how can we understand if we have never felt? If we cannot realize the motives which prompt to sin, what right have we to pronounce against the sinner?"

Among the hands used as illustrations are those of Ysaye, Homer Davenport. Sol Smith Russell, Roland Reed and "Kid" Adams the stage robber.

We All Know Him

It is amusing to note the way in which Lynn Roby Meekins's novel, "Adam Rush," is bringing out the Pharisaism of Eastern reviewers. The important event in the story is the attempt of the agents of a proposed railroad scheme to corrupt legislation and buy up in advance a favorable vote to any proposition they may choose to make. ter" of the story in Ohio, while Philadelphians charitably removed it to Maryland; New York pointed fingers at Virginia, and one or two others hastily disclaimed connection. As a matter of fact the conditions would apply anywhere, East or West, where corrupt legislation had taken hold and bribery, direct or indirect, become a means of livelihood. As to the exact locality, the author, when appealed to, replied that "Good Americans are about the same everywhere in the Eastern middle belt of the country. And if the people are all right in the story, it doesn't make so very much difference about the postoffice address."

A new novel from the pen of Francis Churchill Williams is announced, and if precedent is any gauge, we may look for something beyond the ordinary. Mr. Williams is not one of the lightning artists who produce books before readers are ready for them. Two years ago he brought out his "J. Devlin—Boss," and this is the first we have heard of him since. "J. Devlin" was a remarkably good story which made more than a passing impression. U. S. Grant is to be the central figure in "The Captain," and though we are rather sated with historic characters in our fiction, it is safe to say that in this case we shall get something better than the stereotyped puppet.

Jack London recently made some studies of life in the East End of London, where he posed as an American sailor "outward bound." It is fair to expect that he will give us the benefit of his experiences shortly, and he certainly will make as graphic a picture as did Arthur Morrison in his "Hole in the Wall."

Tolstoi's "Resurrection" has been staged in France, and is also booked for an English production. Attention has been directed to the large number of errors and discrepancies which appeared in the English version of the novel and it is suggested that either the Russian original be made the basis of the English drama, or that it be checked and corrected by the original. It might also be suggested that there is no particularly crying need for staging it at all.

Sharp Tongues and Facile Pens

Pearl Mary Theresa Craigie, otherwise "John Oliver Hobbes," will shortly publish another book, "The Vineyard." Though Mrs. Craigie is usually regarded as an Englishwoman, she was born in Boston. She has a sharp tongue of her own and is not averse to exercising it on the literary sisterhood. Every one knows the old story of how Mrs. Van Rensslaer Cruger answered that she would prefer to be kissed to death, when some freak-collector put the query, and perhaps Mrs. Craigie's remark, when Mrs. Cruger was pointed out to her at the opera, is equally well known: "She will never find an executioner." There was a sequel to the story, however, which was not so widely published. A reception was given for Mrs. Craigie, and Mrs. Cruger wrote to decline, adding that she would express no regret that she already had an engagement, as it so frequently proved disillusioning to meet authors after having read their works. On being shown the note, Mrs. Craigie remarked that "having read the works of Mrs. Cruger, one could not possibly be disillusioned in meeting her." Mrs. Craigie's opinion of "The Quick or the Dead?" was that the reader was decidedly de trop. One can appreciate and agree with her criticism of that incident in the opening chapter, when Barbara, returning to her home after an absence of two years, takes up a half-smoked sigar which was lying just where her husband had left it, and kissed it passionately. Asked if she thought it true to life, Mrs. Craigie answered, "Well, hardly; the woman who would do that would have eaten it." Most people have wondered what kind of housekeeping was carried on when even such superficial "cl'arin' up" as disposing of refuse and rubbish was neglected.

The London Academy asks, with more vinegar than seems necessary, "Why can we never take up an American book magazine without finding an illustrated article on the homes and haunts and pursuits of Richard Harding Davis?" One might hazard a guess that it is because the people who read American book magazines are interested in the homes, haunts and pursuits of Mr. Richard Harding Davis. When Americans take up the English book magazines they expect, as a matter of course, to find them filled with articles and references to British authors who are of no great importance to readers on this side of the big herring pond. Wouldn't it strike the Academy as just the least little bit absurd if American readers were to take exception to the endless discussions of matters purely English which fill the columns of the papers and magazines from London? Of course there is a lot of gossip and exploitation of authors which is as useless and tiresome as it is absurd, and unwarranted by the importance, or rather, lack of importance of the writer, but it is pretty safe to conjecture that when the book magazines are devoting much space to an author it is because, for the time being at least, he is of sufficient importance to warrant it. Instead of the whimpering complaint, it might be more to the purpose to look into the matter and see what Richard Harding Davis has been doing to attract public attention. —The Bookworm

WITH THE

SUNDAY MORNING BULLETIN

Commencing February 15, The Bulletin will issue, in color, the first of a series of reproductions of some of the most famous paintings in the world.

A. W. Strutt's Masterpiece, "IN A FIX."

The first of the series of superb Art Supplements which readers of The Sunday Morning Bulletin will receive. It is one of the most famous canvases in any collection, and the reproduction is equal to the original in color and detail.

Alfred W. Strutt was a great painter, one of the masters, and "In a Fix" was his masterpiece. The subject is an unusually lively one. An old woman is driving a load of poultry to market. On her way thither she is obliged to ford a stream. Her donkey finds the water cool about his lazy legs and he refuses to continue his journey, although there is rare trouble in the wagon. A flock of geese in the creek call loudy to their fellows in the wagon and a response comes from an unusual flutter in a crate full of geese. The sight of the water rouses the geese to great activity and they succeed in breaking out a few slats and excite the old market woman to vigorous efforts to compel the recalcitrant donkey to "get a move on." The old lady plies her stick with all her strength, but the beating does not appear to have any material effect upon the donkey, whose enjoyment of the situation is permitted by his thick hide, and this is evidenced in his comical demeanor. It will be presented with the Sunday morning edition of February 15. Be sure you get it. And there are others to follow. Watch The Bulletin announcements.

Crumbs from Crawford's "Cecilia"

Men born in the same surroundings and brought up in the same way generally hold to the same principles as guides in life, and show the same abhorrence for the sins that are accounted dishonourable, and the same indulgence for those not condemned by the code of honour, not even admitting discussion upon such points. But the same men may have very different opinions about spiritual matters.

Guido: Do you think that every man who commits suicide is a coward?

Lamberti: If it is to escape his own troubles, yes. A man who gives his life for his country, his mother, or his wife, is not a coward, though he may kill himself with his own hand. * * * Even the code of honour, degenerate as it is, and twist it how you will, cannot give you an excuse for killing yourself when you have always behaved honourably, or for running away from the enemy simply because you are tired of fighting and will not take the trouble to go on.

Guido: It do not know whether it is worse in a man to tell fibs to please a woman, than it is in a woman to disbelieve what an honest man tells her on his word.

Cecilia: There are only two possible ways of living, either by religion, if you have any, and that is the easier, or by rule. * * * Act so that the reason for your actions may be considered a universal law (Kant).

Nothing irritates a man more than his own inborn inconsistency, whereas he enjoys diabolical satisfaction in convicting any woman of the same fault.

The artlessness which is often a charm in a young girl looks terribly like foolishness if it lasts till a woman is forty.

The intuitions of a very masculine man about women are far keener and more trustworthy than women guess; and when such a man is not devoured by fatuous vanity he is rarely mistaken if he feels sure that a woman he meets will love him, provided that circumstances favour him ever so little. There is not necessarily the least particle of conceit in that certainty, which depends on the direct attraction between any two beings who are natural complements to each other.

The one matter about which a man is instinctively reticent with his most intimate friend is his love affair, if he has one. He would rather tell a woman all about it, though he does not know her nearly so well, than talk about it, even vaguely, with the one man in the world whom he trusts.

There are great actors who become so used to a favourite part that they go on acting it in real life, and have sometimes gone mad in the end, it is said, believing themselves really to be the heroes or tyrants they have represented. Only great second-rate actors "learn" their parts and attain to a sort of perfection in them by mechanical means. The really great first-rate artists make themselves a secondary existence by self-suggestion and really have two selves.

A habit is not broken by a single interruption. It is hard for a man whose nerves are accustomed to a stimulant or narcotic to go without it for one day, but that is as nothing compared with giving it up altogether. —The Gleaner.

Fairy Tales of the Swim

The Unequal Match.

There once lived a scullery maid who had attained considerable culture by reason of her possession of a magnificent mind, a retentive memory and much leisure in which to improve the quality of her gray matter. The consequence was that she found no pleasure in the society of her fellow workers in the King's kitchen, and she snubbed all overtures made toward her friendship by the footmen, stable boys and even the butler.

The scullery maid was a stunning beauty, though being so occupied with her mental culture she did not know it. She never looked into the mirror except to see that her face was free from smudges. She had a fine shape but as she always wore brown calico frocks and blue gingham aprons with large bibs her figure was not shown to best advantage.

However, in spite of these disadvantages a Prince saw her and fell in love with her. As his father was a democratic King, he gave his consent to the marriage, which was pulled off in great shape and was attended by every royalty of any importance.

The Prince was passionately proud of his beautiful Princess, and he hung costly silks, satins and laces upon her exquisite form so that nobody would ever have imagined that she had ever worn gingham and calico. She walked with a proud carriage that was not surpassed by the Queen herself. All the neighboring royalties came to see her, and her calling list was soon so long that it filled two volumes of vellum. The new Princess was invited everywhere and spent her days visiting and receiving visits, feting and being feted. She had not a moment for that mental culture in which she delighted.

And she had to pretend ignorance of many things with which she was familiar, and this was not very pleasing to her for she had an honest disposition. She would have preferred to say right out loud that she knew all about building fires, peeling potatoes and washing dishes, but instead she had to feign disgust when anything plebeian was mentioned. The Prince, though he had made a love match, was very particular about the proprieties, and he did not approve of being too outspoken. In his monde it was not the mode.

Time went on and the Princess's beauty began to fade. Her social duties came hard on her and the lack of proper exercise ruined her once matchless complexion. The Prince noted the change in her, but consoled himself with the thought that it was not her beauty that had attracted him so much as her sincere disposition and her store of learning. He confided his thoughts to his mother, the Queen, but she—who had never approved of her son's match—told him to open his eyes, brace up and divorce his Princess without an instant's delay.

"Instead of being open and sincere, your wife is the most untruthful, insincere woman in our whole kingdom," she said, "and as for her learning, she never says a word outside of society gossip and she hasn't opened a book since you married her. That's what one gets for marrying beneath one's royal station."

The Prince wasted not an instant but took pains to corroborate his mother's words. He found that, alas! they were too true. Being a passionate Prince, he immediately taxed his wife with having deceived him, and won him under false pretenses. And, as she was not able to answer because he would not listen to her, he divorced her directly.

The Princess was in a sad position, for she had forgotten how to do her former work and besides there was no position as scullery maid open to her in the kingdom.

"Woe is me," she cried, and wrung her white, useless hands, "when I was a scullery maid I was happier than I knew. I had time to read books and study, I was respected if not liked, and I was as honest as George Washington. As a Princess I learned to pretend and deceive, for my Prince's pride's sake, and I no longer had leisure to improve my mind. Because I did what all the royalty do, my husband leaves me. Ah, woe is me!"

And, though one of her former companions, the Head Groom of the Stables, pressed her to marry him, she knew that a groom after a Prince would be too great an indignity. And so she went to bed and blew out the gas.

The Hearst Boom

The William Randolph Hearst boom for President of the United States was launched in Columbus, Ohio, last Thursday night on the occasion of the Democratic banquet in commemoration of the birthday of Abraham Lincoln. There is no longer any doubt of Mr. Hearst's aspirations, and as Town Talk was the first paper to assert that he had designs on the Presidential office we are pleased at the verification of the statement. More than a year ago we called attention to a significant article, written for one of the magazines by a journalist on the Hearst payroll, and pointed out that it was clearly an argument on the availability of Hearst as a Presidential candidate. It was not, however, until after his election to Congress by an overwhelming majority that the work of booming him for the Chief Executiveship was begun in earnest. Since that election, which gave proof of his popularity in New York city, it has become evident from the tone of his papers, and especially from the prominence given to references to his eligibility, that preparations were being made to spring him as a candidate. Influences have been exerted to create a sentiment favorable to his candidacy, and finally it was decided to make the Hearst boom the keynote of the Ohio banquet, with William Jennings Bryan in the forefront as the star boomer of the occasion. Undoubtedly the star of the young Napoleon of journalism is in the ascendant. It is high in the political firmament and the eyes of all political leaders are upon it. If the Democratic National Convention were held tomorrow William Randolph Hearst, the energetic young Californian, the most strenuous of all the champions of the plain people, and the most successful of all newspaper publishers, would undoubtedly be nominated for President of the United States. The sentiment of the rank and file of the Democracy at present is for Hearst, and there is not another available standard-bearer in sight. Grover Cleveland, though beloved by the anti-Bryanites, is obviously impossible, being allied with that element which is gradually disintegrating and drifting toward the party of the plutocracy. There has been a feeble effort to boom Olney but he is merely the second choice of the followers of the sage of Princeton. Bryan has talked himself to death, Tom Johnson has announced that he is for Hearst, Hill's blundering in the late gubernatorial campaign in New York caused his retirement to obscurity, and the only man who appears to have any legitimate claim to the centre of the stage is the New York Congressman. But in these times of great commercial and industrial activity the man of the hour is superseded at the close of the day; the hero of the day is the execrated of the morrow. Mr. Hearst is about to emerge from the seclusion of the editorial sanctum to take his seat in the councils of the nation upon which the white light beats fiercely. Public sentiment is as inconstant as the affections of a Newport wife. However Mr. Hearst is a man of cool judgment, and he is undoubtedly sincere. He was the champion of the people long before he had political aspirations, and gratitude entitles him to their support. What a lively and exciting campaign we would have with Hearst and Roosevelt as opposing standard-bearers!

And Jordan Smiles

The announcement has been made that Mrs. Jane Stanford, surviving founder of the Leland Stanford Jr. University, is preparing to surrender all control of university affairs into the hands of a board of trustees. This is a consummation devoutly wished by all that have the interests of the university at heart. Mrs. Stanford is an estimable, public-spirited woman, and she is deserving of the highest commendation for her unselfish devotion to the institution which perpetuates the name of her beloved son and stands as a monument to the philanthropy of herself and husband, but there is no better way for her to hasten the development of the university and to accelerate its progress than by surrendering control. She has in a measure usurped the office of president, for Dr. Jordan has graciously acquiesced in her views in matters of vital importance, and her suggestions have been followed through courtesy when they were far from conducive to the welfare of the institution. Though Mrs. Stanford is a woman of good judgment in some matters she is not competent to preside over the destinies of a great university. Very few women are. If she had had an academical training to fit her for the responsible duties of the office she would no doubt have refrained from doing many things that have tended to make Stanford University ridiculous. In view of her lack of experience she is deserving of credit for not having done worse. There are some women we might mention who, possessing the same powers, could have inflicted irreparable damage even with a Dr. Jordan on hand to suavely and deftly interpose an occasional repressing hand. Mrs. Stanford's latest decision is proof of her excellent judgment. As soon as the trustees have been empowered to assume control Mrs. Stanford will go abroad. We have no doubt that when she returns she will find that the university advanced by leaps and bounds during her absence.

More Pension Schemes

Two new pension schemes were broached last week. It is not likely that either of them will go beyond talk, but they serve to show to what an extent the idea of pauperism has taken hold of the public mind. Senator Hanna's bill provides that former slaves shall be pensioned. Senator

Mason of Illinois introduced a similar bill two years ago, and the same proposition has been made from time to time by others. It is not expected that the bill will pass, but it will help to sway the negro vote at the next presidential election, a bit of political buncombe which will cost nothing and accomplish much. The other scheme was broached by the Bulletin, as a sort of moral to the story of the poor laborer who died at forty-five, leaving a widow and eight children unprovided for. The kind-hearted Bulletin thinks that a pension of a hundred dollars a year for each child of a widowed mother would be about the right thing, since the State pays approximately that sum for the support of orphans in public institutions. There is no question but that a widow left destitute and with a family of little children is in a sad plight. To keep her little flock together in poverty and want or to scatter them in public institutions is equally a hardship. So far as the care of the children is concerned, perhaps it would be better accomplished by paying to the mother the same sum that would be awarded some institution for the care of the children, but there is this to be considered in regard to both measures. It does not pay in the long run to pauperize a population. Institutionalized children are not a success in making their way in the world, and the tendency of the day, after long and direful experience, is in the direction of placing the dependent wards in families. People may accept payment for undertaking the care and training of strangers, but why should mothers expect compensation for doing that which they tacitly agreed to perform when they became wives? Suppose that in this pathetic case cited by the Bulletin, the mother was paid the eight hundred dollars a year, it would not be in the least surprising to find her figuring in a lawsuit with some officious relative who would be anxious to care for the children, or at least a part of them, for the sake of their pension. It would not be remarkable if she were to take unto herself another partner, whose weather eye would be firmly fixed on the advantages of an annual income of eight hundred dollars without working for it. The usual frauds would also be perpetrated. The death of pensioners would be concealed, or ages shaved down to keep within the limit, to say nothing of the army of applicants in no pressing need, but unwilling to let a good thing get past them. The soldiers' pension business has been so prolific of frauds, and has set such an example of the results of getting something for nothing that it would be well to pause before considering any further wholesale charity. Indeed, between the slave pension, the orphan pension, and the gentle hints of a pension to housewives who remain at home and care for their households instead of crowding into the labor market, we have before us what virtually amounts to universal pensions. The only drawback to the utopian scheme, and that apparently has not presented itself to the profound intellects of the proponents, is the question of providing the money. When all are drawing pensions for merely keeping alive, who is going to pay the taxes that will provide the means?

The Eternal Graft

One of the literary monthlies recently unearthed the author, or rather, a claimant for the authorship of the verses beginning:

> "Little drops of water,
> Little grains of sand,
> Make the mighty ocean,
> And the pleasant land."

Of course the next thing in order was a "fund" to be contributed by the unfortunate victims who had in their day been tortured into reciting the ditty, and likewise, of course, there began to appear, all over the English-speaking world, claimants. It does not matter particularly whether it were an English clergyman or an obscure American housewife who committed the original sin. The thing which concerns us is the collection mania, and the trivial excuses which can be found for levying tribute on the pockets of pupils. There is no evidence that any of the claimants in this case is in need, and even if all of them were on the waiting lists of almshouses, there is no reason why the perpetrators of a bit of doggerel should be set up in business on the strength of it. This particular hold-up has not been favorably received in the East, where several State superintendents of schools have refused to countenance the scheme, and it is possible that we shall hear of it only through the faint echoes of the Eastern press, but it is time, and high time, that this whole business of sandbagging children out of their candy money was put an end to. As a money-raising proposition there is nothing equal to that of enlisting the little people. They have not experience or judgment enough to discriminate, and they are easily influenced by pathetic tales of woe. The spirit of emulation takes hold of them, and in order that their class, school, or town may do more than the rest they will pour in every cent they can get their hands on, and make life a burden to parents, relatives and friends. People do not like to refuse a paltry dime or quarter and the result is that they are forced to contribute to causes of which they do not approve, and to charities which are no charity. There have been so many of these schemes started, at one time and another, that one begins to wonder how many of them have been carried to even an approximate end, and what has become of some of the sums that have been raised. Quite recently we saw accounts of the dilemma of the treasurers of the fund for the American Boy, the battleship or armored cruiser which some enthusiast suggested at the beginning of the war with Spain, to be built and presented to the government from ten-cent contributions from school children. A sum approximating two thousand dollars had been gathered when the idea was abandoned, and as the names of contributors were not available, the custodian, being an honest youth, found his position an embarrassing one. We have had endless collections in this State. Every man who came hither in the days of the gold excitement seems to imagine that, having failed to fill his pockets, he is entitled to public relief. Any one even remotely connected with educational matters has a lien on teachers' salaries and pupils' pocket money. There is really no more reason for erecting monuments and placing tablets, or providing annuities for unsuccessful authors and teachers who have proved themselves failures, than there is in glorifying the village cobbler or tailor.

The Leisure Craze

"Certainly Man Needs All the Time He Can Save" is the magniloquent title which the Examiner made use of in setting forth the work of mercy accomplished by the Illinois Teachers' Association in adopting phonetic spelling. Incidentally we were told of the advantages which will ensue when the "useless gh's' ph's and ou's" have been done away with. "Saving time" is as much of a fad as popular education, but let us ask what use is to be made of the saved time. Some bright mind once defined economy as going without what you need now so you can buy what you don't need by and by, and to the majority of people that is precisely what it means. We have labor-saving contrivances, shorter hours of work, quicker means of transportation, and short cuts of all kinds, but we have no leisure. "I haven't time" is the universal excuse, but the hours, days and weeks are as long now as they were at any period of the earth's existence. The valuable time which the Examiner deplores as wasted in writing superfluous gh's, ph's and ou's would not amount to two hours in a month, even if one were constantly employed in writing. What will be done with the salvage? More golf, gossip or football? The modern child has entirely too much idle time on his hands now. Everything must be made easy and all the stones lifted from his path. The "royal road" has been made, but unfortunately, it does not lead to learning. The butterflies and flowers along the way beguile the traveler, and the day ends and finds him nowhere. When six weeks' schooling in the winter constituted all the formal education which the average boy was treated to in the course of a year, and even that much came to an end by the time he was twelve or fourteen, those six weeks meant hard work, and the discipline of it stayed with him. There was no talk then of "saving time" by discarding the superfluous ph's, gh's and ou's, and not to be able to spell correctly words that were never met with outside of the spelling book was a disgrace not only to the pupil but to his family and collateral relatives. It was not a case, in those times, of fitting an education to a child, but fitting the child to the education. Either he accomplished his work or he failed. Abraham Lincoln, James Garfield, and scores more of those who rose to first rank later in life, had not the opportunities which are enjoyed today by the pauper child of seven. But they had energy, ambition, and "stick-to-itiveness" which carried them through. After a hard day's work which was not limited to eight hours, nor at times, to twice eight hours, they got out their spelling books and their arithmetics, and worked not as a special favor to their parents and teachers, but because they wanted an education. We have now twice as many legal holidays, to say nothing of the shorter working hours, as there were at the beginning of the last century, and yet, every now and then, there goes up a petition for another day which the people may enjoy as a time of rest. Rest is the last thing they take and the last thing they want. Leisure is one thing, idleness another. There is a lot of nonsense preached and written about the necessity for cultivating minds, but the essential point is the possession of a mind to cultivate. In the vast majority of cases the days spent away from the counter and the work-bench are wasted. Any one who has seen the crowds trooping home from a Memorial Day picnic or a holiday celebration cannot but question whether, in addition to the loss of a day's wages, the day has not been worse than wasted. It is a theory, no doubt flattering to the average mind, that all that is needed to develop genius is plenty of time and schooling. There is an ancient and moss-covered tale of a newly rich father who sent his daughter to a high-priced boarding school with the idea of having her educated and polished off in short order. After doing her best for the damsel, the proprietress of the institution informed papa that it was impossible to teach his daughter anything because she lacked the capacity for learning, whereupon he whipped out a well-filled pocket book and professed to be ready to buy her the best capacity that money could purchase. It is really no worse than the idea that to pour liquid essence of education over and around wooden heads will eventually end in making them receptive, if only by the process of soaking it in. Making work easy will not accomplish anything. Making pupils work and work hard is their only salvation. Let the drones and idlers drop out of classes as they did in earlier days. The process of making things easy has almost reached the stage of the economical farmer who fed his horse on sawdust and shavings, and just as he had perfected his experiment, the ungrateful animal died of starvation.

The Crocker Scandal

So quietly was the suit of Henry J. Crocker against his cousin William H. Crocker dismissed, a short time ago, that I knew nothing about it until I learned this week that the plaintiff was rejoicing over his success in forcing his relative to disgorge. It was surprising to learn that William H. Crocker was content to have the complaint dismissed without a vindication, for the charges against him were of a very grave character. Mr. William H. Crocker is a prominent club man of this city, and his social position is such as to justify the presumption that he is an honorable man. Indeed the William H. Crockers are regarded as of the creme de la creme, and yet according to the complaint of Cousin Henry, which was dismissed without a trial, the defendant in the case defrauded him out of eighty odd thousand dollars in a manner as coarse and rude as that which characterizes the graft of the common confidence operator.

Indifference in Club Circles

Though there is no club in San Francisco which excludes men from membership on the ground that they are not gentlemen, nevertheless there are several that purport to be clubs for gentlemen only, and one should think that when members become involved in such an unsavory mess as that of the Crocker suit cognizance would be taken of their conduct. Perhaps if the line were drawn too strictly, and all the crooks, boors and bounders were banished from clubdom, all of our fashionable clubs would die of inanition. However, when a man joins a so-called gentleman's club he should have some protection from bunko men, card sharps and promoters. And at any rate there should be some pretense of morality. Now in the case of the Crockers it appears from the complaint that the defendant swindled his own cousin, and yet the scandal has been hushed up.

Poniatowski Involved

It may be argued that the complaint was false, but if so then Henry J. Crocker is a scoundrel for having sworn to scandalous charges against Will Crocker. And though Henry J. Crocker isn't quite so aristocratic as his cousin yet he belongs to a good set and has the entree to several fashionable clubs. Again, if the charges were false then the defendant should have demanded vindication in open court. The story of the complaint involves Prince Poniatowski as well as brother-in-law Will Crocker, and the Prince is one of our honorable and fashionable clubmen besides being a foreigner of distinguished lineage. Incidentally it should be mentioned that the scandal involves one of our big financial institutions, the Crocker-Woolworth bank, which was engaged some time ago in backing a race-track enterprise. This was an unusual business for a banking institution to be engaged in but this city has some unusual banks that exist under false pretenses, omitting as they do the triple ball emblem over the door.

Story of the Alleged Swindle

Now for the story of the complaint. It was alleged by Henry J. Crocker that in June, 1900, he was the owner of stock in the Pacific Coast Jockey Club and in the Western Turf Association valued at about eighty-nine thousand dollars. At that time he enjoyed close and intimate business relations with his cousin and had confidence in him. Indeed he placed "complete reliance in the honesty and integrity of the defendant and in his good faith and was accustomed to rely implicitly upon all statements and representations made to him by the defendant." With those few prefatory remarks Henry J. Crocker proceeded to set forth the details of a conspiracy between Will Crocker and Prince Poniatowski to defraud him (Henry Crocker) out of his stock. But in justice to them it should be said he made his assertions on "information and belief." In pursuance of that conspiracy, so the complaint recites, Will Crocker induced Henry J. Crocker to surrender to him all his race-track stock for the purpose of sale, representing that he intended to dispose of his own turf stock, and that as he was going abroad he purposed putting it in the hands of G. W. Kline and Wellington Gregg with instructions to sell. Moreover the plaintiff was induced to give Kline and Gregg his power-of-attorney to dispose of the stock, being unaware at the time of a previous agreement between the defendant and Prince Poniatowski whereby the latter was to purchase the stock. He supposed that Kline and Gregg, who are employes of the Crocker-Woolworth bank, of which Will Crocker is president, were instructed to sell only for an adequate consideration.

How the Stock Vanished

It was on August sixth, 1900, that Henry Crocker, in the role of the "good thing" surrendered his stock, and two days later he was notified by Kline that Prince Poniatowski had made an offer for the purchase of the stock. Poniatowski's proposition was made in a letter in which he said that Will Crocker had agreed to accept any offer which he would make. Henry Crocker told Kline that he wouldn't accept Poniatowski's offer because the price was too low, and he submitted a counter-proposition to be made to the Prince, but later on the plaintiff was notified by Kline and Gregg that they had accepted the Poniatowski offer. It was several months later that Henry Crocker learned that Poniatowski "was not a bona fide purchaser" and then he demanded back his stock. In this connection he alleged on information and belief that in all of the transactions Kline and Gregg were acting "solely as the servants and agents of the defendant; also that the agreement of Poniatowski with Will Crocker to purchase the latter's stock with that of his cousin was simulated "and made for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff." He furthermore charged on information and belief that "it was agreed between the defendant and the said Poniatowski that the said Poniatowski should pretend to purchase the shares of stock aforesaid, but nevertheless at all times hold them for the benefit of the defendant, and that the defendant should be the real purchaser." Indeed he alleges that the stock was actually transferred to Will Crocker and that he received the benefit of the deal.

What Henry Got

Surely there could be no clearer story of a swindle told than that which Henry J. Crocker recited in his complaint. All that Henry Crocker received for his stock was seventy-five hundred and fifty dollars in cash and one hundred and eight second mortgage railroad bonds which had no market value, and which he believes were worth about fifty-four hundred dollars. He valued his stock at eighty-nine thousand four hundred and seventy-five dollars, and that was the amount sued for. What he received by way of compromise I do not know but the impression given his friends is that Will Crocker was so anxious to shut off the scandal that he settled in full.

Greenway's Sway Undisputed

Baron von Horst was very much perturbed by the suggestion in these columns that he contemplated dividing the honors with Mr. Ned Greenway in the role of social leader. The gentleman with the title called on me to explain his connection with the Bachelors' ball and incidentally to dissipate any misgivings I might have regarding his motives. He proved a very unassuming chap, and in manner was quite an improvement on the type of baron that has thrived in this part of the country. He began by assuring me that there was only one Greenway and that he (Von Horst) had no intention of trespassing on the social preserves of the distinguished leader of our somewhat heterogeneous elite. The Bachelors' ball, he said, was given merely to vindicate the young men of local society who have been charged with being cheerful receivers and reluctant givers. A young woman having remarked to him that reciprocity was not one of the virtues of the San Francisco male, he felt that she entertained views of a libelous character. He told her there was some mistake, and resolved to prove it. Hence the ball.

'Twas But a Cheap Success

So instead of being execrated Baron von Horst should be hailed as the champion of the local bachelor. He proved that San Francisco's young men are capable of "loosening up" at least once in a lifetime. It is true that he had to give a cheap ball, and that the committee had to do some lively skirmishing, but nevertheless it was a success. An effort was made to have the wine donated for advertising purposes, one business house having been approached on the subject, but after all it was a success. And now the energetic baron having pointed the way, his only hope is that the Bachelors' ball is a function that has come to stay. He thinks it has and he wouldn't be surprised if Mr. Greenway imparted his own prestige to the next one.

Mrs. Martin Didn't Vote

Since writing the foregoing paragraphs I have been more than ever impressed with the amiable nature of Baron von Horst. He called me up on the 'phone to tell me of one or two inaccuracies in my statements of last week. He was particularly anxious for me to retract the statement that Mrs. Eleanor Martin had voted for white seal wine. He assured me on his word of honor as a German nobleman that she took no part in the wine discussion. "The committee," he said, "decided that as Greenway had done so much to make the ball a frost his wine should be barred, and that was all there was to it." He told me there was no truth in the report that he was married to a rich American or that he confined his attentions to one girl at the ball. "But that's all good fun," said the amiable baron, "and I don't mind."

Is He a Baron?

But in addition to all that I have heard about the Bachelors' ball and the baron, comes the additional news that he isn't a baron. First it was discovered that he wasn't a bachelor and now it is said that he isn't even a baron. Indeed I am assured that in the first place, and among other shortcomings, he lacks the most essential element of the make-up of a German nobleman, for he isn't even a German, which circumstance accounts for the absence of accent, for he speaks English as it is spoken in the far West. The story as it comes to me is that the so-called baron is plain Horst, the brother of Clem Horst the well-known hop grower, and he is at present involved in a lawsuit with the latter. He annexed the "baron" on a trip abroad, but whether he discovered that the title belonged to his family or he merely ran across a title that had been left without a claimant, I do not know. However, I verified the fact of his relationship to Clem Horst, the plain, untitled American citizen, by asking the latter if he knew the baron.

"Yes, he's my brother," was the reply, "but I don't care to discuss his affairs."

Bavardian Gems

The Chaperon of the Examiner need not lay the flattering unction to her soul that she is the only gush writer in San Francisco who has succeeded in out-Jamesing Henry James with her cryptic English. Madame La Bavarde is equally as clever in defying interpretation. Here is a gem from her pen, culled from her account of the dance given by La Jeunesse, with her own copyrighted punctuation:

> To Mrs. William McClung the patrons one and all accord the credit of this laborious, but most artistic, task, and if it be so a most profound vote of thanks should be accorded her, and not only for her share of the work—in this line—but in each one, for her watchfulness is all pervading.

I should hate to impute to Madame La Bavarde a desire to afflict her readers with paresis, but not without sinister design could she expect them to attempt an analysis of that sentence. Madame La Bavarde has such a knack for involving sentences to the bewilderment of her readers that she dashes them off at the rate of three or four in a paragraph. Here is another:

> There was an unusual number of visitors in the gallery, which, by the way, was used as the bachelors did last Monday, as was also the platform, with a correspondingly effective result.

Somebody has said that we talk and write to make known our thoughts, but it is evident that Madame La Bavarde has no such purpose in view when she scribbles. She is skilled in the art of arranging words in masterly disorder to cloud her meaning.

A Bit of Plagiarism

Plagiarism is also one of the accomplishments of Madame La Bavarde. A few weeks ago her distinguished contemporary in the gush field of journalism, Dorothy Pepys, wrote that Mrs. McClung looked as young as her daughters. In Madame La Bavarde's account of the Jeunesse dance appeared the statement that Mrs. McClung, "Gowned in soft white last evening, really looked like the older sisters of Miss Alma and Miss Gladys, and as such would a stranger have judged her." As Mrs. McClung doesn't look a day under forty-five the statements of Madame La Bavarde and Dorothy Pepys were decidedly uncomplimentary. It is to be hoped that they were not inspired by malice. Miss Alma and Miss Gladys are charming young girls and it would be cruel to wilfully intimate that they looked as old and matronly as their mother.

A Chance for Connoisseurs

Many society people have visited the residence of the late Alfred Bouvier, in Lyon street, during the week, to inspect an interesting collection of bric-a-brac and to make purchases, for the various articles are being sold. Mrs. Cheseborough, Mrs. William F. Herrin, Mrs. Walsh and Miss McKinstry are acting as a committee in the interest of Mrs. Bouvier, to assist in disposing of the collection which includes some rare glassware, rugs, tapestries and ornaments. Mrs. Hearst visited the Bouvier residence and spent about a thousand dollars. A set of armor and a brass lamp caught her fancy. Harry Tevis bought some rare rugs. Mrs. Tom Bishop spent much time inspecting the glassware which no doubt appealed to her fancy because of the gold initial "B" ornamenting each article, but when last heard from she was still deliberating. Mrs. Bouvier has a valuable collection of autographs of distinguished people and also of the original drawings of Tom Nast's newspaper cartoons, all of which are to be sold. Some society people have thought of interesting Mr. James D. Phelan in the cartoons, the idea being that he might care to donate them to some public institution. Mr. Phelan is our richest bachelor, having an income of over one thousand dollars a day, and he could spend a hundred or so of it in a public spirited way without incurring the risk of landing in the poor-house.

A Candid Artist

Though Artist Keith was not mentioned among the American Masters of Painting, he was not seriously grieved by the oversight. Mr. Keith knows that he is great and isn't offended at those who are unaware of the fact. Indeed he is perfectly frank on the subject of his own genius. He disdains to be coy about it. Not long ago a clever woman visited him in his studio, and during a conversation he related that on his last trip to Europe he met an old friend whom he hadn't seen since his school days, and who had become famous.

"Did he know that you had become famous, too?" asked the clever woman.

"Oh, yes," was the reply.

"But how did he know if he hadn't seen you since your school days?"

"Oh, I told him."

It Didn't Match

At the last Bohemian Club art exhibition, a sunset by Thaddeus Welch was purchased by a railroad man of Oakland, who gave two hundred and fifty dollars for it. He sent it home, and was confident his wife would be pleased at the addition to their art treasures. But when he went home to dinner his wife said:

"What did you buy that big picture for?"

"What? Oh, that is a fine picture—one of Welch's best."

He told her its price.

"But fancy," she said, "our having that in our drawing-room! We'll have to get everything new now, for it doesn't correspond with anything in the house."

Two Lucky Artists

Two of the most valuable pictures at the last Bohemian Club exhibition found purchasers. One was by Peters and was one of the best things he has done. To get anything from the Peters brush these days means an expenditure of from one to three thousand dollars. Charles Josselyn was the purchaser. Giuseppe Cadenasso sold one of his paintings to Louis Sloss and received a handsome check for it.

Schmitz Follows Phelan

Mayor Schmitz made his appearance at a big labor meeting the other night, and he was given the artificial eye. He wasn't asked to make a speech or even to take a seat on the platform. In a crowded hall he sat alone, and after an hour of the solitude where none intrudes he quietly stole away without the music of a faint "good-night" in his ear. History is repeating itself. How like the fate of Jimmy Phelan is that for which Eugene Schmitz appears to be destined. When Schmitz was elected I pointed the moral of his predecessor's downfall, but instead of absorbing it he proceeded to do just as the misguided millionaire had done—organize a political machine of his own. Never desert your own push, is a maxim that the wise follow and that fools ignore. Even when it came to appointing a committee to arrange for a reception to Roosevelt, Mayor Schmitz couldn't refrain from extending the glad-hand in high places and ignoring his friends in the labor unions. It may interest him to know that the story of his downfall has traveled afar. The Mirror, a widely read and brilliantly edited weekly of St. Louis, said in a recent issue, "Judging by current reports, Schmitz must not have a single friend left in the great city of San Francisco, if exception be made to his numerous appointees to office." That exception need not be made.

Ruef Promoting Legislation

Last week the Mayor's factotum, Abe Ruef, went to Sacramento and persuaded two pliant legislators to introduce in both Houses a measure providing for the bestowal on the appointing power in all cities the right of removal of appointive officers without having the action questioned by the courts. The purpose of the proposed legislation is to enable Mayor Schmitz to get rid of his old friend Michael Casey, and also of Police Commissioner Hutton. The bill struck a snag in the Senate, where it has been held up.

Casey at the Bat

The unobservant citizen who jumps at the conclusion that Michael Casey, President of the Boards of Health and Public Works, intellectually considered, is anybody's Aunt Jane, falls into grievous error. In his dual role, Mr. Casey accompanied Health Officer O'Brien and Drs. Glennon, Gardner, Blue and Currie to the office of the Six Companies last week to see about certain sanitary work in Chinatown. The secretary, an oily Cantonese, who was doing the honors, produced a box of cigars—unmistakably non-union and intensely black. Glennon and Blue each helped himself, and after an instant's hesitation, Casey followed suit. Dr. Matthew Gardner's turn came next. "As I don't belong to any union, I can smoke this cigar with a clean conscience," said he, eyeing the Labor Exarch, and selecting the fattest and blackest in the box. "You're mistaken there, Doctor," came the retort, quick as a flash, "your union 's a mighty strong one, but its operations are always accompanied by bloodshed and frequently by sudden death. Aren't you a member in good standing of the Medical Trust?"

His Prescription

Later, the doctors were discussing the appointment of one of their number to serve in Chinatown and Casey was an attentive listener. "If I might prescribe in this emergency," said he, "I'd recommend to give the Chinamen Currie for a steady diet," and Dr. Currie was accordingly selected for the work. As Dr. Currie has had two years' experience in Chinatown a better selection could scarcely have been made.

The Grime of Chinatown

If the police are going to allow the highbinders to die off of the murder habit, the Police Commissioners, at least, do not propose to let the tongs commit suicide through slow asphyxiation. There is a cubic air ordinance in the Charter which provides that all sleeping rooms shall be of a certain size and shall be increased in proportion to the number of persons occupying them. This rule is intended, of course, to reach the tenement house districts, and especially Chinatown. But the Heathen Chinee sees otherwise. He has gotten into the habit of defying the city's ordinances and having the police after him. He wants dirt, moral and physical, and he won't be happy till he gets it. He sees fit to prefer fœtid air in his boudoir and it will take more than a few fines to discourage him in his desires. Ho Yow himself used to recognize the surpassing dirt of Chinatown, but it was ever his genial habit to make a quiet mock of the city's feeble attempts to clean things up. On one occasion a self-appointed sanitarian went around to the witty consul and inquired, "Don't you notice, Mr. Ho, that Chinatown is in a very filthy condition?" Ho Yow looked his visitor with an expression of surprised interest on his sallow features. "Don't you notice," he said at length, "that San Francisco is on a strip of land almost surrounded by water?" The sanitarian departed wondering whether the Oriental cross-question was intended to exemplify the obviousness of Chinatown's dirt or merely to suggest that the quarter might easily be given a wholesale bath.

A Pagan's Philosophy

The other night, after a raid on a Dupont street lodging house and the arrest of some twenty-five coolies, the keeper of the place came into the city prison with the rest of the bunch. He was a fat little rag-time Chinaman who kept all the force on the titter. Concerning the right and wrong of the cubic air ordinance he delivered himself as follows: "Melican man he dam smalt. He thinkee Chinaman he cash thing, he catchee him allight. You hire pleeceman go up Chinatown—pleeceman he say, 'I no catchum Chinaman I no catchum pay'—you sabe? Allight. He go down to Chinatown early molning, he see Chinaman, he say, 'Wha fo you git up so ully? You highbinder—I sabe you!' Allight. He fetchum patrol. Stirring the Troubled Waters

It is a healthy condition of affairs that has brought to light the bribery and corruption lurking in the suspicious waters surrounding the Pilot Commission. No one doubted that criminating evidence was there but the trick was, and has been for years, to get it in such shape as to make it stick, and Pilot Commissioner Alexander, once assured that his own skin was safe if he confessed, did the trick. Now let us hope something will be done to clean out this foul nest and reframe the laws so that the port of San Francisco will never again be squeezed and handicapped as it has under such arrogant ring rule. Under the sway of this ring San Francisco has carried the highest port charges in the world—except one insignificant hole in the coast rarely visited by ships of even ordinary rating. On account of these extravagant charges our bay has been tabooed for years in the shipping world and vessels visited here only when they had to. Time and again efforts have been made to correct these abuses but without avail—the ring, backed by the fund it accumulated for offense and defense, was always able to overcome all such aggressive moves. Up to date no inquiry has been able to pass that sinking fund buoy.

Source of the Pilots' Power

Scraped down to the hull of cold fact, the three Pilot Commissioners have practically no control over the twenty pilots. Their one great, grand and glorious act seems to begin and end in appointing the applicant. How that is done the recent investigation showed. It is true that now and then when charges of gross negligence are preferred against a pilot the Commission gravely gathers and holds a powwow over his alleged remissness, but it never dares to show any displeasure beyond gently censuring the culprit. Pilot Jordan, who tried to bring in the ill-fated steamer Rio Janeiro, probably sniggered in his sleeve when he was ostentatiously summoned by the Pilot Commissioners to appear and show cause why his license should not be revoked. The reason for this flagrant condition of affairs is not far to seek: the pilots, united, and the men interested in their funds, are infinitely stronger than the three Commissioners. The source of this strength is the big fees the pilots receive under the present system and those fees are so manipulated as to do the most good for the pilot ring.

Life Buoy of the Ring

The twenty pilots are divided for sea service in such fashion that there are some five men on each cruise. On an average these detailed men are out about eight days. If they're lucky they may be back in port within a few days. Working under such shifts each man is on sea duty about once a month for several days, cruising in a pilot boat where he has better fare and quarters than most men who own private yachts. For this service he receives a munificent divvy ranging from six hundred to eight hundred dollars a month. This divvy is rolled up from the high port charges which the shippers of the world have protested against so long. It is behind such earnings as these that the pilot ring is fortified. One tiny stream from it is allowed to percolate in the direction of the three Pilot Commissioners, and it sustains their life—outside of what they seem to get from applicants, according to the confession of Commissioner Alexander.

Pay of Pilot Commission

Every month the pilots set aside five per cent of their earnings for the Pilot Commission. The Commission is supposed to use this sum to defray office rent, pay the secretary his one hundred dollars a month salary and other incidental expenses. Whatever is left of this five per cent is solemnly divided up among the three Commissioners. This amount usually yields each one of them from one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and seventy-five dollars a month. Investigators who have checked along the line in this way have been able, after a fashion, to get a glimmer of the morganized good thing run by these twenty jolly tars and their inside friends. No man, not even the three Pilot Commissioners, ever got a glimpse of their private books. The Pilot Commissioners don't really know whether they receive one or five per cent each month from the pilots. Their secretary simply brings around a sack of coin, says it's five per cent, gets a receipt for it and the Commissioners are glad enough to meekly take it without asking any impertinent questions. Legislatures, courts and grand juries have made frequent efforts to see the books and get at the inside workings of this water front ring, but always without success. Now at last, through Commissioner Alexander's confession, there seems a chance to free San Francisco from this incubus.

That Rosenstirn Feast

When the "good old summer" time shall have passed in which our vanities run more to perfect organs and better health, when politeness protects a lady from hearing a discussion of her afflictions, or a suggestion of yours, when, in short, dinners are given to gratify the head and stomach, rather than to exploit eccentricities or novel fads, then come, all ye hosts and hostesses, for I shall be prepared to offer suggestions for novel dinners. That grewsome Rosenstirn dinner was one of the most shocking functions that was ever pulled off in this city. It is to be hoped that "Appendix dinners" are not going to carry the strongholds of society. If the fad is to run its course perhaps the next fool dinner will be for one-legged-people, or for ladies who have lost their tumors.

She is Clever and Eccentric

Miss Emily Rosenstirn, the now famous hostess of the appendix dinner, is known as the eccentric daughter of Dr. Rosenstirn. She has the satisfaction of knowing that she accomplished her purpose of achieving notoriety, which, judging from the columns of the dailies, is now the motif of all social functions. Miss Rosenstirn is said to be the most brilliant of our society girls. She is tall, dashing and always beautifully gowned. She is a graduate of the University of California, and is noted for her ability to discuss intelligently a variety of subjects. She is an accomplished linguist and has done some translations from the German. After her graduation she spent two years abroad with her mother. Her father regards her as the most wonderful of girls and chums with her. She calls him Julius and he smokes cigarettes to keep her company. The Rosenstirn boys are appendixless, and they are also twins. Both were in love with Doris Jeffreys simultaneously, but she didn't encourage them.

"I see at the appendicitis dinner among the guests were a number who had been operated upon by the hostess's father for that ailment."

"Yes. I wonder if this was intended as an advertisement for the doctor without offending the ethics of the profession?"

San Rafael's Newest Sensation

San Rafael is in a flutter of expectancy at the possibility of the sale of Baron von Schroeder's hotel to the J. Barton Keyes' syndicate, and even Dr. Arthur Crosby's crusade against automobiles and automobiling shrinks into insignificance in comparison with this late sensation. The spectacular Mr. Keyes has been very much in evidence upon the hotel veranda of late and he has secured from the Baron an extension of his option for sixty days. Keyes belongs to a well-known Baltimore family and has enjoyed a varied career, ringing every change from footlight favorite to boniface of a swell Washington hotel.

Preparing to Somersault

Baroness von Schroeder has been taken under the wing of Mrs. Eleanor Martin, and it is rumored that there will be considerable snubbing in society this summer by way of retaliation. When the frisky baron was fighting for vindication in a San Rafael court he was deserted by many of his erstwhile friends, who were too cowardly to stand by him. Now that the popular baroness is back and is likely to figure as the motif of some big affairs, those that cold-shouldered the baron are getting ready to do a little somersaulting. The baroness is visiting us temporarily. She prefers her husband's country as a place of residence while the baron appears to prefer hers, though it is said that when the Hotel Rafael property is sold he will go to Germany, with what remains of the Donahue millions, to reside permanently.

The Stork in Railroad Circles

The ciconia alba was given a cordial greeting at the home of the E. O. McCormicks at 2015 Broadway, on Friday of last week. The visit of the attenuated bird was the great event of the season, and was followed by great rejoicing and the felicitations of the numerous friends of the popular railroad man and his family. A little boy of the proverbial "bouncing" variety was the result of the visit. It is reported that when Mr. McCormick appeared on the scene his son extended a glad-hand in a graceful way that was at once recognized as an hereditary accomplishment.

Cupid May Unite Them

The Valentine dinner that Helen Dean gave to the Misses King has been taken by many as significant of the way the land lies between the two families. They have shown each other all sorts of attentions this season and according to the matchmakers they give fair promise of some day being united by a closer tie than friendship. Mr. King has been so devoted to Helen Dean all season that few of the other eligibles have had a fair inning with her. He has taken her in at almost every big dinner party and has usurped as many dances as the law allows. There is no fear of Miss Dean's leaving the ranks of the buds this season, however, for her parents would be sure to oppose anything like that so early in her social career. But Cupid needn't stay under cover for all that, nor did he at the Valentine dinner. Mr. King's sisters are college girls and have what is dubbed the "dizzy r" by one of the wags of society. Both girls roll that unfortunate consonant in a surprising fashion. At the coming-out dinner which Mrs. King gave her daughters, Genevieve made a little speech remarkable for the ver-r-y pronounced rolling of the r's but since then their friends have had their ears somewhat attuned to the "dizzy r," for they roll it in season and out.

Be good and you won't be happy. It would make life too dull.

Berkeley Journalism

Berkeley furnishes fresh ammunition each day for Elizabeth Knight Tompkins's locker. Miss Tompkins is resting in Southern California but no doubt she has read the articles in the college papers that attempt to take the sting out of her strictures. Most college editors are so busy giving advice as to how the great newspapers of the country should be run that they have no time to devote to the beam in the academical eye. And the University of California is no exception to the rule. The college papers are a disgrace to an institution that is supposed to be devoted to higher education. The editorials in regard to Miss Tompkins's articles were not only childish but written in a style that would reflect discredit on a boy in the Fourth Reader. They furnish a strong commentary on the justice of most of her criticisms.

The Elizabethan Drama at Stanford

The California institutions of higher learning are certainly doing their best to elevate the stage by the presentation of everything classic, from the Passion Play to the Elizabethan drama. The last presentation of Clay M. Greene's adaptation of the passion play at Santa Clara college was so successful that the faculty and students there are preparing an even more elaborate production there this year. Stanford's presentation of the Oedipus last year was the first Greek tragedy the West has ever seen, and the production was on a grander scale than has been common in Eastern colleges. This year the Stanford thespians have taken a jump into Elizabethan drama and are preparing a cast for Beaumont and Fletcher's "Knight of the Burning Pestle." This comedy will be staged with even more studied realism than the Oedipus, for the audience as well as the actors will be made to conform with the manners of Good Queen Bess. In accordance with mediæval traditions the female parts will be taken by young men and the actors will be accorded the privilege of criticising the show at proper dramatic intervals. It is not yet decided whether the audience will be compelled to appear in Elizabethan costumes, but if this is followed out the entertainment will be a grand pageant which the State will long remember.

One of the most complex problems of life is presented to a man when holding an umbrella over the head of his wife. To hold the umbrella in such a way that it shall keep off the rain without ruining his wife's hat is the problem that no man has yet solved. By the time he gets the umbrella high enough the rain is sure to be running down the inside of the sleeve of his coat.

A Bachelor Curate Preferred

The Rev. Clifton Macon has decided not to wait for a charge of his own. His marriage with Miss Janet Bruce will take place after Lent. The Rev. Dr. Clampett, it is said, stood in the way of the union because of his objection to having a married curate. This objection would suggest a similarity in the respective policies of church and stage, were it not for the probability that the reasoning which influences Dr. Clampett is not the same as that which prompts theatrical managers to discourage matrimony among mummers. Dr. Clampett believes, no doubt, that a bachelor curate has more time to devote to church work than a married one, whereas the theatrical manager is sensible of the fact that an unencumbered leading lady has greater drawing powers than a married one.

Grandma Gertrude

Mrs. Atherton is once more a grandmother, for the stork has again visited the home of the Albert Russells. Mrs. Russell is very devoted to her offspring, and her ambition is to be a good mother to a large family of children. She inherited no literary talent.

When Dr. Rader Lectured

Some of the ladies who listened to Dr. Rader's lecture before the Daughters of California Pioneers on Monday afternoon carried away the idea that the reverend gentleman was quizzing them. Dr. Rader gave the impression from his discourse that he thought clubwomen were not home-keepers, that intellectuality was out of place in a wife. Perhaps he did not mean to convey that impression, but some of the Daughters thought he did, and it gave them a topic of brisk discussion after the lecture was over and punch was being served. Another thing that Dr. Rader objected to in women was overmuch "personality." Some of the ladies said he did not mean personality but individuality, and they did not see how one could have too much of that. But as the discourse gave an impetus to thought among the Daughters it may be considered a success.

Love at First Sight

Apropos the engagement of Miss Nichols, daughter of Bishop Nichols, and Lieutenant Lansdale, it is said to have been a case of love at first sight. The lieutenant first saw his fiancee in church on her first visit to Honolulu. Indicating her to a friend he remarked, "I am going to meet that girl as soon as possible and marry her if she will have me." She undoubtedly would, for the announcement of their engagement soon followed.

To Emulate His Ma

I hear that Vivian Burnett ("Little Lord Fauntleroy"), who visited San Francisco some months ago, is reported to be at work on a novel which he expects to bring out in the near future. It is refreshing to note that Fauntleroy is actually going to make a try at the trick which his distinguished mamma so successfully turned. Fauntleroy still suggests the nice little boy in the book, but he is, alas! somewhat bald and the mention of his nickname sets him into spasms of rage. He takes upon himself all the airs and graces of the literary man, and it is said that in Washington some years ago he fitted himself up a studio in the top floor of a high building and presided over it in great state. No one of his friends could ever find out what on earth he ever did with that studio except have afternoons at home, at which Burnett pere poured tea while Burnett fils received. Burnett, however, is quick to resent any hint of effeminacy which his mother's book may have attached to him. It is told of him that when he first came to this city he was met by a clubman who asked him, with some misgivings, if he would object to coming down to the bar and having a drink. Fauntleroy accepted, went down to the bar and ordered a glass of Scotch and soda which he drank saying, "Here goes another nail in little Vivian's liver."

Mr. and Mrs. Fremont Older are located for the remainder of the winter at the corner of Clay and Leavenworth streets, in a cosy flat. They are going to take a trip abroad in April.

Too Much Stevenson

Sidney Colvin has "been persuaded" to write the biography of Robert Louis Stevenson, after all. It will be remembered that it was Colvin who was first selected for the work, but as he thought he could not spare the time, he handed it over to Robert Balfour. Now, one would like to ask who did the persuading, and what arguments were used. Considering that every one who ever saw Stevenson has written his impressions, and every one who ever spoke to him or heard him speak has recorded his conversation, and every member of his family has jointly or individually, and generally, turned every possible incident into a magazine article, and every one who has ever been within a thousand miles of Samoa has made Tincture of Stevenson out of his experience, what is there that is new, or what of the old needs more elucidation? We have seen the photographs of San Francisco streets used to illustrate magazine articles because Stevenson trod them and if there is a newspaper or magazine in the United States, with the shadow of a pretension to literature or art, which does not keep a cut of the Stevenson memorial fountain ready to be inserted at a moment's notice and on the ghost of an excuse, one would like to know its title and habitat. And withal, Stevenson was no great miracle. He was a conscientious and painstaking writer who can be read with both pleasure and profit, but he was not a god. And, moreover, after all the biographies and lives, and letters and appreciations, and monographs and recollections have been written, it is just as well to remember that we have Stevenson's own works ready at hand, if any one wants them, and we can all read them and form our own opinion. One result of all this adulation and adoration will be to put Stevenson's books among the classics, which is to say, amongst the books that every one praises and no one reads.

No Match Made

The rumor was circulated last week that there was likelihood of an engagement between Miss Gertrude Josselyn and Gerald Rathbone. I have been authorized to state that there is no prospect of the engagement. Young Rathbone, by the way, is not the son of Major Rathbone. He is a nephew of that gentleman. His father was the Lieutenant Rathbone who was the first person to enter the box occupied by President Lincoln immediately after the latter was wounded. Gerald Rathbone and Miss Josselyn have long been friends, and whatever may have been the intentions of the young man, the assurance comes from the Josselyn home that there is no likelihood of a match involving Miss Gertrude. Mr. Rathbone, by the way, is one of the most popular young men in commercial circles.

How often a woman asks herself, What can I do to retain my youthful appearance without fear of criticism and injury to myself? For while all ladies wish to look beautiful, no woman can afford to use artificial means that would in any way detract from her refinement, as is the case by the use of powders and lotions which can not be put upon the face without being noticed.

The Mascagni Concert

Tuesday was a great day for the musical cult of San Francisco. The Alhambra was thronged with people who flatter themselves that they are on familiar terms with the Italian school of music. Artists and society women were there, and every musician whose engagements permitted. Zech, who returned from Los Angeles in time to be present, had his score-book open during the Tschaikowsky symphony, and expressed his satisfaction at Mascagni's reading in sincere applause. Cadenasso approved of the "Traumerei" and the suite. Cantor Stark was pleased with the whole program. In one of the boxes was Zelie de Lussan, and her accompanist. The great singer gave every evidence of being delighted, and Mascagni appeared to be pleased at her presence. What a great treat we would have if the singer and Mascagni joined forces in this city! Perhaps the Tivoli could persuade her to do the "Zanetto" role when Mascagni takes up the Steindorff baton. A whisper went round at the close of the concert that there was a possibility of Mascagni being induced to lead a permanent symphony orchestra here. It is known that he is in no hurry to cross the ocean again. He was wofully seasick on the trip from Europe to New York.

Where Were the Italians?

The big orchestra is conspicuously free from Italian musicians, a circumstance that occasioned remark. Its concert master is Herr Stark, and the German element preponderates. It is true young Marino, once locally thought to be another Mascagni, plays first violin by Stark's side, but the absence of Giulio Minetti, one of our most cultured violinists, and the concert master of the Steindorff symphony concerts, was noted. It seemed an odd circumstance that Minetti, being an Italian, was not of the orchestra. He was in the audience, however, and being questioned on the subject said that he did not play under Mascagni because he was not asked to do so. The same reason doubtless applies to the other Italian musicians here who were not in the organization.

An Ex-Californienne's Experience

Miss Mabel Custer, a Californian girl who now lives in Philadelphia, where she is contralto in a church choir, was a member of Mascagni's unfortunate opera company. Miss Custer was interviewed the other day on her one operatic experience and she told some amusing incidents of the tour. French was the language used by the company to make the several foreign elements intelligible, but when anyone was angry he or she called the other "porco," meaning "pig," or "storko porco," a particularly unpleasant pig. The storm of "storko porcos," she said, on some occasions was terrific. "In spite of everything, however,"she said, "the force of genius in Mascagni rose so triumphant that there was not one of that impressionable, unpractical, tumultuous company that failed to bow before it. A manager might call him 'Porco' in full assembly, and he respond by 'Storko porco,' but when the opera was on, and he in command, all was forgotten. He swayed us by the turn of his hand, and waves of music responded to his bidding. Time after time instance was given of Mascagni's marvelous power to sway the soul." On one occasion in Providence only the principals and six members of the chorus were available for the performance, and there was no suitable scenery to be had. But Mascagni cried "We shall do it," and by the very force of his personality won the audience, who gave the company every encouragement.

The Chorus was Too Much Dressed

One of the incidents Miss Custer told of was at the first performance of "Cavalleria." The chorus girls were given general directions to "look as pretty as possible." They, being new to their work, proceeded to braid and curl, and all dressed their hair with flowers. At dress rehearsal no criticism was passed against their make-up, and one of the principals even remarked, "How pretty the chorus looks!" But on the opening night, just before their first cue, Madame Mascagni saw the girls standing in the wings. She exclaimed vehemently in French when she saw them, and literally flew at them, tearing the flowers from their locks.

"Peasant girls with flowers in their hair—nevaire!" she cried.

The chorus rebelled. They objected to Madame's tone of voice, and her rough handling of their hair. But Madame was insistent; there must be no solecisms in that performance. The chorus insisted, on their part, that they should have been told before. Then came the stage manager. The cue had been given, and no chorus.

"For goodness' sake, girls," he said, "take out the flowers, do anything, but don't make a fizzle of it now!"

For his sake they went on, two minutes late, with hair disheveled, and swallowing tears and sulks.

"He's old, my dear, but he is very rich."
"I know, mamma, but he's not old enough."
"What do you mean?"
"Why, mamma, he's likely to live a year or two."

How Society Meets Art

Mrs. Horace Hill has been receiving a lot of hot air from the dailies for pioneering the custom here of having a great artist to entertain her guests. Mrs. Hill invited her calling list to her home on Wednesday night and had Zelie de Lussan furnish the entertainment. The custom of hiring great singers to furnish a program at a private reception is not entirely new here, however. It has been done in the past by Mrs. de Young and one or two others. But as a rule where society has been invited to meet an artist at a function, the artist has simply been the guest of honor and not an assistant in the program provided by the hostess. Melba was met in this way at several houses and so were Patti and Paderewski. Kocian is expected to be made a social idol of during his visit. He made a big social success in New York, the Astors, Vanderbilts and Goulds welcoming him to their homes, and in London the Duchess of Marlborough is one of his patronesses. The violin that Pauline Astor gave him, a Guanarius of 1741 and valued at fifteen thousand dollars, he carries with him. The gift of this violin gave rise to the story that Miss Astor intended to marry the handsome young Bohemian. A Chicago heiress also gave him a valuable violin.

Her Concerts Overlooked

Apropos of Mrs. Hill's capture of Zelie de Lussan for social purposes, and the eagerness of society to hear the great vocalist at close range, it should not be amiss to ask why society did not attend her concerts. Zelie de Lussan is one of the most artistic songbirds of the stage. Her method is an object lesson in the vocal art. Yet she could not draw as many society people as attended the concert of Lily Lawlor, who has a good method and no voice, or who went to hear Rose Relda who has neither voice nor method. At Zelie de Lussan's two night concerts I looked in vain for some of our Twentieth Century Club enthusiasts who flatter themselves that they have musical culture. Perhaps they would have been there if they were assured that their names would be published. I noticed that Mrs. Hill took the precaution to send her list of invited guests in for publication. As I have more than once remarked, notoriety is ozone to the lungs of society.

Bobby is Her Mascot

The "Gibson girl's sister" evidently has a fondness for the name of "Robert," if the despatches are to be credited that announce Mrs. Nannie Langhorne Shaw's engagement with young Robert Goelet. The husband from whom she was lately divorced was Robert Gould Shaw, called "Bobby" for short. The engagement is of interest chiefly as it concerns a woman whose face is familiar to Life readers in the sketches of her brother-in-law, Charles Dana Gibson, and the fact that her reputed fiance has twenty millions of his own. Mrs. Shaw's late husband married right on top of his wife's successful suit for divorce, which is the quick way they manage such things in New York.

Memories of Naval Dances

The sail loft dance at Mare Island Navy Yard was a most enjoyable affair. Jolly parties at Mare Island, by the way, date back to the earliest days of its occupation. Probably the first at that hospitable place was when Miss Alice Turner, daughter of the civil engineer of the Yard, was married to Doctor John M. Brown, late Surgeon-General of the Navy but at that time attached to the receiving ship there. The Turners were Virginians and it was determined that the festivities should be held in good old-fashioned Southern style. Every house at the Yard, even Commandant Farragut's, had its contingent of guests. Those from the city went up on the U. S. S. Active by invitation of Captain and Mrs. Alden, who made their home on board that vessel and entertained in a princely manner. General J. P. Haven, familiarly known as "Josh" and the original funny man of San Francisco, was one of the guests. Bishop Kip performed the wedding ceremony. Another happy function at the Navy Yard was given by Captain Philip Fendall of the Marine Corps, to celebrate the opening of the new barracks. When Admiral Charles H. Baldwin was in command at the Yard numerous were the dinners and dances to which his friends in San Francisco were bidden.

When Mrs. Ernst Set the Mode

Lieutent-Colonel O. H. Ernst, who has just been appointed a member of the Mississippi River Commission, was stationed in San Francisco twenty odd years ago and was here for a year or more. He brought his bride with him, and they were a very popular couple, though he was rather reticent while she said just whatever came into her pretty head. On one occasion she rather astonished the partner with whom she was dancing by declaring she was the happiest being on earth. She had just discovered she was the only woman in the ballroom whose dress waist buttoned in front. At that period modish women here wore theirs laced up behind, the other fashion not having yet reached us.

Has It Been Extended?

The Ames-Eyre engagement has been freely discussed for more than a year. Indeed, twelve months ago their friends declared that it had been announced, but later on that report was denied. As they have spent a great deal of time together since, Mrs. Grundy has inferred that the engagement had been extended. Miss Ames is a tall, fine-looking girl with blonde hair, but she is not a beauty. She looks very well in a blue evening dress that she wears. She has musical talent and does a fairly good vocal stunt in the drawing-room. She and Mrs. Jack Casserly, who absorbed musical culture in the murky atmosphere of Chicago, are great friends. Bobby Eyre was quite the beauty among the men at the Spreckels ball. He went in the character of L'Aiglon, and was almost as pretty as his costume.

A Sensible Move

An order of some significance was issued several days ago by Major-General Hughes, commanding the Department of California. It provides that hereafter the submarine defenses of this district shall be under the supervision of the Artillery corps. Heretofore those defenses have been in charge of the Engineers corps, but as the actual defense of the harbor is a matter the Artillery has always been charged with in time of need, it is deemed advisable that the corps should become familiar with the position of all torpedoes, the charges, electrical connections, etc. It is a sensible move and one that should have been made long ago.

Picturesque but Expensive

There was a generous number of Army officers "unavoidably absent" from General Hughes's reception last night, and the real reason, as was predicted by the dailies, was that full dress uniforms were necessary and that very few of the officers here have that expensive luxury. The comparatively simple American officer has always rebelled strenuously against full dress, but the prejudice against the new uniform is heightened by the fact that it is unnecessarily expensive. It is a strange and wonderful creation, fairly cobwebbed with golden ropes and rigging that naturally comes high. In fact the American son of Mars has never had anything that approached in gorgeousness the new uniform, and its expense is in ratio with its loudness. To become fully and adequately equipped for a function like that of General Hughes means a rig that will amount to some two or three hundred dollars of good Government money, and such an expense to a lieutenant who is living inside his salary means no less than temporary bankruptcy. The Army tailor is a tyrant under whose sway the officers groan in bitterness of spirit. His charges are two or three times those exacted by an ordinary draper and when it comes to a general demand for show clothes he does a stock exchange business. The new Army uniform throughout, including campaign, fatigue, field and dress with caps, gloves and the big German sabre lately adopted, will bring the soldier's bill well up toward the thousand mark. It is no wonder, then, that the officers pray for a permanent uniform and that many of them are trying to get themselves ordered back to the Philippines where they may wear their fighting clothes and save money.

Our Pampered Warriors

That was a stinging rebuke administered by the Secretary of the Treasury in his review of the case of Captain Cushing of the revenue cutter service. It must have been pleasant reading for the officers of the service. It is too often assumed that a commission in the army or navy is a patent of nobility not to be questioned. This is a false assumption which prompts Society with a capital S to open its doors and arms to the men with stripes. But it is quite often demonstrated that neither a university education nor the training of a military academy can metamorphose a bounder into a gentleman. Unfortunately officers guilty of ungentlemanly conduct are frequently excused on account of long service or by reason of distinguished service. Recommendation to clemency is all right but the findings and sentences should be based on the evidence, and the reviewing authority should deal with the recommendation. A short time ago General Funston recommended the acceptance of a resignation to avoid "scandal of the service." An officer who is permitted to resign under a cloud escapes just punishment. A man shouldn't enjoy, in private life, the prestige of being an ex-army officer, with a clean bill of health, if he were fired out of the service, by reason of disgraceful conduct.

This cold weather, grip is warded off by taking Chapin & Gore's whiskies.

Prison Authorities Encourage Vice

Now that the prison humanitarians have brought things around at last so that the abuses of our penitentiaries may be investigated and the dark secrets of San Quentin and Folsom brought to the light, it is a pretty good time to take note of some tips given to the State penologists by a certain semi-fake convict evangelist who "backslid" and is now doing time for burglary. "Preacher" Jo King is his name, and it is certain that he gave, from life experience, some pointers which were at once startling and uncomplimentary to our prison management. I had a talk with the fellow while he was still of the "white wings" and was delivering lectures under the auspices of religious societies. The abuses of straight-jacketing he described to me long before the practice became a burning question, and his descriptions were so vividly realistic as to banish my appetite for some hours. A night in the straight-jacket, he said, usually resulted in temporary paralysis, and often the affliction was permanent. He told me of cases of deformity and madness as the result of the jacket. The straight-jacket, according to King, is used most frequently as a punishment for misdemeanors resulting from opium-smoking. This vice, he declared, went on unhampered up till recently at both prisons. It was no uncommon sight to see a group of prisoners huddled around an opium pipe in a cell and passing the smoke out, by means of a rubber hose attached to the stem, to a number of pals who waited in the courtyard. Opium smoking was at one time, he said, considered so much a matter of fact at Folsom that, in the construction of the dike there some years ago, the convicts were given a regular allowance of opium every day to keep them at work. No comparatively innocent young boy ever entered there, King told me, without infinite risk of graduating at the end of his term a confirmed "hop head," for it was the custom of the prisoners to encourage the vice in all who entered.

those red corpuscles that inspire the jeunesse dorée of Newport with longing for fleshly and bacchanalian delights. Willie K. Jr. is one of the tamest of the Vanderbilt clan. He is not of the temperament of the average Newport millionaire. He is a model husband and a citizen of exemplary habits. He doesn't smoke, and as he doesn't care for liquor he has not the slightest inclination to carouse. Therefore he was a disappointment. Though he enjoys the social whirl, neither he nor his wife courts social intercourse. They are devoted to each other, and are hopelessly out of fashion for the reason that they enjoy the society of each other. Young Vanderbilt is evidently the junior of his charming wife by a few years.

The Censor Put His Ban On

Edward Gordon Craig, Ellen Terry's son, staged Lawrence Housman's Nativity drama, which came under the ban of the Censor in London. The play was banned not because it was immoral but because it treated of a sacred subject. Mr. Housman could not see why he was doing wrong in writing of the Nativity for stage presentation. His own explanation of why he wrote it is that he wished "to show that it is possible for the drama to come near, without irreverence, to the central truths of Christianity, and by symbolic action to quicken the imagination of the beholders so as to make the beauty of holiness more evident to them than it was before." But the Censor did not approve of this way of making holiness more real, and he put the biggest kind of a ban on "Bethlehem." Lawrence Housman is the man who hoaxed the world into believing "An Englishwoman's Love Letters" were what they purported to be. In "Bethlehem" he has done a more serious thing. But an occasional correspondent writes me from London that there was nothing in the least shocking about the Nativity drama as it was presented in the Hall of the University of London.

Mr. Craig's stage settings were beautiful, exquisitely simple but wholly adequate. The first scene is all in gray, with the watching shepherds the characters. There is a lovely song in this that goes:

"The world is old tonight—
The world is old—
The stars around the fold
Do show their light,
And so they did, and so
A thousand years ago—
And so will do, dear Love, when you lie cold."

The second scene is on the road to Bethlehem, with an intensely purple sky reflecting the majesty of kings. In this appear the three kings following the star. The third scene shows the Nativity, the shepherds kneeling in a circle about the mother and child.

Stanford Parlor's anniversary does not fall in Lent this year, and the invitations are out for what promises to to be one of the most brilliant balls the Native Sons have ever given. It will be pulled off next Tuesday night.

An Unpleasant Objection

Mrs. Alexander Wilson has gone East to join her daughters, Miss Bessie and Miss Bernice Wilson, and she intends going abroad with them to remain until the season opens next fall, when they will be launched socially. They ought to be successful for they are well educated and very pretty. Their mother, a very handsome woman, has brought them up well. The objection has been urged that Mr. Wilson made his money in the restaurant business, and some of our society people are affecting a prejudice against wealth acquired in that way. But as the Wilsons have lots of it the method of its accumulation should not concern our society people, many of whom are tarred with an equally ill-flavored brush. Mr. Wilson has retired from the restaurant business, and spends most of his time traveling abroad.

Supp Writers Lament

That vast army of embryo newspaper workers which managed to make a precarious living by getting up pages for the Sunday supplements finds itself rather at a loss nowadays. For the editors of the Sunday supps. aren't buying much local matter. They cannot, for they would have no place to put it. A. J. Moore of the Call, who used to employ a lot of young girls to help on the supp., has no space now to offer them. What with the syndicated puzzle page, the funny page, the complete novel and story pages, the beauty talk page and the other stuff that comes from the East, he is hard pushed to get in a page occasionally of purely local interest. And the Examiner only allows two pages of the supplement now to Californian contributors, unless their matter comes via the New York American and Chicago Examiner route. Mr. Hearst's latest fad is stories of Western adventure and natural history topics. Mrs. Lillian Ferguson, who succeeded Bailey Millard as editor of the Examiner's supp., is kept busy seeking the stories that please her employer, and to that end she does considerable wiring up and down the Coast, for Western adventure incidents don't happen in this city. The Chronicle buys less syndicated matter than any of the other dailies, morning or evening. Will Irwin has a partiality for stories touching upon the picturesque phases of our city. He knows what he wants and he usually manages to obtain it. The office of a Sunday editor is no soft snap.

Why They Don't Steal

Doctor Jordan says that college boys no longer "lift" silverware. The learned president thinks that when the unholy passion for other people's cutlery attacked the lower grades of society college boys gave up the pastime as no longer exclusive. Perhaps, perhaps, good Doctor Jordan. It is true that knives and forks need no longer be chained to the tables frequented by fraternity boys. But isn't their present piety due to the lack of incentive? Does he know of a fraternity house whose silver service is not complete, thanks to light-fingered members of other days? The "old grads" did their work so well that there's no need of the boys helping themselves to other people's silverware nowadays. But one of the swell fraternities at Berkeley needs a new silver candelabrum. Honor and glory await the plucky youth who will walk off with one of those in the Palace Grill. The terms are that he must "lift" it from the table with every candle in full blaze. The rules of this lifting task were laid down some years ago but the fraternity has not yet developed a genius capable of accomplishing the feat.

Why Addie was Indignant

Mrs. Grundy is anxiously waiting to hear what sort of a reception Mrs. Sharon offered her daughter-in-law when the Breckenridges reached Paris. Adelaide Murphy-Breckenridge started around the world with the determination of giving Mrs. Sharon a piece of her mind as soon as she met her. And those who know say that a piece of Adelaide's mind is larger than a whole bolt of most people's. When Mrs. Sharon heard of her son's marriage she wrote out that "any girl would be a fool to marry him." The letter fell into Addie's hands and of course she didn't like it, not a bit of it. It not only cast a reflection on her but on her young husband, and Mrs. Breckenridge Jr. wasn't going to stand that.

The Brigham-Greenway Feud

The presence of the Brighams at the Presidio hop the evening of Mr. Greenway's ball reminds me of the feud existing between that family and the Dictator of the Four Hundred. The Brighams are of the old set here who have refused to recognize Mr. Greenway as a social leader. One of the clique once remarked, "I thought he was a caterer but I hear that he is really a gentleman by birth." However the indefatigable Edward has pursued the even tenor of his way, scoring social triumphs without the eclat of the Brighams' endorsement. It is the boast of the Brighams that they never attended a Greenway dance. The family came from Boston and are relatives of the Duers of New York. Kate Brigham has Duer for a middle name. Dr. Brigham was educated abroad and for service in the Franco-Prussian war was decorated with the cross of the Legion of Honor.

Of the newest papers the Linen Bonds displayed by COOPER & Co. are most effective.

A Fictitious Title

Almost every time the Clarence Mackays' names are mentioned nowadays, it is incidentally stated that Mrs. Mackay is a descendant of Lady Kitty Duer. The quotation marks that formerly went with "Lady Kitty" being omitted, it is inferred that she was a titled personage of some distinction. Her father was an officer in the American army. He fancied that he was the Scotch Earl of Stirling, and he adopted the title though he had no more right to it than did Emperor Norton to the one that he annexed.

Sandow's Sad Fate

Evidently there are two Sandows, judging by the newspaper cartoons that purported to represent the church-lifter this week. One paper had the big fellow looking like a pouter pigeon that had swallowed a sack of cannon balls, while another depicted him as an athlete with plenty of frontal development, but, unfortunately, with the bulk of it below, not above, the belt. This discrepancy started those who had not seen the muscle musee at the Alhambra to wondering whether or not "the perfect man" is cultivating a slight embonpoint, for those interested in the evolution of thews are naturally close students of the great Dane. To tell the truth Sandow is fattening up the least trifle; not so much that you would worry about it, but enough to mar slightly his otherwise admirable shape. When he stands on exhibition with crop inflated and abdomen shrunken to the limit this defect is not noticeable, but catch him in an unconscious pose and murder will out. Ah, me! what a fate for world-compelling Atlas, to rest awhile from his globe-lifting to find himself growing stout.

Hard to Get a Queen

The Mardi Gras ball is likely to be queenless this year. At the time of going to press the committee was unable to agree on any one with sufficient beauty, charm and position who would be willing to assume the role. It is easy enough to get queens for Street Fairs, but women of the requisite social status are somewhat reluctant to do the stunt and invite criticism.

The Crust of Content

He, who for some great aim hath never sought
More than life's stern demands to satisfy,
Climbs closer to the Gods, whose needs are naught,
Than he whose sordid soul doth multiply
The millions which he vainly dreams will buy
The calm content that gold hath never bought;
Crœsus to Solon this confessed when brought Bankrupt and conquered to the stake to die.

The crust that balks the wolf may sometimes seem Sweet as the manna in the wilderness;

Where, in the realm of some harmonious dream,
It listens to the whispered words that bless.
And learns the charm that chides the world away.

The Failure of Wit

Scene I.—Miss Kate McFlimsy, a society girl noted for her wit, with her mother, at the breakfast table.

Kate: Mother, I wish I were a fool!

Mrs. McF.: It's your own fault that you're not. You would be if you had inherited from your father's side of the house.

K. (reading note just arrived): Another invitation to dinner, from Mrs. Lion Hunter—"I want you, dear, to bring your bravest array of epigrams—the Earl of Toddlekins and that new novelist, Prudhomme Desert, are to be there." Do you wonder, mamma, that I wish I were a fool?

Mrs. McF.: I can't see why. No other girl receives so many invitations out as you.

K.: Because I can talk. I wish I'd been born tongue-tied or dumb. It's so hard to live up to one's reputation. When I was invited to meet that Spanish poet, I had to read up and memorize pages of his verse—I took two Spanish lessons in pronunciation purposely. Then when Miss Hunkle was here, I spent the whole morning over her novel, when the other girls were out on Tommy Millions's automobile.

Mrs. McF.: But, my dear, you will make a brilliant match.

K.: Rather would I stay unmarried until my dying day! Fancy having to talk epigrams to my husband!

Mrs. McF.: Well, if he should be Jimmy Peelin he could stand them, my dear. What a brilliant match that would be!

K.: Too late, mother. He was plucked before he was ripe, and he's been boxed up ever since.

Mrs. McF.: I thought he was looking for a wife.

K.: No, he's only running a bluff. Well, mother, I must study up now for the function. Hand me the dictionary, please, so I can memorize some of the foreign proverbs at the back. And where's that Pinero play I was reading? It may give me an idea for an epigram. Pity me, mamma!

The Earl: Beastly climate here, don't you know.

K.: There's no climate so beastly but that one can forget it in a good dinner.

The Earl (suspending his fork for an instant): Just so—really—how clevah!

K. (as butler fills her glass): Al buon vino non bisogna frasca, you know.

The Earl (turning to Miss De Flippe): Who is Miss McFlimsy?

Miss De F.: She's one of our most cultured belles, a brilliant woman.

The Earl (soliloquizing): I suspected that she was one of those dreadful bores.

K. (to the Earl): I hear that you have been impressed by tne beauty of our women.

The Earl: Fine! Those Sadie girls—now, they're rippin' beauties.

K.: Oh, I meant the society beauties, not those of the stage.

The Earl: They're too clevah, don't you know. Keep your wits movin' too rapidly. Now, I hate to think.

K.: Oh, how charming! Now, we'll be friends. I'm so glad to meet someone who hates to think. The mental energy required to stimulate thought is a great tax on energy.

The Earl (suspiciously): She's chaffing me.

K.: I understood that you were devoted to literature. Who is your favorite author?

The Earl: The man that wrote "Billy Baxter" suits me.

Miss De F.: I love "Billy Baxter," too.

K.: Ah, you prefer light literature. Do you ever read the classics?

The Earl: Not so that you can notice it. (Turning to Miss De F.): I say, she's a dreadful bore.

K. (turning to Prudhomme Desert): Have any of your novels been dramatized?

P. D.: Oh, yes, I dramatized one for the Lingerie theatre. It was set to music, but the actors spoiled it. They insisted that the dialogue was too heavy for musical comedy and they substituted their own lines.

K.: What an outrage!

P. D.: That's what I said, but worse than that, the critics declared that it was better than the book.

Scene III: In the drawing-room after dinner.

Miss De F. (In a corner with the Earl): Did you enjoy the dinner?

The Earl: No, that dreadful bore, Miss McFlimsy, spoiled it. She's an awful talker.

Miss De F.: Why, she's regarded as the cleverest woman in society. Her epigrams are famous.

The Earl: I always feel sorry for a person who indulges in epigrams. I know they involve great labor.

K. (in a corner with her hostess): I enjoyed myself very much, but somehow I couldn't interest the Earl. I found Mr. Desert somewhat of a bore.

Scene IV: The McFlimsy home.

Mrs. McF.: Did you enjoy yourself, dear?

K.: No, it was a stupid affair. The Earl is a mutton-head. I couldn't get down to his level. I shall turn over a new leaf. The road to a brilliant match is too thorny for me.

Passion's Problem

We who disdain to measure,
The brimming cup of pleasure
Must sometimes taste the dregs, dear,
Of bitter, haunting pain.
If all days were as this is,
And nights were made of kisses,
And you were Miss, not Mrs.,
Now would our love remain?

What e'er this love between us,
The gods with pity screen us,
'Twere better to love lightly
For only one is free.
And though we kiss and spare not,
To make you vows I dare not,
We laugh and say we care not,
A pair of fools are we. M. C. Bourke.

SAN FRANCISCO UP TO DATE.

In this century comfort and conveniences are among the principal requirements sought after by human nature, and in the electrical sphere San Francisco is not only holding her own but outstripping many of the larger Eastern cities. Most all of the new hotels and apartment houses are being equipped with every possible electrical convenience, from curling irons which are heated by electricity, thus doing away with any dirt, to the talking with one's friends in any part of the country. Every household uses the hot water bag; the electric heating pad more than takes its place, for all one has to do is to attach it to the electric fixture, turn the key, and the heat is in the pad. The electric chafing dish will be found always ready and light repasts can be cooked without the use of coal oil or alcohol.

The Standard Electrical Construction Company, Rialto Building, 120-130 New Montgomery street, have the contracts for practically all the larger buildings in the city, such as the St. Francis Hotel, Geary and Powell streets, the James L. Flood Building, Powell and Market streets, and the Mercantile Trust Building, on California street, all of which will be equipped with everything that comfort could wish.

A Novel Function

Society South of the Slot Entertained at a Recherche Affair.

That unique function—the appendix dinner—given by Miss Rosenstirn will no doubt serve as an inspiration to some of our hostesses who are eager to provide novel entertainment for their friends.—Daily Paper.

"Miss Pearl of Tehama street desires your presence at a Sir Richard Calmady dinner on Tuesday evening. R. S. V. P. N. B.: Bring your crutches."

The receipt of this invitation roused the sated senses of society South of the Slot to something like interest. A Sir Richard Calmady dinner was something new. They had been present at two Foxy Grandpa luncheons, five Alphonse and Gaston teas, sixteen Brownie cotillions and a series of common fancy-dress affairs that had bored them to death. This dinner promised something quite different.

"But who's de cove?" asked Happy Hooligan, "who's de feller dat's christenin' de feast?"

There was a wild rush to the Free Library. Sally in Our Alley grasped the fact first—"He's a cove without legs," she said.

"Wot t'ell?" ejaculated Chimmie Fadden, and the rest followed suit.

They compared notes and found that those who had received the Pearl's cards were all minus some member of their anatomy. Weary Wraggles had lost an arm, Sally in our Alley had only two teeth in her upper jaw, Lily South-o'-Market had a wooden leg, Rose of Poverty Flat was shy of three fingers of her left hand, while Happy Hooligan had lost a thumb and half of one ear in a recent pugilistic encounter.

They gaped and gossiped, but none sent regrets.

The dinner as described in the daily papers was a most unique event. Society on the other side of the slot wept envious tears because its oracle had not thought of something as original. The Pearl found herself famous in a night.

The table was spread in a laundry which was arranged like a morgue. The dishes were spread on one slab, and another was used for the buffet. Crutches were hung about the walls. Surgical instruments were used instead of knives and forks, and instead of regulation glasses the beer was drunk from medicine glasses. Soap-dishes were the sauce-plates and wash-basins used for the soup. The napkins were towels of hospital size. A papier mache mannikin of life size was the centrepiece and ranged around it were bits of the human anatomy in pickle jars. Tom the Seal, being legless, was given the place of honor and addressed as Sir Richard Calmady.

The effect was so recherche that one guest with a sensitive stomach was immediately taken ill, and had to be carried to the receiving hospital before the fish came on.

The Pearl's dinner is still talked of in exclusive circles South of the Slot as being the most delicate and charming function that ever turned the stomachs of a whole tableful of guests. It was so refined that Officer Jones at its close ran the hostess in for assisting at an immoral exhibition, and the rest of the company for disturbing the peace.

A Paradoxical Parent

"Go!" said the mother; "and may I never see your face again."

The poor little thing, lying speechless upon her lap, shivered like a leaf, and then fell to the floor.

Instead of picking it up, the mother continued:

"Go! and let me not set eyes on you again—at least, not until a radical change for the better has taken place in your make-up. Go! and on no account come back to me as you now are . . . I love you as no other will ever love you; yet go! One ecstatic night, the lord of my life—its genius—begat you; yet go! You are bone of my bone and flesh of my flesh; yet go! Many a half-delightful, half-distressful day have I borne you beneath my heart and fed you with its best blood; yet go! One matchless morning, in glorious agony, I all unassisted, brought you forth into the light of day—formed by me from the void, stamped with my personality, mine! mine! and by no possibility another's! yet go! Of my breasts I gave you growth; I adorned you with artfully simple dress; I taught your feet a faultless measure, so that now you move as if to music heard by you alone; grace and strength I gave you; I bred you in sweet seclusion—yea, you are cloister-chaste. I—I unaided did all this. I alone am the author of this perfection; yet go!—the world shall share with me your flawless beauty . . . But stay! I am sending you forth to indifferent strangers. They may regard you critically, with far other than maternal eyes. They may even want to send you back post-haste to mother, my own, my precious one! Therefore I think I would better enclose a two-cent stamp."

So saying, the young lady literary aspirant stooped down and lifted up tenderly from the floor her—first-born poem!

A Woman's Way

The soft, red glow of a reading lamp shed its light upon the figure of a woman, pacing feverishly up and down a luxuriously furnished apartment.

Outside, a man watched the shadow pass and repass the window, and with purring conceit, said to himself:

"She is restless tonight. How her eyes blazed when I praised Major Browning's pretty niece. By gad, she looked positively beautiful. A married flirt is such a bore, though, and one has to be so deuced careful. She is becoming too demonstrative of late; it is growing embarrassing."

The shadow on the curtain vanished and the man passed on. The white face of the woman assumed a look of desperate determination, the supple figure was held rigidly erect, and with feverish haste she took from her desk a sheet of note paper, uttered a low, hysterical laugh as she gazed at the linked monogram of her initial and her husband's, and shuddered strangely at her own voice as she said:

"This is the only course."

* * * * * * * * * *

Four hours later a prosperous-looking man ran lightly up the steps of a house on Fifth avenue. The lines that care had marked upon his features gave place to a smile of sweet expectancy as he entered his wife's apartments.

The first thing that attracted his attention was the dainty, blue envelope lying upon the table. Some premonition of evil made him hesitate to touch it, but mastering the unreasonable aversion, he picked up the note and, as he broke the seal, said:

"I am an old fool. If she is absent an hour it seems such a length of time that I always fear the indefinable 'something' has happened to take her from me, but I love her so well," and he touched the letter reverently because her hand had penned it.

"My husband,

I thought God was good when he gave you to me for a husband. I was poor in all but beauty, and because of that beauty you have given me the best love of your life.. I appreciate and humbly thank you for your many kindnesses and the knowledge of your overwhelming love makes me shrink from the confession that I am about to make, but I feel that I owe it to you, and your ever generous nature will pity and understand when I tell you that I love another as I thought no one could ever love, and the passion has absorbed every other interest in my life. I have struggled against it but it has grown to be a power irresistible. When I say that my affection for this man is greater than your love for me could have ever been, you may excuse my action when I go to him. Try to forget me, my husband, and may the God who will judge and punish my sin soften this blow to your confidence in

Maisie."

All night the man sat and stared in stunned hopelessness at the bit of blue paper. The red eye of the sun streamed across the luxurious fittings of the room before he stirred. At length he arose, with painstaking care placed his hat firmly upon his head, and with slow but steady step left the apartment.

* * * * * * * * * *

One year passed. Life ran on in its well-worn groove. One stormy night a man stood at a low window gazing absently into the street. The rain was beating against the pane, blurring his view of the hurrying pedestrians. Presently his attention was attracted by a woman, who, in wet and drabbled skirts, crossed the street from directly opposite his window. Something in her suppleness and grace caused a throb of pain in his heart and impatiently turning he walked to the other side of the room and gazed long and earnestly at a portrait.

"May God deal gently with her," he murmured.

There was a stifled sob; the man turned sharply round. A black-robed figure crouched beside a chair.

"In the name of God, why are you here?" he cried.

"Pity me, forgive me," she moaned, "take me back. I am so wretched, and this has been my one sustaining hope for so long, so long."

"He has mistreated you?"

"He has deserted me."

There was an unfathomable look in the man's eyes as he reached out his arms to lift the half-kneeling figure, then checking himself abruptly, he said: "Rest here until I return," and immediately left the apartment.

The woman sat where he had left her, with the hell of memory seething through her tortured brain. Presently she arose and passing across the room to where his smoking-jacket lay, hesitatingly reached forth a trembling hand and lifting the coat pressed it caressingly to her lips and bosom, rocking her body to and fro and crying softly.

Long hours afterward a servant knocked gently at the door, and discreetly concealing by his immobility of countenance the curiosity that had been aroused by the wife's appearance, handed her a message and respectfully retired.

It read as follows:

"I have killed the man who wronged you. When this reaches you I shall have left here, I trust, forever. Remain where you are and let it be your home. My life, my all, shall be devoted to your happiness."

For a moment the woman's figure swayed and seemed about to fall. The tenderness, contrition and humility that had but lately softened her features gave place to a look of intense hatred and wild dismay. "Oh, my love, my love," she wailed, "he has killed my love. Curse him, O God, and let me be the instrument of Thy vengeance!"

With a gesture of loathing she released the letter and watched it flutter to the floor; then, drawing her cloak about her, she went out into the night.

Hoity Toity

"What have you got, Mike?" is the question propounded to Max Dill in the "Hoity Toity" poker game at Fischer's about the time that Lady Grafter has fleeced him out of all his money. "A wife and five children" was the reply, and it was eloquent of the situation so far as Mike was concerned. "Hoity Toity" sparkles with repartee of that sort. It is the breeziest skit that Edgar Smith ever wrote. There is a rapid fire of witticisms from the going up of the curtain to the final fall of the same. The bank scene is excruciatingly funny, and the three comedians—Kolb, Dill and Bernard—are intensely amusing in the scene in which they receive instructions in good form from George De Long. Mr. De Long feeds the comedians in this scene like a veteran of the burlesque stage. He is a capital juvenile and contributes his share to the gayety of the piece. Though the German dialect preponderates in "Hoity Toity," all the merry mummers are given a fair share of the work and the honors are pretty evenly distributed. Winfield Blake, in the role of General Steele, the American billionaire, gives greater satisfaction than in any part he has hitherto essayed, and Maude Amber's Lady Grafter is true to the name. But the most noteworthy feature of the production is the ensemble work, for which George Lask is deserving of great credit. There are some very pretty groupings, and some picturesque dancing, the feature of which, as usual, is the supple and somewhat acrobatic work of Flossie Hope. The music for "Hoity Toity" was written by John Stromberg, and it is interspersed with catchy tunes. Harry James is once more in the director's chair, and at all times he has the chorus well in hand. "Hoity Toity" is another artistic triumph for Fischer's, and it will probably establish a new record for the house.

Bernard Takes Mike's Place

People have become so used to seeing Barney Bernard as the Jew that they have forgotten that he can do anything else, so they were naturally somewhat startled Sunday night to see the Hebrew impersonator wearing the padded front of Max M. Dill. It was the last night of "Barbara Fidgety" and Bernard took Dill's part throughout the performance and did it so well that he almost broke up the show. His interpretation of the fat German's part was a weird combination of Yiddish and Harlem Dutch and he put so much unexpected "business" into the lines that not only the audience but the players themselves were convulsed with laughter most of the time he was on the stage. This curious bit of understudy was quite necessary on the part of the management. It seems that in the afternoon before the performance Dill's voice suddenly went crazy. He positively declined to perform, so George Lask turned to Bernard in despair. "Barney," he said, "how'd you like to be the Dutchman tonight?" "Are you joshing?" asked Bernard. "I wish I were," sighed the tired manager as he handed the book to Bernard. The latter took it home with him and when he returned at night he had mastered the lines much better than one would expect. Max Dill watched his understudy from behind the scenes that night and laughed louder than the rest. When he came off for the first time Dill clapped him soundly on the back. "Barney," he said, "it will serve you right if I am put on to do the Jew some time."

Barney as Shylock

I hear that an act from "The Merchant of Venice" is being rehearsed for Manager Friedlander's benefit, and that Barney Bernard is to play Shylock. He will be supported by some of the best available dramatic talent, and he will essay a serious interpretation of the part. Bernard is anxious to do the legitimate.

The Pros and Cons with Nance O'Neil

Among those who assembled about Nance O'Neil in the green room at the Grand last Friday night, to shower their congratulations upon the young star, was her mother, Mrs. Lamson. It was a great moment for the mother, who saw her younger daughter receive the homage of some of San Francisco's most prominent cits. Now that Nance O'Neil has won a place in the world her relatives are very glad to bask in the sunlight of her prosperity. Yet she received no encouragement from them when she was struggling to attain a foothold in her profession. Some day the life of Nance O'Neil may be written, and it will be interesting history. In some respects it is like that of "Magda," though with the love episodes left out. The Lamson girls, Lillian and Gertrude, had a hard childhood. If it had not been for strangers' help, they would have had few chances to gain education or anything else. I have heard that their dramatic talent was an inheritance, however, from their mother, who, had fate directed her to such a career, would have been a great actress. But from neither parent did the girls receive help in their aspirations. Lillian went upon the stage first and though she is clever and talented, not receiving the right kind of training she never attained any place in the stage world. She came hither as the star in "Blue Jeans," a buzz-saw melodrama, but that was her apogee. Gertrude, on the contrary, fell into the hands of the man who has made her what she is. There are critics who mourn in print over the fact that Nance O'Neil has been taught by McKee Rankin, and say what she would be if she had studied under Frohman or Daly. But as Nance O'Neil says herself, "Had I been with a New York manager I might have been wasting my years in society plays, I might now be acting in a Hall Caine drama like Viola Allen, I would never have been stimulated to the higher study." The story that lately appeared in one of the weeklies that in two years Nance O'Neil would have a new manager had no basis in fact. Nance O'Neil says while McKee Rankin lives she will never have another manager or teacher. What she is, she owes to him. He has taught her, not only how to act, but how to think out the parts she acts. He has roused her intellect, and she is growing in intellectual knowledge every day. A San Franciscan lately home from London tells me that, though London refused to grant Nance O'Neil fame, McKee Rankin was welcomed as one of the best American actors that had ever appeared tnere. It was conceded that Nance O'Neil could not find a better teacher. Yet in San Francisco, the general idea is that she would do greater things under another teacher. It is likely that London is right.

Nance O'Neil cleared about fifteen thousand dollars out of her ten weeks' engagement here. This money she purposes spending in staging her plays in New York, and making her Gotham season a success. A theatrical man who knew her when she first began her career says that Nance O'Neil deserves her good fortune. He remembers her when she used to come to rehearsal at the Alcazar, shabbily frocked and poorly shod, and often bringing her mid-day meal in a brown paper. Now the fat of the land is hers, and yet Nance O'Neil does not try to forget the old days.

From Norway to Ireland in a Night

The Gaelic League has not bothered Charles Erin Verner at the Grand this week, as it did Denis O'Sullivan during his starring season. But then "Robert Emmet" is a drama of one hundred years ago, and the League could not object to the representation of scenes depicting conditions as they were in the last century. "Robert Emmet" is not a bad play, as Irish melodramas go. But the company has not quite recovered from its strenuous labors in Nance O'Neil's sombre plays, and does not fit well into the Verner drama. From Norway during the Danish occupation to Ireland in Emmet's time was a big jump, and only Mr. Byers, Mr. Gardner and Miss Walker managed to make the leap successfully. On Wednesday night the star did not seem to be en rapport with his part, which went beyond his grasp at times. Instead of the scenes in which the great patriot figures being pregnant with tragedy they bordered on the farcical. Next week, the company will be more in the spirit of its work, when Verner will present a play that has never been given here, Dan Sully's "The Parish Priest." It will be the closing week of the Irish star's engagement. Maude Odell will shortly come to the Grand.

A Fitch Masterpiece

It is unfortunate that such a bad company as that at the California this week should have the spoiling of such a good play as "Lovers' Lane" thrust upon it. Clyde Fitch is in hard luck so far as his Western reputation is concerned. He has done some brilliant work but it is usually exploited in this city by mummers of exasperating mediocrity. It was so with "Captain Jinks" at the Columbia and it is so with "Lovers' Lane," one of the prettiest and most artistic little heart-interest, dramatic pictures of puritanical ruralism that has ever come this way. It ranks with "The Little Minister." In it several living, breathing characters are thrown on the canvas in vivid colors, and they lure you right into their little circle and hold your interest in all their affairs. Clyde Fitch has been turning out dramatic pot-boilers lately. He has been running his popularity into the ground with phenomenal persistency. His pieces are said to be following one another hot off the griddle as it were, and each is said to have marked a distinct decline in his powers of construction and his showing of wit. When you see "Lovers' Lane" you deeply regret that a man capable of such a masterpiece should descend to the character of work reported from the East this season. It tells the pretty story of the trials and tribulations of a young New England minister who has charge of a church in a little village inhabited by narrow-minded, puritanical people. It is a love story, daintily told and with exquisite finish. But the company with one or two exceptions is incapable of handling it. A notable incompetent is Mr. Leopold Lane, who excites the risibles of his audience by his tragic efforts to draw sympathy and tears. His stereotyped intonation starts the whole audience tittering, and then Mr. Lane looks over the footlights as though he contemplates jumping over and licking somebody. He probably would have done so Tuesday night if it had not been apparent that the tittering was unanimous. Mr. Macklin, the minister of the company, has the proper conception of the part but lacks the ability to convince. The most effective of the company is Lottie Learn, who plays the incorrigible minx in a most realistic fashion.

He Shocked the Clerk

Four or five years years ago, when Louise Royce, now of the Anna Held company, was playing an engagement at the Tivoli during her summer vacation, she arranged to have her son visit her. Accordingly one evening the tall, handsome youth arrived from the academy where he was a student. He went to the Baldwin hotel, where his mother was living, and when he asked for "Miss Royce" the clerk said, "Not in. She is playing at the theatre and won't be back till after eleven." "Very well," said the smartly attired youth, "I'll take the keys for her rooms and wait for her there. Send my baggage up, please." The clerk, dazed and shocked at the young man's boldness, coldly refused the keys, whereupon Mr. Royce haughtily left the hotel and marched straightway over to the Tivoli and related the whole matter to his fascinating mamma. "Did you tell the clerk that I am your mother?" Miss Royce inquired. "No, indeed—none of his business," said sonny. "Then go over immediately and tell him, you dear, silly boy," commanded the fond mother. "Miss" Royce is one of the most devoted of mothers and delights in telling of her fine grown-up son and his many good qualities. She looks too young to be the mother of any but a mere juvenile.

To Star in Comic Opera

Fritzi Scheff, the pretty, chic little mezzo soprano of the Grau forces, is to be starred next season under American management in comic opera. As there will probably be no grand opera in New York next winter, the little Austrian will probably have a big success in her new venture. Her manager, George B. Dillingham, plans to find in Paris a comic opera to suit his star. At a recent Sunday night concert at the Metropolitan Opera House Madame Scheff sang a little English song about having a little shadow which always followed her, something after the fashion of Mary's little lamb. The audience giggled and laughed outright, for they thought maybe little Fritzi meant her new spouse, who has joined the "Grand Opera Husbands' Club." Fritzi, by the way, has frequently been importuned to enter the comic opera field, but notwithstanding her thin voice she preferred to remain in the heavier atmosphere. Her sudden change of heart is a surprise, but as she has a husband now she cannot afford to be idle.

Mr. E. D. Price, the well-known theatrical manager, will arrive next week to take charge of the Alcazar and Central theatres for the firm of Belasco & Mayer. Price is one of the most experienced theatrical managers in the country and he has many friends in this city, for he occupied positions of responsibility in local theatres years ago. He has lately been the chief executive of William Brady's staff, and at one time he managed Richard Mansfield.

Rialto Gossip from Gotham

Charles Richman will play Armand to Margaret Anglin's Camille in New York, when the Dumas drama is presented in the fall. This knocks on the head the theory of those who, when the play was presented here last season, asserted that it was Henry Miller's Armand that gave Margaret Anglin's Camille its inspiration. And by the way a correspondent writes me from New York that the Anglin-Miller romance has had another chapter. The story goes on the Rialto that when Henry Miller went abroad to ask his wife to let him have a divorce, he changed his plans and they had a reconciliation instead. The gossips have been busy with the romance ever since it had its beginning in San Francisco, and they feel that they have been defrauded of their rights because the conclusion has been changed. Richman, the new Armand, supported Miss Anglin during her starring tour in "Mrs. Dane's Defense." He is a handsome and magnetic actor.

The course of lectures given by Dr. W. R. Price of Tennessee, under the auspices of the Society of Psychic Research of this city, is attracting much attention. Dr. Price is a charter member of the first society ever organized for psychic research, which was formed in London about eight years ago. Dr. Price will lecture tomorrow night in Golden Gate hall on "Telepathy."

Kipling's "The Light that Failed" has been dramatized by Constance Fletcher and was produced last week in London by Mr. and Mrs. Forbes Robertson (Gertrude Elliott, sister of Maxine). It is said to have been as pronounced a success as "Mice and Men," their last season's success, which is now being played in New York by Annie Russell.

Eleanor Kent, formerly Mabel Love of this city, is now prima donna of the "Silver Slipper" company on Broadway, and is said to be giving a charming performance.

Ellie Ellsler has Julia Marlowe's role in the road production of "When Knighthood was in Flower."

Mascagni at the Tivoli

There will be a series of operatic productions at the Tivoli beginning March second, under the direction of Mascagni. They will take place on Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Sunday nights, and the operas will be "Cavalleria," "Zanetto" (for the first time here) and the "Hymn to the Sun" from "Iris," with chorus. There will be an orchestra of fifty people, and the operas will be represented with a big cast including Avedano, Caro Roma, Arthur Cunningham, Frances Graham, Marie Welsh, and others. The prices for the performances will be one dollar and a half, one dollar, and fifty cents. Seats for the first night will be on sale on Monday. "Iolanthe" will be the alternating attraction.

The Kilties' Band Programs

The Kilties' Band (Gordon Highlanders of Canada), numbering forty musicians and including a vocal choir of sixteen, six Scottish dancers, pipers, buglers, swordsmen and other features of a Scottish regiment, will give concerts at the Alhambra every afternoon and evening of the coming week. The programs of the band are varied and novel, and at every concert there will be a change of numbers. Prices for this engagement will be popular, ranging from fifty cents to one dollar, seats on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s. The programs for the opening day are: Afternoon—Overture, "William Tell," Rossini, Bagpipe Solo, "Caller Herrin," Pipe-Sergt. Ferguson, Scotch Fantasia, "Robert Bruce," dance, "Highland Fling," Master Eugene Lockhart; concert waltz, "A Toi," Waldteufel, part song, "Boys of the Old Brigade," Caldicott, Kilties Choir; Scotch Reel in costume, Kilties Famous Reel Dancers; Irish Selection, "Erin," Basquit, solo for trombone, "Columbia," Rollinson, Harry Hawes; scenes from "King Dodo," Lueders; tenor solo, "Mary," Richardson, J. Coates Lockhart; novelette, "In a Cozy Corner," Bratton, dance, "hornpipe," David Ferguson; march, "Cuban Independence," Henninger. Night—overture, "Sancho Panza," Williams, bagpipe solo, "The Pibroch of Donald Dhu," Pipe-Sergt. Ferguson; Gems of Scottish Song, Godfrey, dance, "Highland Fling," Master Eugene Lockhart; solo for cornet, "Inflammatus" (Stabat Mater), Rossini, Robert Gilliland; part song, "Scots Wha Hae," the Kilties Choir; Scotch Reel in coctume, Kilties Famous Reel Dancers; ballet music from "William Tell," Rossini, solo for Flute, "Paganini's Witches Dance," David Anderson; incidental music to "Henry VIII," Gorman; tenor solo, "Tell Her I Love Her So," De Faye, J. Coates Lockhart; sextet from "Lucia"; dance, "hornpipe," David Ferguson; A Hunting Scene (Characteristique), Rollinson.

Freeman and Lynn's Commercial Men's Mastodon Minstrels will give their last performances at the Alhambra this afternoon and evening. The company, composed entirely of traveling drummers, with Cassassa's band of twenty-five pieces and an orchestra of sixteen men, presents a high-class entertainment that will compare favorably with that given by any professional organization on the road.

Some Features of Next Week's Bills

The Tivoli will have "Iolanthe" next week, opening on Tuesday evening. This departure from the usual custom is occasioned by the appearance of the company in San Jose, where "The Mikado" will be presented, with Charles Williams in the role of Ko Ko. "Iolanthe" will have a good cast. The Lord Chancellor will be sung by Hartman, the Earl of Mountararat by Arthur Cunningham, Strephon by Edward Webb. For the part of Private Willis, the management has secured the services of Arthur Hahn, a bass singer with a splendid voice. Caro Roma is the queen of the Fairies.

"My Partner," the Alcazar's new bill, has not been seen in this city for years. It is the Bartley Campbell drama that made Louis Aldrich famous. The scenes are located in a mining camp and the plot tells of Ned Singleton and Joe Saunders, partners, in love with the same woman. One is a "beauty" man, the other a good fellow, physically plain. The heroine favors the attractive one, who repays her confidence by betraying her. The partners quarrel, and after dividing their gold separate. The villain of the play, concealed in their hut, beholds the division, murders Ned, possesses himself of the money and escapes. Joe returns to say a kind word to the partner he has left in anger. He finds him seated in a chair with his head bowed on the table, and it is here that the great scene of the play takes place. He addresses a touching appeal to him, and it is only at the end of it that he discovers he has been talking to a dead body. Hastings will of course be cast as the plain but sterling Joe, and Albert Morrison will be Ned. George Osbourne will be cast as a Chinaman. There will be an extra matinee on Monday.

Edith Lemmert, who has the role of Estrella in "Arizona" at the Columbia next week, is well known in San Francisco though she is a Los Angeles girl. She was the wife of Lawrence Hanley, with whom as co-star she gained her first theatrical experience. Dustin Farnum, who has the hero's part in the play, is also a favorite here. "Arizona" made a big hit on its former presentation at the Columbia and promises to be as popular this time. Prices for the Thomas play go back to the old standard, raised for Anna Held.

Alma Kruger, who made such a favorable impression here several years ago as leading lady with Warde and James, returns to us tomorrow night as a Belasco star. David Belasco is sending Miss Kruger and an exceptionally strong company to the California to present "The Heart of Maryland." The California will shortly give an elaborate production of the dramatization of Tolstoi's celebrated story, "Resurrection." It will be an exact reproduction of the play as now being given by Blanche Walsh at the Victoria in New York. This is the story, it will be remembered, that started to run as a serial some years ago in the Cosmopolitan, but was suppressed for some reason or other.

Ralph Stuart's engagement at the Republic ends tonight, and a season of farce comedy opens tomorrow. "Chimmie Fadden," with young Forrest Seabury as the star, will be the bill. Seabury made a hit in the title role of this play when it was produced in this city some time ago. He will be supported by a strong company.

Charles Erin Verner will present Dan Sully's great Eastern success, new here, "The Parish Priest," at the Grand for his second and last week. It is full of pathetic and exciting incidents, well sprinkled with comedy, and the company should be at its best in the Irish drama.

Le Quatuor Basque, direct from Europe, will appear for the first time here at the Orpheum. The organization is composed of a quartet of singers imported from the province of Basque, a territory south of the Pyrenees, and, in their native dress and singing the songs of their country in their peculiar tongue, they are said to offer a delightful and high-class entertainment. Reno and Richards, comedy acrobats, will appear after a tour of the world. Thomas J. Ryan and Mary Richfield will present Will Cressy's latest sketch, "Mag Haggerty's Father," which affords Mr. Ryan an unusually fine opportunity for his unexcelled character drawing. "Radiant" Florence Bindley, vocalist, instrumentalist and comedienne, and a great San Francisco favorite, comes back with a lot of new material. She is now known as the "Girl in the Diamond Dress," on account of a magnificent costume, covered with brilliants, that she wears in her act. Louise Montrose, late prima donna soprano of the Castle Square Opera Company, will sing for the first time in this city. She is said to have a charming personality and has made an unqualified hit in vaudeville. Lola Yberri, whose "Dream of the Dance" will introduce Egyptian, Japanese and French Empire dances, is on the bill; Mr. and Mrs. Jimmie Barry will unload a lot of new songs and jokes in "A Skin Game," and Franco Piper will present his amazing banjo novelty act for his last week. There will be a special matinee Monday.

"Hoity Toity" will easily crowd Fischer's next week and for many weeks to come.

Maria Azpiroz, a girl violinist from Spain, will be a feature in the theatre at the Chutes next week. There will be a magnificent display of fireworks on Monday night. —The Playgoer.

MUSIC

Sunny Pietro from Sunny Italy

Signor Pietro Mascagni must have forgotten his troubles for awhile last Tuesday afternoon, for he found himself a popular hero at the Alhambra theatre. The Italian composer could not fail to receive a warm welcome in this city for we have never been slow to applaud genius when it comes properly labeled. And we have been reading a great deal about Pietro Mascagni lately. His troubles with Eastern musicians and incompetent managers served to advertise him. For awhile he threatened to become an international question. He met with so many reverses that the King of Italy, it was said, expressed his sympathy by making him a chevalier of the Order of Savoy. I am inclined to doubt the story because the King is a level-headed fellow and knows what he is about. He knows that Americans are not responsible for the mishaps of a badly managed business enterprise. It would be more rational to consider the action of the King as a snub to the directors of the conservatory of music who recently dropped Signor Mascagni from his place as director on the ground that he was absent from the scene of his duties too frequently. Signor Mascagni came to this country for those American dollars which are popular in all circles in Europe, and being of an unpractical turn he met with reverses. As a consequence the adventures of the distinguished son of sunny Italy became familiar features of the news columns of the daily press. The fact is that Mascagni has been dividing interest with "Force" of late, and incidentally it should be remarked that like Jim Dumps he has been metamorphosed into Sunny Jim, for he bobbed up at the Alhambra with a face wreathed in smiles, and he was given a most demonstrative ovation. He is the typical Italian musician, fond of the adulation of the crowd but always affecting great modesty and gesticulating to indicate that it is somebody else who is deserving of the applause. He blamed it on the orchestra, and his courtesy was well warranted, for he surely had a fine aggregation of musicians under his baton. Of course he proved his efficiency as a director by securing a very good performance. Indeed he is an admirable conductor. Fully as sensational as was expected, he infused much life into his musicians, and brought out details in the intermezzo of "Cavalleria" which are usually lost in the performances by operatic orchestras. It was noticeable that he took a slower tempo for it than we have been accustomed to hearing. Schumann's "Traumerei" was played with exquisite delicacy, and in this selection the conductor's manner was in sympathy with the theme. He was perhaps more demonstrative in the "William Tell" overture than in anything else. His head wiggled until you began to fear that he would shake it off, and at a crashing chord the conductor acted as though in a fine frenzy. He has the knack of communicating his enthusiasm and his fire to the musicians, and as a consequence his auditors had their feelings played upon most pleasingly. But it is as a composer that we are mainly interested in Mascagni and he vouchsafed us the satisfaction of listening to some of his recent works, notably his music written for Hall Caine's "Eternal City" and a selection from "Iris." They reveal the familiar combinations and orchestral effects and not a little technical brilliancy. It is impossible to judge from the selections given the worth of the whole of which they form a part, for it is hard to determine whether the music grasps the theme. The "Hymn to the Sun" was enjoyable because it abounds with the Mascagni melodies. The "Eternal City" suite was not impressive. Authorities agree that Mascagni has been too industrious of late, and no doubt he was much fatigued when he wrote the music for Hall Caine's play. The artistic triumph of the afternoon was the Tschaikowsky symphony.

Tomorrow afternoon at two-thirty Mascagni will conduct a sacred concert program at the Alhambra, when Rossini's "Stabat Mater" will be given in its entirety. There will be a quartet—Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup, soprano, Mrs. M. E. Blanchard, contralto, Mr. J. F. Veaco, tenor, and Mr. G. Wanrell, basso—and a chorus of one hundred and fifty voices, in addition to the full orchestra. Beside the "Stabat Mater," there will be given Mascagni's "Hymn to the Sun" and the intermezzo. In the evening the scene will be shifted to the Mechanics' Pavilion, where the orchestra under Mascagni's direction will play a program of popular music with several of the composer's own works. Popular prices, from one dollar to fifty cents, will prevail at the evening concert.

To Appear at the Tivoli

Mascagni is coming to the Tivoli a week from Monday night, and will direct a production of his opera "Zanetto" and scenes from "Iris" and "Cavalleria Rusticana." He will give four performances and the company will include Frances Graham, Caro Roma, Arthur Cunningham and Avedano. The Tivoli management is indeed to be felicitated upon securing the great composer.

The San Francisco Recital

The singing of Mrs. Josephine Clark was the most pleasing feature of the San Francisco Conservatory recital on Saturday evening. Mrs. Clark has a warm, rich mezzo which she uses with good effect. Her first number was Bellini's Casta Diva, a selection which was not chosen with due regard to the quality of her voice. Her proper field is the song. She did remarkably well with Grieg's "Sunshine" and Mascheroni's "For All Eternity," the latter with violin obligato by Nathan Landsberger. The audience would fain have had more of Mrs. Clark, but Mr. Bendix's stern but wise rule of no encores was not to be broken. The instrumental program was of a very serious order, no less than four concerto movements appearing upon it, Mr. Bendix at the second piano supplying the orchestral parts. Miss Josie Coonan, who played the first movement in the Beethoven Concerto in C minor, shows steady improvement. Miss Lydia Reinstein, who played the allegro movement of the Mendelssohn number, has vivacity and dash. Miss Amy Peterson's playing is always characterized by ability and intelligence. A Mozart movement fell to her share. Miss Emma Nelson was very successful with the Liszt Rigoletto Fantasie, the cantabile passages being especially gratifying. Miss Edna Drynan closed the program with the andante of Saint Saens' Concerto in G minor. Like the other numbers it was executed with fine technique. All the performers showed the results of sincere and intelligent study, and their work as a whole was marked by earnestness and thoroughness.

Bandmaster W. F. ROBINSON, "The Kilties," Alhambra

Lenten concerts will be among the attractions offered by Impresario Greenbaum. At the Alhambra on Monday and Tuesday nights, March ninth and tenth, concerts will be given by the Coronation Choir and Glee Party. This is composed of twenty members of the choir which took part in the coronation services of King Edward at Westminster Abbey last August.

Mr. and Mrs. Hugo Mansfeldt introduced Miss Mary Carrick to a number of their friends last Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday afternoons. On each occasion Miss Carrick entertained the guests by playing an exacting program of Liszt compositions. The professional critics and dilettante present all expressed themselves delighted at Miss Carrick's interpretation.

Mrs. Johnson's Recital

A very pleasing program was presented at Mrs. L. Snider Johnson's song recital on Monday evening. Mrs. Johnson is well known as a church choir singer but this was her first appearance in recital. Her numbers did not lack for variety. There was a group of Schumann songs, for which her voice is well adapted, songs by Chadwick and an aria from Bemberg's "Jeanne d'Arc," a group of bright Old English Songs, the dainty Songs of Sleep by Clayton Johns, with Dr. Stewart's blithe "Out in the Open Meadow." There was nothing in the program beyond the singer's power to interpret, and that as much as anything else made the program so pleasing. Mrs. Johnson sings with feeling and expression, her voice being well suited to interpret the different moods of the composers whose works were chosen. Nathan Landsberger added to the evening's enjoyment with his violin solos, and Dr. Stewart accompanied both Mrs. Johnson and the violinist.

Waldemar Lind

A violin recital will be given next Thursday evening in Steinway hall by Waldemar Lind, who has recently returned from Europe, where he pursued a course of study under that most eminent Belgian master, Cesar Thompson. Mr. Lind, who is a Californian, is well known here in the musical world, having been one of the foremost local ensemble and orchestral players before his departure, and a member of the Fritz Scheel symphony orchestra. His line of instruction in violin playing has followed the methods pursued by Kreisler, Kubelik, Kocian and Wieniawski, to which has also been added the method of Cesar Thompson, this being severe as the classic German school taught by Joachim. Lovers and critics of the violin will have a treat next Thursday evening when the following program will be set before them by Mr. Lind, assisted by Mr. Arthur Fickenscher, pianist: Sonata (Allegretto ben moderato, Allegro, Recitativo—Fantasie, Allegretto poco mosso). by Cesar Frank, Messrs. Lind and Fickenscher; Concert No. 1 (Allegro energico, Andante, Allegro gioccoso), Christian Sinding; Etudes (Paganini-Thompson), Concerto No. 2, Adagio ma non troppo (Max Bruch), Airs Russes (Wieniawski), Serenade (Tschaikowsky), Passacaglia (Handel-Thompson).

The Coming of Kocian

Mascagni said of Kocian, the young violinist who will appear at the Alhambra in March: "He has hands like iron, but he plays as if they were feathers. Never has a virtuoso shown a more exquisite touch. His technique is superb, magnificent. But best of all, he has the great gift—soul. His playing is filled with temperament, with understanding. He throws himself into his work and makes it a living thing. His music speaks to you, cries out to you. It tells you of the beauty of the world; it tells you of its great sadness. You may not speak his tongue, you may never take his hand, and still you know his heart and know that he knows yours." Kocian will play here at the Alhambra on March third, fifth and seventh, two evenings and a matinee. The sale of seats for his recitals will open next Wednesday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co.s.

On Wednesday afternoon, Mrs. E. F. Weihe, curator of the music section of the Adelphian Club of Alameda, gave an at home to the members of her section and their friends. The feature of the program was a paper on "Shakespeare in Music" by Mrs. George H. Perry.

Hugo Mansfeldt played on Tuesday for the Adelphians in Alameda, rendering a program of variety and excellence.

The program at the Music Teachers' Association concert on Monday night went off as scheduled, except for the omission of Arthur Weiss's numbers, the 'cellist being unable to be present.

Mr. Walter C. Campbell, who has for years been director and basso of Calvary church choir, has resigned that position and will leave on March first.

Southern Pacific Deficit

The Southern Pacific has just issued a statement of its earnings for December, and for the current fiscal year. The statement shows that the management is continuing the policy of spending every cent of available earnings on improvements and betterments. Notwithstanding an increase in gross earnings of more than $2,250,000 for the six months, these heavy betterment expenditures have caused a deficit of more than $3,000,000. For December the gross earnings of the Southern Pacific amounted to $7,972,000, an increase of $615,000 over the same month of the previous year. Operating expenses increased $597,819, reducing the increase in net earnings to $17,657. The balance earned over charges and rentals during December was $1,219,370. There was expended on betterments and additions $2,049,871, causing a deficit of $830,500 for the month. For the six months the gross earnings amounted to $45,983,000, an increase of $2,254,000 over the corresponding period of the previous year. Operating expenses increased $3,081,000, so that the net earnings for the six months decreased $826,044. The balance earned over charges and rentals for the six months ending with December was $7,703,900. There was expended during the same period on betterments and additions, $10,777,700. The net result of the operations was a deficit of $3,073,829.

An Unsafe Investment

The bonds of the United Railways company continue to drop. It is becoming pretty generally understood in financial circles that they are not a good investment. It is reported that the company has not made adequate provision for renewing the rolling stock and general equipment, and the prediction is made that unless the population of the city continues to increase rapidly in the next few years, the corporation will go into the hands of a receiver. Of course this prediction may be far-fetched but it is certain that the company is losing the confidence of investors.

Good Tone on 'Change

The market has been in very good condition during the entire week and the active interest displayed by investors has maintained a good steady tone and is keeping prices on a substantial basis. Buyers have divided their attention very freely among the listed securities and sales of the leading stocks have been both numerous and extensive. The present trade movement appears to be a healthy one, inspired only by the desire of people with ready money seeking suitable investment securities for investment purposes only. Sugar shares have been well represented in the week's business, and while in some instances the stock of one corporation has sold a little more freely than others, it is a noticeable fact that all are receiving some attention at the hands of buyers. The cause for the difference in the sales of these shares is not so much any neglect of one or another as it is to the fact that in some of the companies the stock is held closely within few hands while in others the holders are more numerous. This accounts for what might be termed general activity in one and quietness in others. Reports from the Islands all continue favorable and recent advices show that the estimate of the Hawaiian Sugar Planters' Association made some months ago, announcing a crop of 355,000 tons for the four Islands upon which the plantations are located, was not excessive. The largest producing plantation is the Ewa Company, which produced a crop this last year of 38,000 tons. The next largest is that of the Oahu Company, which yielded something over 26,000 tons. Prices have shown some improvement and both the crop prospects and the market outlook for the coming year are reported to be auspicious. The Hawaiian Commercial shares have met with a fair demand and shown a stronger tendency during the last few days. At present $46.75 is readily bid for the stock but there are few holders willing to sell at less than $48. Hana Plantation remains steady at $4.50 to $4.75. Paauhau has also shown a little stronger tone and sellers have raised their asking price to $17. Hutchison is selling in a moderate way at $15.75 and $20 is bid for Onomea with no sellers at less than $25. Spring Valley Water shares have developed an advancing tendency and $87.62 1-2 is bid for round lots with few offers to sell at less than $87.87 1-2, with most holders asking $88. Contra Costa readily brings $65.25. There has been some little movement in Giant Powder stock but there has been little change in the price of shares. At present $65.75 is freely bid for parcels, either large or small, and there are no offers to sell. Gas and Electric shares are becoming one of the most popular securities, doubtless because of the fact that electricity is now recognized by everybody as the coming motive power. San Francisco Gas and Electric has fluctuated somewhat during the past few days, the price ranging from $43.25 to $44, but with little changing hands at the latter figure. Oakland Gas, Light and Heat Company's shares are meeting with an enlarged inquiry and buyers have raised their bids to $75.62 1-2 without bringing out much stock. Pacific Gas Improvement remains steady at $34.25 to $34.50, and Equitable Gas is a little easier, the best recent bid being $3.12 1-2. The bank stocks, which are usually very steady, and fluctuate but little, have all developed a little stronger tone, but as these shares are held within comparatively few hands, transactions are necessarily restricted. Oceanic Steamship shares drag along very slowly with offers to sell at $16 and no buyers. Alaska Packers remains steady at $155.87 1-2 and Pacific Coast Borax is wanted at $165, with no sellers.

One of the leading notes of interest on the street is the proposed buying of the shares of capital stock of the Bay Counties Power Company by the California Gas and Electric Corporation. It is stated that 85 per cent of the stock is now pledged in favor of this transfer and will be deposited with the Mercantile Trust Company, by May 1st, 1903. For each $100 share of the Bay Counties Power Company the holder will receive $83.33 1-3 in bonds of the California Gas and Electric Company and one-half of a $100 share in the latter corporation.

The First National Bank, which is the fiscal agent of the United States, has cabled from Honolulu for $400,000 in silver coin, to continue the redemption of the old Hawaiian silver coinage. The $50,000 which was sent to Honolulu on the steamer Ventura has been exhausted. Some controversy has been occasioned by the presentation of mutilated coin for redemption, and samples have been sent to the Federal authorities for a decision.

Whitney in Tonopah

There is a good deal of talk of opening an exchange in this city for the sale of Tonopah and Alaska mines that can be guaranteed as bona fide propositions. The project is seriously suggested because of the large number of "wild cat" mines, especially in the Tonopah district, that are being advertised and that cannot pay any dividends because no work has been done on them. William C. Whitney, the New York multi-millionaire, recently secured a controlling interest in the Tonopah Mining Company, which owns all the best producing mines in the new mining camp, and he proposes to push development work rapidly. The Mizpah alone is capable of producing millions.

TO THE

UNIONS, ON THE PRESENT CONTROVERSY

San Francisco, January 19, 1903.

G. G. Vickerson, Esq.,
Bus. Mgr. Waiters' Alliance,
127 Turk St., City.

Dear Sir:

This company recognizes the principles of Unionism, that is, the betterment of labor in respect to wages, hours and other considerations which make work more human. That this is a fair statement of our position, we think our record bears us out, and the inherent standard or measure of labor must, as always, be merit and worth.

We will never stand in the way of what is beneficial to our employees, but what is beneficial is partly for them to decide. Conscience, that highest of guides, no one can assume to be for another; and we beg to submit that this is the law of liberty on which our Nation even rests.

We are sincere in wishing to do just that which will be really of the greatest good to our employees. As a proof of this fact, we may mention that we have always extended the same opportunity to our employees whether members of the Union or not.

THE PURITAN DINING ROOM CO.,
W. R. Goodbody, Pres.

San Francisco, January 27, 1903.

Marcel Wille Esq.,
Sec.—General International Union No. 24,
127 Turk St., City.

Dear Sir:

Allow us to emphasize what we have already stated, that we have never interfered with the freedom of action of our employes in joining either unions or institutions of any nature, but on the other hand, we claim we have no moral right to coerce any one by telling him that he must either join the union or leave our employ.

THE PURITAN DINING ROOM CO.,
Signed, W. R. Goodbody, President.

Sports 100 Years Ago

From the London Times of 1802.
Tuesday, Nov. 30.
Boxing.

Yesterday morning a great concourse of people flocked to the Wormwood Scrubs, about four miles from Tyburn Turnpike, to see a pitched Battle, for twenty guineas a side, between a Jew, of the name of Black Sam; a person not much in the habit of fighting, but who has long been considered an adept in the art of sparring; and a young man, a boot-closer, well known as a pugilist. Tom Jones seconded Black Sam, and Seabrook seconded his opponent. At one o'clock, the ring being formed, they set-to, with the odds six to four in favour of the Jew. The battle consisted of thirty-two rounds, and never was witnessed more severe fighting. The First Round the Jew hit the Boot-closer a violent blow on the nose, from which the blood gushed out; it appeared also bent, and he fell to the ground. The Second Round was in favor of the Christian. On the first set-to he gave the Jew a knock-down blow; however, the odds still continued on the side of Black Sam. They continued the battle until about the fourteenth or fifteenth round, without any material odds on either side, although much hard fighting had taken place. The Sixteenth Round the Jew feigned a blow at his opponent with his left hand, but struck with his right, and hit him a severe blow on the right eye, which caused it in a short time to swell and close, and he was never able to recover the sight of it during the remaining part of the Battle. The odds at this time, the same as at starting. Notwithstanding the Boot-closer had lost the sight of his eye, he continued to fight hard, and in the twenty-fifth round had the odds in his favour, having placed a severe blow on the Jew's right eye, which also closed, and they were now considered on an equality. The thirty-second round, which was the last, they both seemed determined to decide the fate of the battle; each fighting in a most savage and ferocious manner: the Jew, however, being the strongest, followed his opponent up, and placing a blow under the Boot-closer's chin, knocked him down, which finished the battle. After this severe contest was concluded, the Boot-closer lay in a state of total insensibility, and could not be moved off the ground for near an hour. This was thought at first to have proceeded from the great fatigue he had undergone, but at late as ten o'clock last night he had been attended by a Surgeon, and great doubts were entertained of his recovery. The Jew was also much beat. —The Reader.

Morgan's Poetic Ancestor

It has become quite commonplace and matter of course to have descendants and collateral relatives enjoy a reputation, literary or otherwise, on the strength of what their forbears have done, but it is not often that the tide sets the other way. There is something quite unique and oriental, therefore, in the resurrection of the poems of John Pierpont, who "flourished" as the old school books used to have it, before the middle of last century. John Pierpont had the supreme felicity to be the grandfather of J. Pierpont Morgan, and though he attained to no great heights of literary fame in his own day, after the Chinese fashion of honoring those whose descendants have done great things, the poet is coming in now for a due meed of praise. Some of the older generation may recall a few of the Pierpont effusions, as they were of the blend of sentiment and jingle which used to appeal to the compilers of school readers. The subjoined is one of the best, as well as one of the best known:

THE PILGRIM FATHERS.

The pilgrim fathers,—where are they?
  The waves that brought them o'er
Still roll in the bay, and throw their spray
  As they break along the shore;
Still roll in the bay, as they rolled that day,
  When the "Mayflower" moored below,
When the sea around was black with storms,
  And white the shore with snow.

The mists, that wrapped the pilgrim's sleep,
  Still brood upon the tide;
And his rocks yet keep their watch by the deep,
  To stay its waves of pride.
But the snow-white sail, that he gave to the gale,
  When the heavens looked dark, is gone;—
As an angel's wing, through an opening cloud,
  Is seen, and then withdrawn.

The pilgrim exile,—sainted name!—
  The hill, whose icy brow
Rejoiced, when he came, in the morning's flame,
  In the morning's flame burns now.
And the moon's cold light, as it lay that night
  On the hillsides and the sea,
Still lies where he laid his houseless head;—
  But the pilgrim,—where is he?

The pilgrim fathers are at rest:
  When Summer's throned on high,
And the world's warm breast is in verdure dressed,
  Go, stand on the hill where they lie.
The earliest ray of the golden day
  On that hallowed spot is cast;
And the evening sun, as he leaves the world,
  Looks kindly on that spot last.

The pilgrim spirit has not fled:
  It walks in noon's broad light,
And it watches the bed of the glorious dead,
  With the holy stars, by night.
It watches the bed of the brave who have bled,
  And shall guard his ice-bound shore,
Till the waves of the bay, where the "Mayflower" lay,
  Shall foam and freeze no more.

Mediocrity in Literature

The Critic contains a most interesting discussion of the status of the novel at the present time, participated in by those authors whose opinions should have weight with the reading public. The discussion is the fruit of Benjamin Swift's recent paper, "The Decay of the Novel." Mr. Swift thinks we are in a bad way because of the mournful mediocrity of the average novel. He deplores our lack of a Thackeray, a Dickens or a Scott, and reiterates the old cry,"There were giants in those days." So there were, but it is only because there were also pigmies and dwarfs that the giants attracted notice. It is true, and lamentably true, that we have an enormous quantity of poor, weak and trashy novels poured out on us every year, and that in spite of their poverty they are enormously popular, but this argues nothing. The average of every age is mediocrity. Mediocre novelists write for middle-minded readers. The writers could do no better if they would, and the readers would have none of them if they did. Mr. Swift and others who adopt the pessimistic view seem to forget that to a large percentage of the devourers of poor fiction, the class who read nothing else, reading is a new pastime. Even the outside of books is a novelty to them. They are in the mental situation of little children who are pleased with the highly colored toy books which relate the history of Cock Robin and the House that Jack Built. It is not the degeneration of the mass of readers, but the generation of a new class of readers that swells the average of the novel readers. There may be a smaller proportion of readers of the best books to what there was a generation or two ago, but not in proportion to the whole population. As to the idea that authors subordinate their genius to money-getting, that might be so in any one case, but if a writer has it in him to do good and original work he will do it in spite of himself. Undoubtedly there are manufacturers whose work is as machine-made as if it issued from a mill, but the fault is not with the times. There are, in every trade, profession and calling a number of artisans who can never become artists. In some instances they have mistaken their calling, but in others, and perhaps this is more often the case, they possess a certain mechanical facility which they put to use. They are not peculiar to this age or to any other. They live their brief span, strut across the stage, and are gone. In literature, more than in any other of the arts, there is a "survival of the fittest," but it is nonsense to profess that because the fittest survive, all were equally fit. Let any man of sixty years or upward, who has been a reader of current fiction in his adult years, recall the books and authors who were the sensation of the hour, and make a list of those which were hailed as immortal. How many of them are left? If there were any practical means of preventing the mediocre writers from writing, and the mediocre minds from reading, so that only the best minds addressed the highest intelligence, then would we have a race of intellectual giants, but as long as public schools continue to superficially smatter all that come to them, and feed them all alike on spoon-meat literature, we shall be confronted with the spectacle which grieves Mr. Swift. It is an unfortunate fact that brains cannot be created by act of legislature, and minds are not to be picked up on the bargain counter. No one who has the capacity for better things need waste time on Hall Caine or Marie Corelli, or the host of smaller luminaries, but to expect these embryotic intelligences to appreciate the good things that lie ready at hand to them is to demand more than the Creator himself has done. In the course of time all tadpoles become frogs, if they survive long enough. We cannot hasten the process of evolution.

The Bookman is calling attention to the "neglected centenary" of Harriet Martineau, but the Bookman has not given any conclusive reasons why we should concern ourselves with either the Martineau centenary, or seventy-five per cent of the other centenaries. It is a fad of the moment, and any excuse will do to hang a celebration on. Harriet Martineau was a figure in her own time. She possessed abundance of egotism and self-assertion, and although she was almost totally deaf, she insisted upon going everywhere, seeing everything and hearing all that went on. She provided herself with an ear-trumpet, into which some one of the company was obliged to shout all the conversation, and while there is little question that Miss Martineau herself enjoyed it, one cannot but suspect that the rest of the company was, to put it mildly, a trifle bored. She was taken up with the fads of her day, one of them being mesmerism, and if she were living now she would probably be a shining light of Christian Science, Theosophy, or some modern cult. She visited the United States in 1834, having gained a considerable literary reputation in England, and her two books which resulted from her sojourn in America, "Society in America" and "A Retrospect of Western Travel," were in pleasing contrast with the caustic criticisms of Mrs. Trollope.

There is what the French consider a veritable literary deluge in that country, and it is given out that so many books are already under way that the capacity of the publishing houses is exhausted, and several of them have announced that they will not accept anything more until 1904. This may or may not be the case, but we can imagine such a report going forth from America. Not only would publishers accept anything that they thought worth the risk, but they would enlarge their capacity, and new firms would spring up like mushrooms, in a night, if they thought there was a chance to gain a foothold.

A Prejudice in Paradise

There is a story in the current Lippincott of a miner who was refused admittance to Heaven. St. Peter said he had let one miner in, and he was prospecting in the golden streets and making a mess. The miner volunteered to get the other fellow out, on the condition that St. Peter let him in. He looked over the wall and called to the first man, telling him of the fine prospects in Hades. The result was that the other man vamosed from Heaven, and the new applicant got inside of the gates. This is reminiscent of a very old tale which recounts the reason why there are no Spanish saints in Heaven. The reason given in this legend is that the Spaniards smoked so incessantly that they made the Blessed Virgin's head ache. St. Peter set to work, by order, to devise some legitimate means for banishing them. Finally he gave notice of a grand bull fight to take place outside the walls, and all the Espanolas went out to see the show. Then he closed the gates, and when they sought admission they were refused. "If you prefer a bull fight to the joys of heaven," said St. Peter, "you must abide by the decision."

And, grown wary by experience, he admitted no more Spaniards to Paradise.

From Crawford's "Cecilia"

The judgments of society are rarely quite at fault, but they are almost always relative and liable to change. They are, indeed, appreciations of an existing state of things, rather than verdicts from which there is no appeal. The verdict comes after the state of things has ceased to exist.

A woman who is not really in love, generally likes a man less after he has fallen hopelessly in love with her.

Lamberti: Women are only human animals, like ourselves. The chief difference is that they do all the things we are sometimes inclined to do, but should be ashamed of doing.

Lamberti: It is very well known that people who talk of suicide and think of it a great deal, often end in that way.

Kant says somewhere that when a man turns from argument and appeals to mankind's common sense, it is a sure sign that his reasoning is worthless. Similarly, when women can find nothing reasonable to say against a fellow-woman who is pretty and well dressed, they generally say that she looks like an actress.

The Charter Busters

The Iroquois Club having resolved that Mayor Schmitz violated the organic law of the city in destroying the non-partisan character of two commissions, will institute legal proceedings of some sort. At this time the club is undecided as to what action should be taken. Perhaps it would be well to go to Sacramento and persuade the Legislature to pass an act by which it would be possible to remove a Mayor for deliberately violating the organic law of a city. That Mr. Schmitz has faith in the power of the Legislature there is no doubt, for he sent his henchman, Abe Ruef, to Sacramento to rush through a piece of legislation to enable him remove two commissioners who have been adjudged guilty of disloyalty to His Honor. What is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander. Mayor Schmitz has been adjudged guilty in the Court of Public Opinion of disloyalty to the people of San Francisco, and if he were removed in disgrace it would be a wholesome warning to future Executives. There is not the slightest doubt that he violated the charter in substituting a Republican for a Democrat on the Police Commission, and in doing so he struck a blow at one of the fundamental principles of the city's organic law. Moreover, his action was taken in the interest of a representative of corrupt machine politics, a man who is notoriously manipulating affairs of the government on the strength of his influence with Mayor Eugene Schmitz. The Mayor may plead that he merely followed a precedent laid down by no less an authority than that brilliant reformer, James D. Phelan, but no man is justified in selecting bad precedents for guidance. It is true that Mayor Phelan violated the charter. He assumed that his reputation as a reformer was such that he could kick holes in the charter every few minutes without a protest being made, but he is no longer of that opinion. When the Freeholders were at work on the charter Phelan was on the rostrum preaching the glories of civil service and of a non-partisan government. His sincerity was not questioned and he was elected to start the charter on its way. He began by blowing holes in the civil service provisions, and when Public Works Commissioner Mahoney, a Republican, resigned, Phelan showed his contempt for the non-partisan feature of the charter by appointing "God-bless-you" Maguire of the Phelan-McNab Democracy. Phelan was merely building up a political machine, just as Schmitz is now doing in a bungling sort of way, and he has been on the Peoples' blacklist ever since.

That Fresno Rate Case

Judge Kerrigan rendered a decision in the Fresno rate case last week favorable to the Southern Pacific Company, and he was promptly denounced by the enemies of that corporation. Town Talk is not an enthusiastic admirer of railroad methods. It has always deplored the railroad's activity in politics, and has never hesitated to warn the public against judges and other officials who had proved themselves tools of the big corporation, but honest judges are not so numerous that we can afford to diminish their number by rushing to the conclusion that a judge is dishonest because he found a flaw in the law which precludes the enforcement of the law against the railroad company. The law-makers and not the courts are responsible for flaws. It is the business of the courts to find them even though their discovery works harm to the State. When a judge begins resolving technicalities in favor of the people, and distorting the law for the purpose of achieving justice, he becomes unfit for the position which he occupies and a menace to the community. It requires considerable moral courage to interpret the law as it is, and it is not always the upright judge that is quick to decide against a powerful corporation. Judge Kerrigan has long enjoyed a reputation for honesty and integrity in this community; the bar has had confidence in him ever since he became a member of the judiciary, and he has never been involved in any of the scandals that have from time to time bobbed in judicial circles. As he has done nothing to justify adverse criticism, except to render an opinion in favor of the Southern Pacific Company, which opinion has the merit of sound reasoning and a logical conclusion, we cannot acquiesce in the criticism of those dailies that questioned the motives of the court. It is possible that the opinion is not sound law, but in view of Judge Kerrigan's past record we feel that public confidence in him should not be shaken merely because he decided a case in favor of the Southern Pacific Company. It is not improbable that that corporation is right once in a while.

Dangerous Business

District Attorney Byington is dissatisfied with the law relating to recalcitrant witnesses. It is not severe enough. Witnesses are not sufficiently awed and intimidated by the prospect of going to jail for contempt of court. In the opinion of our District Attorney a witness should be given the alternative of answering questions or being branded as a felon. He has therefore formulated an amendment to the code and sent it to Sacramento for enactment by the Legislature. The purpose of the measure is to make it a felony for a person to refuse to answer a question which a court has adjudged material and relevant. We have not been informed as to the maximum punishment which Mr. Byington thinks should be meted out to recalcitrant witnesses, but we should not be surprised to learn that nothing short of the death penalty would satisfy him. Heretofore judges have managed to conduct litigation successfully without any other power than that of punishing for contempt, and it has never been thought advisable to go further. It is the consensus of opinion in the legal profession that the courts are vested with sufficient powers to maintain their dignity and to enforce respect, and a proper measure of obedience. It would be hazardous to increase those powers. Judges have frequently commanded witnesses to answer questions that had no bearing on the issue, and the only purpose of which was to ventilate private affairs and subject people to disgrace. It should not be possible for a man to be branded as a felon merely because he refused to comply with the whim of a judge. There are officials who are constantly seeking to modify the fundamentals of law to meet emergencies and cover special cases. They are engaged in dangerous business and should be discouraged.

Roosevelt's Latest

President Roosevelt is now advocating a new form of strenuousness. He has started a crusade against Malthusianism. Our Rough Rider President is a believer in all-round strenuosity. He is very much worried over the only genuine "infant industry" which needs plenty of nursing, and which receives no benefit from a protective tariff. "Get children: the more the better!" is the advice which President Roosevelt gives American parents. He deplores the non-productiveness of the American mother and he asserts that the spread of Malthusian principles in the United States is threatening the ascendency of the native Anglo-Saxon-American race. He further contends that married people are not patriots if they have no children. Of course he does not include those who have good intentions. He refers to those that restrict the production of infants, and he says that those who have none, or very few children, must be suspected of ingratitude towards a government that has allowed them to marry, to acquire a competency and an opportunity to perpetuate themselves in a host of offspring. He considers the wasting of the opportunity treasonable, for it implies an intention to deprive the nation of future workers and defenders. President Roosevelt is not unduly alarmed. Nor was he the first to take note of the indifference of American men and women to the fundamental principles of sexology. The evils of malthusianism have been preached from the pulpit but there has been no organized effort to awaken interest in a question which is of the greatest moral, social and political importance. If it were not for the hundreds of thousands of immigrants arriving every year, there would be a most pronounced and alarming decrease in the country's birth-rate. The notion unfortunately prevails in some circles that a large family is suggestive of vulgarity, and that is in a measure responsible for what is mistaken for Malthusian principles. Organized effort is needed to effect a change of sentiment and President Roosevelt is well equipped for leadership.

Applying the Religious Test

To the observer at long range it looks very much as if the opposition to the seating of Mr. Smoot, the Senator-elect from Utah, was an attempt to apply a religious test, a thing which the Constitution directly and specifically forbids. Mr. Smoot is an Apostle, or Bishop of the Mormon church; he is not, and never has been a polygamist, so the objections which resulted in the unseating of Roberts a few years ago could not be urged. No charge was made against either the public record or private character of Mr. Smoot, and he was objectionable only because he was a Mormon. It was pointed out that no other denomination had ever put forward one of its clergymen as a representative in Congress, and that to permit Apostle Smoot to take his seat would be tantamount to advertising to the young men of Utah that ther only hope of political advancement was through the church. Why that inference should be drawn is not apparent, but in the matter of nominating ministers for political offices, does any one question for a moment, that if it were not for the certainty of the jealous opposition of other sects, which would combine to insure defeat, anything would keep the pulpit sensationalists in the background? As a matter of fact, Apostle Smoot probably represents his constituents more perfectly than the average Congressman, for his election was by acclamation, and apparently lacked the sack and boodle elements which generally play so large a part. Whatever one may think of the unwisdom of selecting a prominent churchman of any denomination to a seat in the national Senate, there can be no greater objection to a Mormon as a Senator than to a denominational preacher of any sect drawing a salary as chaplain. However much we may acknowledge the need of our legislative bodies to be prayed for, the members of any sect would be quite within their rights to object to the presence of a clergyman of any other sect officiating in a religious capacity. It is well to let sleeping dogs lie. There are a good many things tolerated in this world because it happens to be nobody's business to object. We accept with complacency the spectacle of the Masonic order officiating, as a matter of course, at the laying of all public corner-stones, and there has been as yet no protest against the opening of every assembly short of a ward club meeting by prayers from some Protestant minister. If we are going to have all this elbowing and loud lamenting because a Mormon, who has equal rights under the Constitution with any descendant of the Pilgrim Fathers, has been elected to represent his State, it may come out that those who are complaining because they imagine their toes are trodden on are taking up altogether too much space.

The Folly of Encouragement

Hobart Chatfield Taylor makes a humorous suggestion that writers should establish ateliers, as artists do, and take pupils to whom they can communicate their methods. It would be a good way to add to incomes, and in time would make some schools famous. The idea, in seriousness, would not be so bad if the worst point about literature now, the literature of poetry and fiction, at all events, were not imitation. Colleges and universities teach the mechanics of composition, albeit in somewhat lame and halting style, but it is beyond their capacity to supply thought or originality. When the whole question of style and method has been threshed out, and the last word has been said, the fact still remains that the sole reason for writing a novel is to tell a story, and if no story has been told the work has been futile. Immaculate grammar and impeccable orthography are of no avail if there is no soul in the thing. If there is a story, it will live in spite of the spots and patches on the garment in which it is clothed. Mr. Taylor's suggestion is not entirely new, for it is only a brief while ago that our Mr. Morrow had two or three factories running, day and night, on both sides of the bay, and he conducted, in addition, correspondence courses in the gentle art of novel-writing, but his efforts have had no perceptible effect upon the local output. What is really wanted, and wanted badly, too, is something in the nature of a discourager. When the microbe of authorship finds lodgment there is just one effective form of treatment, and that is cold shoulder and cold water. Anything short of utter condemnation is sure to be taken as fuel to feed the fires of vanity. There is no danger that any harm will come of drastic measures. If the victim really has a spark of the real fire, he will not be discouraged, and the reams of paper which he will commit to the flames will be so much practice—scales and finger exercises which will give him strength, suppleness and sureness, toward the final result. On the other hand, admiring friends and adoring relatives who give praise out of season are as ill-advised as a gardener who coddles a thistle in a hot house. Someone has lately said that the first three novels of any author should be looked upon as practice work, and never given to the public. One could look on with complacency while a good deal more than the first three effusions of the average literary aspirant were effectually put beyond the possibility of reaching any eyes but their author's.

The Universal Tip

The question of tip-giving and tip-taking has been brought up again in connection with the comments of a Washington correspondent of the practice which he says prevails in the capital, of dealers in provisions making substantial gifts to servants in order to stimulate trade. Of course the servants deny taking bribes, and the merchants indignantly assert that nothing of the kind is offered by them, but while discussions of the morals of tipping are always confined to the gratuities offered to waiters, cabmen and servants, and regarded as a somewhat unwarranted special tax, it might surprise some of those who are most indignant at the imposition if they were to take stock of the situation, and note how often they themselves accept tips, albeit not called by so plebeian a name. It is almost a mania at this time, to obtain something more than the purchase price of any article. There are the "trading stamps," in all their variety of value and color, and there is scarcely a retail store that does not deal in them. The tea and coffee stores offer premiums of varying value with each purchase, and the newspapers not only stimulate advertising by the lure of cheap jewelry and bric-a-brac, but they include "art supplements" with their Sunday editions. Merchants and stock brokers treat their good customers to dinners and theatres, and within the last three or four years we have seen bakers, butchers, grocers and liquor merchants leaguing themselves together against the Christmas gift imposition. Even the churches have fallen into line, and advertise not only salvation, but good music and seats free. Common sense ought to come to the rescue and prove to people that in the long run these things cannot be given away. It is possible that the "trading stamps," which represent a ten per cent reduction on cash purchases, may cover the interest, bad debts and bookkeeping of the credit system, and it may be that people who invariably pay cash are induced to take their custom to some special firm, but in the long run, convenience of location or other minor factors will enter as largely into the problem as the posession of a prize. One can hardly imagine people inserting unnecessary advertisements in order to carry home a ten-cent match safe, and as to the "art supplements," the number of them which can be seen lying in the gutters on Sunday morning hardly makes an argument in favor of their appreciation, but still, the custom must pay or it would not be kept up. The probabilities are that if tipping were to be suddenly stopped, the middle class householder would experience a sense of loss quite as keen as the waiter, when his accustomed perquisite has been withheld. But the attitude is an undignified one, and no better than that of little children who will go blocks out of their way to patronize a bakery which will give them a stale ginger snap as "lagniappe" when they are sent for a loaf of bread.

The Fairs and Their Millions

It seems as though the Fair heirs are never going to be permitted to spend their money in peace. They have had contests on their hands ever since the death of James G. Fair Jr. Upon his death his share of his mother's estate was claimed by his brother Charley, and there was more or less litigation over that. Then came the death of James G. Fair Sr., followed by what appeared for a time to be endless litigation, and now comes the trouble over the estate of Charley Fair. And it is by no means certain that when it is disposed of that mysterious child whose existence was vaguely vouched for by a local attorney will not bob up. However the probability is that the Nelsons will never prosecute their claims against the estate, for to do so they would first have to surrender all the money they received under the terms of the compromise. It is said that they have tendered it, but the tender is regarded as a mere bluff. From an authentic source I have received some interesting information which inclines me to the opinion that the Nelsons will never go into court to prosecute their claim. Should they appear to be in earnest their tender would be accepted, and then they would be taking more than a gambler's chance, for the evidence in the possession of the Fairs regarding the Trouville tragedy is almost conclusive of the claim that Mrs. Fair died first.

The Settlement

Since the tragic death of the Fairs in France a great deal has been written about the family of the dead woman and concerning the settlement made by Mrs. Oelrichs and Mrs. Vanderbilt with the relatives of their sister-in-law. The impression has gone forth that the unsophisticated Mrs. Nelson and her sons and daughters fell into the clutches of the cunning lawyers representing the Fair estate, and were threatened and cajoled into taking a small fraction of what they were entitled to. The fact is that though it was the theory of all concerned that Mrs. Fair died first, yet her mother, brothers and sisters were given her entire estate. Under the law the heirs of Charley Fair were entitled to the estate if it could be proved that he survived his wife. But his heirs agreed that they wanted nothing belonging to Mrs. Fair, though she had received everything that she possessed from their brother, and they contended that her heirs were not entitled to any of their brother's property. The Nelsons and Smiths were fully apprised of their rights and of what they could claim in the event of its being proved that Mrs. Fair survived her husband, but they acquiesced in the views of the lawyers for the Fair estate, and were glad to accept what was offered, a sum in the neighborhood of three hundred thousand dollars.

A Cold-Blooded Crew

The relatives of Mrs. Fair cared very little about the details of the tragedy in France. They were mostly concerned about the money. They wanted it and they wanted it as soon as possible. One of the brothers arrived one morning looking like a tramp, and he insisted that he be permitted to get away on the evening train. The lawyers had to rush things to accommodate him. It was hard to persuade old Mrs. Nelson to remain for the funeral of her daughter. When the private papers of Mrs. Fair were opened the only tears that were shed fell from the eyes of her friend, Joe Harvey. The cold-bloodedness of the sordid crew was shocking throughout their stay in this city. But that they entered into the settlement in good faith is believed by the attorneys of the Fair estate. The lawyers who are now representing them were in communication with them almost from the day of the tragedy, trying to persuade them to claim the whole estate, but they had no thirst for litigation. It has probably since been pointed out to them that it would cost them nothing to assert a claim and tie up the estate in the hope of forcing another compromise, but when it comes to giving up all the money that they received they will probably decide to quit.

A Few Side Lights

The attorneys for the Fair estate are not worried over the talk of newly discovered evidence regarding the tragedy. They have the evidence taken at the inquest, and it supports the theory that Mrs. Fair was killed first. Indeed, it warrants the inference that she was dead before Charley Fair reached the ground. She was hurled against a tree and her skull was crushed, whereas he went fully fifteen feet farther and struck the ground, his death resulting from concussion of the brain. Many facts have been brought to light concerning the Fairs since the tragedy. For instance, it was learned that both Mr. and Mrs. Fair were at the gambling tables in Trouville until three o'clock in the morning of the day of the tragedy. Mrs. Fair was having some superb gowns made in Paris with which she contemplated creating a sensation in New York, and she was anxious to get back to Paris to keep an engagement with her modiste. And by the way her plans contemplated something in the nature of a social triumph in New York. Before going to Europe she leased a handsome residence in Fifth avenue near the Waldorf-Astoria hotel, at a yearly rental of ten thousand dollars. She caused all the most costly of the furniture and ornaments in her Riverside drive residence to be transferred to the Fifth avenue house, the fitting up of which was completed on the day of the tragedy. It is said that among other things she intended engaging, permanently, a table in the very centre of Sherry's restaurant, and vieing with the Four Hundred of New York in the matter of splendor of personal adornment.

The Vanderbilts' Withdrawal

The announcement that Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt Jr. had decided to withdraw from the Hotel Fairmont enterprise occasioned a deal of surprise. Her action is susceptible of interpretation far from encouraging to Mr. Herman Oelrichs, who fathered the project. It is evident that a hitch has occurred somewhere, but this is the first indication of a break in the business relations existing between the Fair heirs. It is surprising because the project involves something in the nature of sentiment, and surely Birdie Fair, that was, is not entirely devoid of that quality. Moreover, as she has the Vanderbilt as well as the Fair millions behind her, her withdrawal could not have been prompted by fear of serious losses. In the old days Birdie Fair was known as the most generous member of the Fair family, and after her mother's death nearly all her income from her mother's estate was disbursed for charitable purposes. It was about that time that currency was given to the rumor that she contemplated becoming a nun. Today there is not a more popular young woman in the New York swim than Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt Jr. She is noted for her amiable and diplomatic qualities. Though the father and mother of her husband are separated she enjoys the confidence and affection of both sides of the house.

A Modest Plunger

The probability is that it was young Mr. Vanderbilt who threw cold water on the Fairmont hotel project, for despite his great wealth he is not inclined to take chances. His temperament is quite antithetic to that of his cousin, Reggie Vanderbilt, who bucked the tiger to the tune of sixty thousand or so in Canfield's notorious gambling house in New York. He was at Ingleside one day last week, and plunged to the extent of a five-dollar piece on one of the races. He watched the race from the club house and took his loss complacently, but when it came to betting on the next race he fumbled in his pockets for awhile and presently drew out a silver dollar. He hazarded that sum on a four to one shot and won. He discussed betting in the club house as one who regarded it as a great evil. He was told of a young man who lost four hundred dollars on the preceding day, and he appeared to be greatly horrified.

The Spreckels Sway

The members of the Gus Spreckels's party were not bidden bon voyage with so much reluctance as one would imagine from reading the gush columns of the dailies. The truth is that their departure gladdened the hearts of mammas and debutantes. As one of our society girls expressed it, "Mrs. Gus fascinated all the married men, Lurline monopolized all the eligibles and Miss Lawlor took the overflow." At every function Mrs. Gus, Lurline and the inevitable Miss Lawlor were the centre of a throng of admirers. They always held absolute sway over the men. Among the most devoted of Miss Lawlor's admirers were Harry Holbrook, Ned Greenway and Dr. Harry Tevis. At the party given by Dr. Tevis in honor of Miss Spreckels his devotion to Miss Lawlor was so pronounced as to occasion comment. Mrs. Grundy actually voiced the suggestion that their engagement would soon be announced. Miss Lawlor expects to spend considerable time in London this winter, and to sing in fashionable drawing-rooms.

Horst and Von Horst

Louis A. Horst has been paying the penalty of prominence. As Baron von Horst he had the entree to our best society, and he was getting along swimmingly until that fatal moment when he determined to become a social leader temporarily. As soon as he took the centre of the stage and the calcium was thrown on him, then the curiosity of the spectators was aroused. Inquiries as to his past began to pour in, and I undertook to throw some light on the subject. I discovered that he was a brother of E. Clemens Horst of this city, and that he did not on all occasions bear the title which won him so much attention from our local matrons and belles. The Examiner followed up my story but failed to shed any additional light on the subject. Of course society was startled to learn that there was some doubt as to the genuineness of the von Horst title, but the circumstance of the baron's having a brother who signs himself plain "Horst" does not necessarily prove that the prefix "von" is fictitious. It was just as easy for one brother to drop a section of his name as it was for another to acquire a prefix and a title.

Belongs to the Family

Baron von Horst stoutly maintains that there is no sham about his title. He says that it has been in his family since the twelfth century, and that it is surely not his fault if his brother doesn't care to avail himself of the privilege of figuring as one of the German nobility. The fact is that the baron has credentials which confirm his statements. He has, among other things, a passport on which he traveled through Germany, and which shows that he was recognized by the German government as Baron von Horst. He acknowledges that he has not always been known as Baron von Horst, but he explains that he doesn't use the title for business purposes. In other words, he has a dual capacity—social and business. He has been known in business as plain Louis A. Horst, but when capering nimbly in the ball-room he flaunts himself in the full pride and panoply of his title. The baron has been very much humiliated by the manner in which his good offices in behalf of local society have been misinterpreted.

How Ade Was Coaxed

The story comes to me from Chicago that George Ade's old-time friends object to his dramatic ventures and are coaxing him to do less for the orchestra and more for the printer. There is no doubt, however, that Ade can make dollars in comic opera where he made dimes in fables in slang—and he is not the poorest paid author in the United States by a large jugful. Ade has always written more or less stuff for the stage, but his first lucrative piece was the "Sultan of Sulu." It took some coaxing on the part of managers before he would attempt the job. His past modified failures had made him a bit leery about tackling another libretto and he was getting so much easy money from the Fables that the wolf was not exactly yapping at the door. But there came a day when he got a good idea which he imparted to his friendly persecutor at the box office. The theatrical man went away up in the air with excitement, and when he saw Ade the next day at the Chicago Athletic Club he took him around to the bar and floated some golden dreams that set the humorist to thinking. He described the fortunes that had been made from the mediocre book of "The Belle of New York," gave some figures from the box receipts from the New York run of "Florodora," and finally departed, leaving Ade in an uncommunicative but thoughtful frame of mind. Two days later the manager received at the hands of a messenger boy the following characteristic sentence in the fabologist's handwriting:

"I can use the money.

"George Ade.."

Ade, although an indefatigable worker, finds time enough to maintain his reputation as a good fellow among the Bohemians of Chicago. His headquarters is the Chicago Athletic Club, where he may be seen almost any afternoon in the company of a select crowd of writers and newspaper men to whom the goddess Fortuna has also been generous. To this coterie money has come easily of late and they dispense it as only good fellows know how. But Ade does not limit his society to the scribbling set alone. He has the quality of making himself liked that brings him into close contact with all classes. Ade has been often called the most personally popular man in Chicago.

Interesting Coincidence

I see that the "Kempton-Wace Letters" are to be brought out anonymously. What the object is, the publisher alone can tell, for here, on this coast, at all events, it is well known that the volume is the joint production of Anna Strunsky and Jack London, and the interest which attaches to the authorship is quite as great as any which can be stimulated by curiosity from anonymity. A brief while ago two stories were published almost simultaneously, with plots which were virtually identical, one written by the late Frank Norris and the other by Jack London. In the "Kempton-Wace Letters," Herbert Wace is made to maintain the argument that love is a conventional veneer of civilization, and that in the future it will not sway the minds of men and women. Frank Norris, in "The Pit," has put into the mouth of one of his characters the sentiment that the novel of the future will not be a love story, but will deal with the great enterprises and movements of the world. In Mr. London's novel, "A Daughter of the Snows," St. Vincent, who is the unworthy lover of Frona, while popular with all the women, is not a favorite with the men. Elsewhere, in "The Pit," Cressler remarks to his wife, while discussing Laura and her matrimonial future, that it is the man's man who makes a good husband. Small points, and of no importance whatever, except to those that revel in coincidence.

Mrs. Atherton's Hero

Gertrude Atherton has followed up "The Conqueror" with a selection of Hamilton's Letters, her object being to still further sanctify—one might rather say deify—their author. It is not unlikely that Mrs. Atherton has succeeded in awakening new interest in Hamilton, but only those who have time for a full and free investigation of all the facts and legends concerning him, and can read Mrs. Atherton in connection with other authorities, and those who are willing to take her account as gospel, will be apt to give further concern to anything she may have to say. After reading "The Conqueror," one feels that the author would be in full accord with that Spanish biographer of Christopher Columbus, who asserted his solemn belief that had there been no American continent in existence, God would have created one rather than that the sublime faith of the explorer should be disappointed. Evidently Mrs. Atherton is of the opinion that the Revolution and all the early struggles of the Republic were especially brought about in order to form a fitting field and background on which this one man might play his part. For that matter, if we are to take her view of the case, it is the genius of Hamilton to which we owe all that has ever been accomplished in any direction of progress. One always has to make concessions to bias and partiality in writers of history or biography, but Mrs. Atherton goes so far, in shearing every other statesman and soldier of the time of his pinions, as to suggest the thought expressed by one of the village worthies in "Adam Bede," who after they had spent a profitable hour in belauding the British and belittling the French, remarked that if the latter were really so weak and insignificant, there was no great honor in defeating them. "In the land of the blind the one-eyed man may be king."

They Believe in Spooks

The Psychical Research Society, of which Professor Price, now lecturing in this city, is a notable representative, goes in for a scientific investigation of ghosts and all sorts of supernatural happenings. The members are, or think they are, entirely free and open-minded. Their idea is to prove the truth or falsity of the stories with a supernatural background. There is a bunch of bigwigs among the Psychical Researchers. The most important, perhaps, is Andrew Lang,, though I believe Annie Besant, the disciple of Madame Blavatsky, is also a member. Andrew Lang has written several books on the subject, "Cock Lane and Common Sense" being the best known of them. The Associated Spook Seekers think they have established the existence of some genuine waifs and strays from the other world, and perhaps they have. They had one medium, a Mrs. Piper, in their ranks, in whom they placed great faith. She was not an ordinary materialist of the Sunday seance order, but believed in herself as much as the Psychical Researchers believed in her. But quite lately, within the last year or so, she has turned her back on the whole thing, and says that she was deceived, self-hypnotized or something like that. She is convinced that she wasn't under supernatural guidance.

Thought Ambrose One of Them

Some months ago the Society instituted an inquiry among the high heads to ascertain how many people really wished for another life. They wanted to get at the bottom of the idea that the belief in a future existence is a natural outgrowth of the universal wish for eternal life. Ambrose Bierce poked some of his satirical fun at them. He contended that it was absurd for them to think that they could determine anything by their researches. He said that when he was writing the most improbable stories his brain could weave a member of the Psychical Research Society had written to him for "further particulars." He added that he thought if they couldn't see the palpable invention in his tales they wouldn't know a spook if they saw one. But the society is in a vigorous condition, in spite of the skeptics.

Found His Wife in Oakland

Oakland solons are discussing the singular ups and downs in the life of William A. Richards, who has just been appointed by the President to succeed Binger Hermann as Commissioner of the General Land Office next month. Richards is well remembered throughout California. He came out here from the East as a hustling young man and for ten years, between the seventies and eighties, he tried his level best to make a go of it here; but sickness and the failure of his investments finally bowled him out and he went back to Colorado to get on his feet physically and financially. Within five years he was Surveyor-General of Wyoming and within ten years he was Governor of the State, with all sorts of holdings in cattle ranges and mines. However, he got one prize out of California and that was his wife, Miss Harriet Hunt of Oakland. He was twenty-six years old when they were married. Later Richards left Oakland and went to San Jose and there, in 1879, he was elected county surveyor on the Sand Lot ticket. It was in following up the ideas of surveying he learned while in California that he landed in the lucrative office of General Land Commissioner.

A New Engagement Announced

Informally, to the friends of both families, the engagement has been made known of Miss Ailene Ford and Mr. Louis Pierce. The marriage, I hear, will take place very soon and will be followed by a bridal trip to Europe. Miss Ford is the only daughter of the Charles Fords. She is just out of her teens and is a real beauty, not the kind that is exploited in the dailies with no pretensions to the title. She has never formally made a debut in society, but has gone about a good deal with her parents. They live at the Occidental and Mr. Ford is prominent in clubdom. They are cultured people, inclining toward ultra-Bohemia in taste. Mr. Pierce is tremendously wealthy, having inherited a fortune from his father who died a good many years ago. He is related to the San Jose Pierces, who own a big slice of Santa Clara county land. One of the three Pierce brothers, senior, died recently. He was a bachelor and left a million or two.

Mrs. Chaperon (who assists aspirants for a consideration): My dear Mrs. Gotrocks, will you invite Miss Oneslip Gay to your next dinner?

Mrs. Gotrocks (who has just succeeded in living down a past): Oh, I couldn't, you know. One has to be so careful whom one receives nowadays.

Mrs. Chaperon: But she's at Mrs. Pedigree's tea today.

Mrs. Gotrocks: Really? Well, perhaps I can manage a card for my next crush.

The Reason Why

It has been currently reported that Abe Ruef and Gavin McNab were going to establish a law partnership, but I have been told that the negotiations to that end were abandoned long ago. Ruef is a shrewd fellow and he would not accept McNab as a partner unless he was sure that the latter could "make good." Ruef is now doing a very lucrative business through his political connection with Mayor Schmitz, whereas McNab has lost his grip. When Phelan was in power McNab had many clients. He was employed by police officers to hypnotize Phelan's police commissioners, prize-fight promoters employed him to exercise his persuasive powers on the Supervisors and also on the courts, and occasionally he secured a probate case, thanks to the vigilance of the coroner's deputies, but those good times have passed. It is true that he is on the payroll of the United Railways company, but when it becomes apparent that his political power has vanished he will not hold that job, for he would never be retained on account of his legal ability. So Ruef, who is in touch with current events, could not be induced to take McNab as a partner.

Some Matrimonial Tangles

The divorce of the Baroness de Fontenillart from her husband leaves Willie K. Vanderbilt Jr. with few undivorced relatives. The baroness was Miss Mimi Smith, his mother's sister. His mother was divorced from William K. Vanderbilt Sr. and married Mr. O. H. P. Belmont, and that affair caused a big sensation, for up to that time Mrs. Belmont was the dominating figure in New York society. Her marriage with Ollie Belmont, himself divorced, caused another sensation. Her other sister, Mrs. Fernando Yznaga came to this State to procure a divorce from her husband and was the lioness of society. Later on she married George Rives of New York. Fernando Yznaga remarried and his second wife divorced him to marry Count Bela Zichy. Then young Mr. Vanderbilt's sister, Consuela, married the Duke of Marlborough, the son of divorced parents. However unhappy marriages are not inherited, as Ibsen would have us believe, for the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough and the Willie Vanderbilts Jr., though on all sides the products of most unhappy domestic conditions, dwell together in pleased content.

Salaaming to the Vanderbilts

There has been keen rivalry between Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels and Mrs. Walter Martin in the matter of paying homage to the Willie K. Vanderbilts. Mrs. Spreckels is not more than a nose ahead in the race, which has been of absorbing interest to society. She is an old family friend of the Fairs and was one of the bridesmaids when "Tessie" married Hermann Oelrichs. She has had the Vanderbilts at dinner several times. They were guests on one occasion at one of the French restaurants, and Mr. Phelan, Miss Joliffe and the Walter Martins were also present. Mrs. Spreckels looked handsome that evening and Mrs. Martin was sweet as usual in white, but Mrs. Vanderbilt is so smartly attired at all times that she makes all others look dowdy. She wore a wonderful gown of white lace with a white hat, a dog-collar of pearls and diamonds, and several ropes of pearls twisted round her neck. Her hands were covered with diamonds and rubies. Mrs. Vanderbilt looks her age, which is about twenty-seven years, and her husband looks not more than nineteen or twenty, though he is twenty-five. The evening of the Mardi Gras the same party, with the Frank Carolans added—for Mrs. Frank is a great friend of Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs—dined at the Spreckels's and attended the ball in a body.

If Anna Would Lecture

Anent the dowdiness of women in the presence of Mrs. Vanderbilt, I have heard it suggested that it would be a great boon to the women of provincial cities if Anna Held would lecture in each one she visits on "Clothes and How to Put Them On." It is admitted in Paris that styles come from the stage, and it is not surprising in view of the fact that only women of artistic temperament are successful on the stage, and that they devote more attention to the art of looking beautiful than to anything else. Though Anna Held is not a great actress she knows how to dress well, and she also knows how to impart the knowledge, a fact exemplified by the stunning Sadie girls, each of whom had the benefit of her tutelage. Be it known that when Mlle's husband, Mr. Ziegfeld, engages chorus girls he does not select them for their style and carriage. Of course they must be tall and good-looking and know how to dance and sing a little. But it is Miss Held who transforms them into the swagger Parisian friends of "Sadie." She herself selects the style and colors of the gowns they wear and as for the cut, it must be the same as little Annie's own clinging frocks. The fit must be flawless. But even the figure to fit is molded under her artistic directions. For she not only tells the girls what corsets to wear but teaches them how to put them on. It is not more than one woman in a thousand who understands this difficult art, and Anna Held is a past grand mistress of it. Elizabeth White, the Susan B. Anthony of the last Dressmakers' Convention in New York, declared "right out in meetin' " that every time she went out she saw hundreds of women whom she longed to drag into doorways and teach how to get into their corsets.

Teaches Them to Walk

But not to digress from Miss Held's capability in the art of "looking stunning," she does not stop at the gown and corsets. She teaches them how to walk. To paraphrase "Tommy Atkins":

> She takes them from the city or the farms,
> And drills 'em and dresses 'em up so neat;
> She teaches them to sway their graceful arms
> And how to walk and where to put their feet.
> It doesn't matter what they were before,
> Or what their parents fancied for a name,
> Once they join the stylish chorus and wear creations for us,
> We call them Stunning "Sadies" just the same.

After they become Anna Held girls, they are models of style and grace that American society women might do well to imitate. They have one defect—that awful swinging of the arms. Perhaps Anna has not read Gertrude Atherton's anathema of that very "bad form" habit.

Ysadora Duncan's Great Hit

Ysadora Duncan, the Californian dancer, has at last made her big hit in Europe. She always said she would, and she is a girl of indomitable pluck and energy. I remember meeting her in New York shortly after she graduated from the hands of Marie Bonfante, the teacher in things terpsichorean. At that period she was getting practical experience under Augustin Daly and just beginning to branch out as a parlor fad in society. Later Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish and others took her up and she became a great success. In those days she was thoroughly lyrical, all spring, all girlishness. She was no sylph then, by any means. She hungered for good rare roast beef far more than for sunbeams and the odor of flowers. She had a sturdy pair of limbs and beautiful feet, none too small, but in exact proportion to her body. "And I'm glad they're not small," she used to say, "for if they were I couldn't do my work." She fairly bubbled over with enthusiasm for her work and declared that her future lay in Europe. Time has proved she was right. Even then she showed shrewd business sense. I believe she still continues to be her own business manager.

Her Studies of the Nude

Even at that time she planned to go in for ancient posturings and dances rather than to follow the French high-kicking school. All the while she was making careful studies of "clotheslessness," as some people might term it, to accentuate the curves of the human body. She tried everything in the diaphanous line in order to get the most beautiful effects. Her rooms were literally stuffed with photographs of fine figures from life. On the walls hung alto relievos of antique statuary, arms, busts, legs, torsos, feet and hands in all imaginable postures. She practiced at her art for hours at a stretch and as faithfully as Paderewski on the piano. She danced with her whole body, not with her legs and feet. Her aim was a rhythmic movement of the body. She used to say that as her legs and feet did the main work they must be uncovered while the body breathed the spirit of the dance—harmony in motion. And now, according to press despatches, the German Empress has engaged Miss Duncan to teach her daughters to dance and enthusiasts in Berlin are going to build her a theatre costing two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Her Father's Great Hobby

In a way Ysadora Duncan has come by her ideas through heredity for her father, J. C. Duncan, was given to things classical. He was one of the California pioneers and came to his financial end through the disastrous smash of the Pioneer Bank. He made several trips to Europe and adorned his home here with antiques and works of art. Greek art was his hobby. While other children of Ysadora's age were listening to fairy stories her father was reading to her passages about Greek life, games and dances. Long afterwards, in New York, she herself confessed that as a little girl she used to stand before the nude statues in her father's house and try and imitate their postures. But all that life ended when her father went down in the crash of the Pioneer Savings bank. It was one of the most disastrous of bank wrecks for many poor families were ruined in its fall. Duncan was its president. He went into hiding and it was well he did, else something serious might have happened to him at the hands of the raging depositors. Detective Lees finally located his hiding place in a Kearny street lodging house. Lees went to a room and demanded that Duncan appear. He was assured that none in the place knew where the bank president was. Lees walked straight up to the bureau, pulled it from the wall and revealed Duncan crouching on the floor. The interior of the bureau had been removed to afford him a hiding place.

A Panic in the Smart Set

There was a big slump in the list of those receiving with Mrs. Eleanor Martin Tuesday last. It was the occasion of the reception in honor of Baroness von Schroeder, and the failure of many of the most fashionable of the younger element to materialize was significant. Society is cowardly when it comes to expressing an opinion or to help some one out. Tuesday Baron von Schroeder was to have been restored to his high social position which he so proudly occupied before the libel suit, but society became somewhat panicky, and Mrs. Martin with all her prestige couldn't get the situation well in hand. It happened that an epidemic of headaches broke out in the Burlingame set, and then some of those invited suddenly recalled previous engagements. Mrs. Carolan, Mrs. Gus Taylor, Mrs. Will Taylor, Mrs. Russell Wilson and Mrs. Henry T. Scott were among those that were "unavoidably absent." However all the personal friends of the Baroness, who is a very charming woman, and of Mrs. Martin, were in attendance. But with the younger element absent the tea was not a very lively affair.

Fate Overtakes the Breckenridges

News of a most startling character comes to me from Paris, of a shocking denouement to the honeymoon of the Jack Breckenridges. Though I have been unable to verify it I am assured by what I believe to be competent authority that, unfortunately, it is well founded. According to my informant the worst misgivings of those that protested against the marriage of Addie Murphy and Jack Breckenridge have been verified. It will be remembered that the parents of Miss Murphy were opposed to the marriage because of the suspicion of a taint in the blood of the Breckenridges, a suspicion that received verification in the suicide of Lloyd Breckenridge, and in the more recent mental collapse of his sister Florence. Jack Breckenridge had betrayed traces of eccentricity that were far from encouraging to those who were concerned about his welfare, and therefore when Addie Murphy eloped with him it was generally felt that the union was a rash and ill-fated one for both.

The Startling Climax

However, the young people were apparently very much in love and during their honeymoon in this city appeared to be most congenial and happy. Shortly after their marriage they started on a tour of the world, and a few weeks ago they were heard from in Paris, whence came the news that both were seriously ill. Mrs. Murphy, the mother of the bride, was communicated with by cable and she immediately started for Paris. Nobody appeared to know anything definite as to the nature of the illness that had seized the young couple, and news pertaining to the case was religiously withheld. Meanwhile the friends in this city of young Mrs. Breckenridge have been curious to know what had happened. According to the story which reached this office early in the week, she is suffering from an acute attack of Bright's Disease, and her condition a week ago was critical. And it is related that the excitement of the trip and the illness of his wife had such a disastrous effect on Jack Breckenridge that it was deemed advisable to remove him to a sanitarium in Paris. This action was probably taken at the instance of his mother, Mrs. Fred Sharon, who resides in Paris.

A Chinatown Travesty by Irwin

I heard this week that Wallace Irwin will make his first "sure enough" appearance as a dramatic writer at the Theatre Republic, which is to open as a first-class minstrel and travesty theatre on March fifteenth. Irwin, I understand, is under contract and salary to furnish all the travesties, topicals and reviews on which the theatre will specialize. It will be the policy of the house to open the night's performance with a minstrel turn, make the second act an operatic satire on some phase of local life, and to close up with a short, snappy travesty on some show which is running at the time or is still fresh in the minds of the San Francisco audiences. Irwin has prepared a first week bill which is characteristic of his whimsical pen and will contain several sensational features. The local show will be called "Chop Suey" and will be a musical Chinatown farce with a highbinder war as a motif. Jo Kane, the German comedian of "The Belle of New York" fame, will take a leading comedy part, that of a Chinatown guide, while two sporting hayseeds from Fresno will be impersonated by William Keller Mack and Charles J. Stine. Pearl Wilkerson will be Bow Leg Shin, the president, chaplain and resident physician of the Ping Pong tong, while Sydney A. Harris will play the leading juvenile role, that of T. Fumigation Daily, President of the Board of Health. Marie Lamp Adelman is the prima donna of the company and Claudia Rogers is the soubrette. The whole show will be a running satire on municipal misgovernment of the Oriental quarter, the bubonic plague scare and highbinder methods, but the grand climax of the piece will come when Mayor Schmitz, Chief Wittman and Sergeant Conboy appear to settle the Chinese question in a startlingly original manner. Wallace Irwin has written all the lyrics, topicals and choruses and the score will be by Leo Bruck.

They Both Wanted to Know

Nance O'Neil and Ashton Stevens had a passage at envelopes last week and came out with honors about even. I do not know what Mr. Stevens's reviews had done to arouse the sarcasm of the large tragedienne but at any rate a note came by messenger to Mr. Stevens one day, and it read as follows:

"By what divine right does Mr. Stevens consider himself a dramatic critic? Nance O'Neil."

Mr. Stevens sent back his reply by the same bearer. It read:

"By what divine right does Nance O'Neil consider herself an actress? Ashton Stevens."

The McCreerys Get More Riches

By the death of Mrs. Lawrence Kip in New York a large fortune comes to the Richard McCreerys. Mrs. Kip was the widow of Colonel Lawrence Kip, son of the late Bishop Kip. She inherited the business ability of her father, Peter Lorillard, but none of his generosity. Her son, Lorillard Kip, died several years ago, leaving her with only one child, Edith, who became the wife of Richard McCreery. The McCreerys will inherit several millions from Mrs. Kip.

The Mardi Gras Ball

The proprieties were strictly observed at the Mardi Gras ball Tuesday night. It has been clearly demonstrated that our society and club men are perfectly tame even when they are masked. Last year when they wore their own faces they were as harmless as Adgie's lions, and this year they failed to shock anybody. Several of society's most exclusive young women went away disappointed. One of them remarked that she had fondly expected to have at least one good story whispered into her ear, but that she heard nothing which she would be afraid to repeat to her grandmother. Comparatively few of the men availed themselves of the privilege of masking and at least a third of the women went unmasked. The latter stood around in their own faces until the grand march began. Then, their identity having been fully established and the possibility of any indignity being offered them having been wafted away, they donned demi-masks and proceeded to the ball-room. The women that went in cog covered their faces, it is true, but were so liberal in the display of neck that there was no mystery about their identity. The neck and shoulders constitute a distinct exhibit for identification purposes in many instances. For example Ethyl Hager has a neck and shoulders that you never could be mistaken about. And the same is true of Marie Wells. I believe it was Theodore Wores who said that Marie's shoulders were the only perfect pair in society.

Some of the Features

As it has been demonstrated that masks are harmless perhaps next year the directors of the Hopkins Institute will go a step further and substitute punch for circus lemonade before the supper. And then, perhaps the genuine carnival spirit will not be held in check until the wee sma' hours. Those that lingered until three A. M. had a taste of joy unconfined, for when the wine was in some of the gay spirits went in for a wide-open ball.

The decorations were worthy of all praise, and the people in the boxes formed a show in themselves. Mrs. Willie Vanderbilt had to stand a deal of rubbering. Mrs. Jim Flood, too, in her box in the upper gallery, was stared at a good deal. She was in a white evening gown, with a jeweled aigrette in her blonde hair. Mrs. Joe Tobin looked stunning and picturesque in powdered hair. Her butterfly costume was beautiful. Pearl Landers was a dainty Nedda and Mrs. Latham McMullin's Christmas costume was unique. Mrs. Adams, one of Oakland's prettiest matrons, wore a bridal gown of spangled tulle, the train carried by her little girl, in pink. Her sister, Mrs. Poore of Berkeley, was St. Valentine's Day, in a stunning costume of red and white. Miss De Young also went in a Valentine costume. One of the most novel conceptions, and which at a Pavilion masque would have won its wearer a prize, was Miss Colburn's Wild Oats. Harry Stetson and Walter Martin were among the men in hunting pink. Dr. Genthe and Fred Greenwood wore handsome costumes, but their tights were not exactly smooth fits. Amedee Joullin was magnificent as Robin Hood. Miss Therese Rooney was one of the sprightliest and prettiest girls at the ball. She wore a gorgeous Chinese dress and was very effectively disguised.

"We hardly find any persons of good sense save those who agree with us." —La Rochefoucauld.

How about the Olivina wines in sense of taste?

SPOHN--PATRICK CO.

This is the first year the Mardi Gras ball was not graced by a queen. Mrs. Pat Finigan was the first queen, Mrs. Alice Chittenden, the second, Miss Marian Froelich the third, Mrs. Arthur Barendt the fourth, Miss Joan Hadenfeldt the fifth and Mrs. Guiseppe Cadenasso the sixth. Miss Ethyl Hager was to have officiated this year but she was seized with stage fright at the prospect.

Society Shocked by Swells

In strong contrast to the polite behavior of the people at the Hopkins Institute was that of the guests at the Hager home on the occasion of the Yellow Kid ball. The very creme de la creme of our elite were invited by Miss Ethyl Hager to her little function, and there were no rank outsiders, and yet so boisterous did a few of the guests become at one stage of the festivities that their hostess was impelled to "call them down." The conduct of a few of the swells almost provoked a stampede, and it excited such severe criticism that it will be a long time before the echoes of that ball die out. It was at the supper table that the bars were taken down and that the promotion of gayety was begun in earnest. The leaders of the merry rout were those highly resplendent aristocrats, Mrs. Gus and Mrs. Will Taylor, familiarly known as the "Hopkins twins," and they had the enthusiastic co-operation of Mrs. Walter Martin.

A Sanguinetti Scene

Those three gay young matrons established a record for breezy boisterousness at the Hager ball. They were in most exuberant spirits when they began the fun by throwing bread missiles at the other guests. For awhile everybody enjoyed the fun, but presently the pelting became a little too lively, and objection was raised when the gay matrons began throwing articles of food that caused damage to wearing apparel. Miss Hager's "Zaza" gown was ruined in the sport, and Addison Mizner's coat was badly stained with butter that had been hurled at him. Dr. Zeile and George De Long also suffered some damage and presently a halt was called by the hostess. Walter Dean remarked that evidently somebody imagined that it was in order to give an imitation of a Sunday night scene at Sanguinetti's. It was unfortunate that the merry function should have degenerated into "rough-house," for it has occasioned more or less unpleasant discussion. The three merry matrons meant no harm, their only purpose being to stimulate gayety. The "Hopkins twins" are the two most unconventional young women in society, and no doubt they feel that the smart set of San Francisco is beastly slow.

The Climax

However, I am informed that as lively as the Taylor matrons made the party, it was not until Mr. Walter Martin threatened to become a little gay that the hostess called a halt. The hilarity had reached its height when that rollicking young man seized a siphon bottle, stood up and prepared to spray his hostess. Thereupon Miss Hager announced that if he pressed the trigger she would be impelled to request him to leave the house. And then became apparent that the fun had assumed a serious aspect. Explanations followed. Of course Mr. Martin was only joking. He had not the slightest intention of giving his hostess a bath. But he is a most realistic actor.

Was It Music, Heavenly Maid?

Because many women went into ecstasies over Pietro Mascagni it was inferred that they had gone music mad; that the great composer had charmed them with the fascinating harmonies that poured forth at the instigation of his magic baton; that the personality of the man appealed to the souls of his feminine auditors because they instinctively felt that he was the incarnation of the divine melodies that floated on the air, intoxicating and enrapturing them. Having heard the sotto voce remarks of women all around me at the first concert I went away with an entirely different opinion. It would probably require the boldness of a Walt Whitman to tell the whole truth about it, but candor compels me to take a more prosaic view of the matter. The fact is that the physique of Mr. Pietro Mascagni appealed to women fully as much as did the soulful harmonies that emanated from his orchestra. As soon as he appeared there was a flutter among the women and they began talking about the beautiful curves of his back, his massive, well-rounded shoulders and even his—yes, his legs—as though they were attending an art exhibition instead of a concert, and were voicing their impressions of a flesh and blood Apollo Belvedere. If the inspiring influence of music alone were responsible for the hysterics of feminine enthusiasts, isn't it strange that they never mob one of their own sex on the concert stage? And isn't it singular that they plunge into raptures only when the performer is one of the Paderewski or Mascagni type? When William Muldoon was doing his living picture stunt some years ago, the thrilling effect that he had on women was akin to that wrought by the beautiful Pietro.

The Mobbing of Peixotto

The women that mobbed Mascagni were no more demonstrative than were those that attended the warm reception given to Ernest Peixotto at the Sketch Club in California street, last Saturday afternoon. The guest of honor, being unaccompanied by Mrs. Peixotto, was at the mercy of the art-loving ladies; and from the mercy of fair women Heaven is powerless to defend a man of note, especially an artist. As for the police—! A wife, as is abundantly shown in the case of Mascagni, is a man's natural protector. A notable should find it profitable to pay his wife big pin money to go about in his behalf, green-eyed and with an obvious dagger at her belt. In all seriousness, to find a hundred different suitable answers to a hundred different (and indifferent) compliments, requires a genius which cannot reasonably be expected of a man who has great talent in some other direction. And to remain silent is out of the question; for here silence gives consent which is almost certain to be construed into overwhelming conceit. Let les belles dames sans merci who besieged the defenseless little artist but recall how they puzzled over their several pretty speeches, and then think of his case who had perforce to reply extempore to each one with something equally pretty! No wonder Mr. Peixotto intends to depart for that dear Paris where artists are as common as blackberries and honors are divided and easy. Conspicuous for a short time among the few men present was Dr. David Starr Jordan.

Mascagni in Bohemia

The Bohemian Club would not of course let Mascagni go away without adding him to the list of their distinguished "guests of honor." The Italian maestro was therefore entertained at a big dinner this week. The two Grahams—Jimmy and Donald—Dr. de Vecchi, Amadee Joullin, Giuseppe Cadenasso and several other Bohemians familiar with either the French or Italian tongue were present. Mascagni, by the way, is not the only great Italian the club has dined in state. One of the finest affairs the Bohemians ever gave was in honor of Tomasso Salvini.

olic clergyman who had just returned from a visit to the Vatican. There is nothing that that cheery old dignitary of the Vatican enjoys more than felicitating himself on the fact that he is a youth in all but years. The story is by way of illustration. A favorite Cardinal was dining with the Pope one day, and after the removal of the dessert the guest drew from his pocket the manuscript of a dissertation on a religious theme, and proceeded to read, but stuck fast at an illegible word. The Pope insisted on his handing him the manuscript, and deciphering it at once smilingly remarked:

"You see, my dear friend, at your age a man should always wear glasses. Do buy a pair. For myself, I rarely need them."

The Cardinal is sixty, the Pope well over eighty.

It is easy to be witty at another's expense. But genuine humor does not have to resort to personalities to point the witticism.

Newhall Grilled

A writer in the Oakland Tribune has been pointing out the absurdity of the interference of San Francisco business men in the matter of the appointment of a Harbor Commissioner, a subject on which I commented several weeks ago. Incidentally the Tribune writer drew a few impressionist sketches of George Newhall, the Police Commissioner, who presides over that body, in glad rags, and who is popularly regarded as one of our leading cits. Mr. Newhall inherited wealth, and as he is a prominent clubman and chairman of the Chamber of Commerce, people of humble circumstances regard him as a great financier. Mayor Phelan gave verisimilitude to the fiction by enlisting his services to start the Charter on its way. Now comes the Oakland writer to dispel the illusion. After telling the story of how the "business men" got together and insisted that a San Francisco business man should be appointed Harbor Commissioner, subsequently indorsing a Salinas politician for the job, he added that there was a chance for them to get Dr. Rowell on the Panama canal commission. About that time, "It was found that that pompous ass, George Newhall, had indorsed for the place Hugh Craig, an insurance solicitor, who didn't have a dead man's chance."

Merely Crass Stupidity

Next San Francisco had an opportunity to get a Commissioner of Commerce, the biggest thing in the country for the city and its harbor. "But," says the Oakland man, "the unconscionable Newhall hemmed and hawed and sent off to Los Angeles asking if they did not have some good man for the job down there. It's a wonder he hadn't asked Seattle. The stupidity of that over-blown windbag is past all belief, and people are coming to the conclusion that it is stupidity and not venality which causes his crookedness on the Board of Police Commissioners. You should have heard Congressman-elect Gillette cursing Newhall for an ass of asses." The Oakland man evidently sprinkles his pen with cayenne.

A Quarter of a Century Married

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Ackerman celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their marriage last Tuesday night, and entertained two hundred of their friends. They received a great variety of silver. The Ackermans have one of the most beautiful residences in the city. One of its features is a theatre with generous seating capacity. Tuesday night the guests were entertained with a fine musical program.

Art in Trade

Art is in hard luck when Martinez, who had such vogue in Paris and who was thought by many to be the foremost artist in this city, has been obliged to accept a position in a lithograph establishment. His only studio work is done on Sundays. Martinez is of the impressionist school and he makes everything in subdued tones.

A Story from Gotham

Fulton Berry, the Fresno raisin grower, was sitting in the conservatory of a New York hotel one day recently, when a colored servant came along with a watering pot. In the course of his labors he sprinkled some water on the Fresno man's legs.

"Here, what do you mean?" exclaimed Berry.

The darky jumped back.

"'Scuse me, sah," he apologized, "I thought you was a century plant."

Friction Between the Army and Society

The tabbies of the Army and the Mrs. Grundys of San Francisco society are in the throes of a merry war, which only by courtesy could be called civil. Time was when the army set kept itself frigidly aloof, and then there was no ground for criticism on either side. But the army people have been hand and glove with the local smart set ever since the Spanish-American war, which seems to have broken down the fence that formerly reared itself between the opposing sets. The present kick comes from the army side. The wives and daughters of the Presidio officers say that it's an indication of bad breeding to invite their male relatives to all the functions in town while they seldom get a card. On the other hand the ladies of civil life say that the reason the army wives and daughters fail to receive invitations to society's balls and dances is because they are so remiss in the matter of calling. "A first call must be returned," say the etiquette-encased grandmammas and matrons who will not fall into the London fashion which abolishes calls completely.

A Typewritten Declination

On one occasion two society leaders from town called upon a dozen army officers' relatives. But three of the calls were returned. On another occasion the wife of a recently arrived army officer of rank was called upon by a lady of equal standing in civilian life. The army man's wife being out, a visiting card and note of invitation to an entertainment were left for her at her hotel. The invitation was declined in a curt typewritten missive and the card received no notice whatever. But it is generally acknowledged, in the most hidebound circles, that there are a few women in the army who always do the correct thing. Those are Mrs. J. B. Rawles, wife of the commanding officer at the Presidio, Mrs. John Chamberlain, wife of the Inspector-General in the Philippines, Mrs. D. D. Wheeler, wife of the recent chief Quartermaster of this Department, and the Misses Terry, who do the honors for their brother-in-law, General Hughes, at Fort Mason.

Bread Upon the Waters

The vexed question of to call or not to call must be exceedingly difficult to answer when it has passed into a Sunday supp symposium. There are a few ways of settling it now and forever. One is, a man who has been invited to dine at a house where he knows a dinner call is expected, to send regrets. If a hostess wants the return of a call from her guests, she is not dispensing pure hospitality. She is casting her bread upon the waters with the idea that it will return with perhaps an invitation to her daughters to go to the the theatre. Everybody knows calls are bores. The average mortal, man or woman, considers an afternoon tea a bore. Why not agree to let formal calls die out? There should be no such things as social obligations. Common courtesy should be a sufficient stimulus to social intercourse.

Lieutenant Howland will depart early next week with the Twenty-fifth regiment, for the Philippines. He has been the most popular of the military beaux this winter. He expects to win the title of captain in the Orient, and if successful he will be in greater demand than ever on his return.

Are Shoulder Straps to be Tabu

Is San Francisco society about to rise in revolt against the rule of the army and navy? I should not wish to say anything rash, but it looks as though some members of our smart set are getting tired of shoulder straps and stripes. A few weeks ago a bud was heard to ask, "What's the matter with the papers, that you don't see anything in them any more but pictures of lieutenants and highbinders?" And I have heard the same murmur from other sources, too. In comparing these notes I find that in no other city are army officers accorded the prestige which they enjoy in San Francisco. It is more than equally so with the navy. At Newport and other fashionable Eastern resorts the man with the brass buttons is only knee high, if he is in things at all. This is largely a matter of wealth, as well as of family, for a lieutenant cannot keep a yacht on a lieutenant's pay. Furthermore, the European superstition that a man must be of aristocratic birth because he has rank in the Service, is all tommyrot in this democratic land of ours. The washerwoman's son and the banker's son are admitted alike into Annapolis and West Point, and although the chances are in favor of a man's being of good birth, there are plenty who graduate from these places and occupy a good place in society who, in the European sense, are rank outsiders. All of these things, then, are being taken into account by some of our more snobbish members of the smart set with the probable result that in the future more discrimination may be shown in picking out winners for the cotillions.

The Social Boom

Another one of our society girls has gone on the stage —so the dailies have said—and joined the Anna Held chorus, which, they tell us, is a remarkable achievement. To what particular clique in society she belonged, the dailies failed to tell us, and as I had never heard of her in society I imagine that she moved in some euchre club set. One of the few genuine representatives of swell society in this city that ever took to the footlights was George de Long, now of Fischer's theatre, and I never heard of his getting any booming by reason of his social prestige. Yet his social standing has never been impaired by his connection with the stage, even though it has been in a somewhat humble capacity. He is invited everywhere by our very smartest hostesses. He was at the Spreckels ball, and he has been at almost every big function pulled off since his return to San Francisco.

One of the Genuine

Miss Virginia Drew Trescott, who comes to the Theatre Republic next week in Tolstoi's "Resurrection," is a lady with a social past, but she makes no effort to exploit it for advertising purposes. A few years ago she was "Mrs." Trescott, the wife of a very wealthy citizen of one of the Sound cities of the Northwest. Having some of the blood of the theatrical Drew family in her veins she naturally developed yearnings for a stage career, and she came to this city in the hope of getting a start. She had some influential friends among the members of the Century Club, and through their influence she was enabled to make her debut in a modest part at the Alcazar. Her work was of a promising character, and she resolved to perfect herself in the dramatic art. Since then she has met with considerable success. For a time she was Frederick Warde's leading lady.

Lawyer—Madame, you say that your husband beat you black and blue.

Mrs. D. Vorseeker—Yes, sir.

Lawyer—Well, madame, show your bruises to the court.

Mrs. D. Vorseeker—Si-r-r!

Sustaining Her Record

The very latest report from Paris is that Mrs. Alice Ballard McDonald Rix O'Leary has separated from her young husband and that there is to be a divorce. The report is almost incredible because it was only a few weeks ago that I heard of their intense devotion to each other, and of the harmony that prevailed in their Parisian menage. But Mrs. O'Leary is a genius and eccentric. She has had three matrimonial experiences. Her first husband was a Mr. McDonald, by whom she had a son. Her second was Mr. Rix, who was divorced to marry her and who, after he was divorced by her, was reunited with his first wife, and the latter now speaks very highly of her. And more remarkable is the affection entertained for her by the daughter of the Rix's who lived with her during her brief marriage with Mr. Rix. Mrs. Rix is now about forty years of age and her husband is in the early thirties. She is such a brilliant woman and graceful, sparkling writer that it is unfortunate that she has not made some contribution to literature less evanescent than her journalistic work. When living at Belvedere she wrote a novel, the manuscript of which was lost in a fire that destroyed her cabin, and unfortunately she had no copy of the work.

Why Von Holleben Lost His Job

The rivalry between champagne agents causes friction in the highest diplomatic circles as well as in the smart set of this city. Dr. Von Holleben, Ambassador from Germany, who caused trouble in the Venezuelan affair and who was supposed to have been recalled in consequence thereof, was, it now appears, involved in a disgraceful scandal over the christening of the Emperor's yacht, Meteor II. A German firm of sparkling wine manufacturers, through an agent in Milwaukee, offered him twenty boxes of wine if he would use one bottle as an advertisement at the launching. To this he agreed but he failed to "make good," for Alice Roosevelt selected a French wine for the christening. The next day the Milwaukee man wired a complaint to Von Holleben who promptly replied that the German wine was to have been used but that a representative of Moet & Chandon, a French firm, had fraudulently substituted a bottle of their wine. The agent of the German firm caused this statement to be published, and he was sued for libel. During the trial the facts as to Von Holleben's conduct were brought out. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff and the story soon reached the ears of the German Emperor who recalled his Ambassador.

Crowding the Mourners

The craze for dramatized novels has become so great that it is not considered premature to discuss the dramatization of a novel before it is issued by the publisher. The New York Sun, in alluding to the fact that Denis Kearney is the latest public character to be immortalized in fiction, being the hero of Mrs. Older's novel, adds, "Report says that Mr. Kearney is pleased with the portrait, and that his daughter who is upon the stage is eager to play the heroine's role in a dramatization of the book."

Biggest Railroad Compromise

The large number of railroad disasters during the last few months have set curious adjusters and interested attorneys to speculating on the probable sums the big local transportation companies will pay out to satisfy the various demands for personal injuries. There is a wide disparity in the figures of course, for each case is built on its own particular merits and unless a person is thoroughly familiar with them it is a difficult matter to guess the mark the jury may agree on. I recall a case in court where an engineer was killed and a fireman very badly injured in a San Jose smash-up. The same jury heard both cases and exactly the same set of facts was submitted in each instance, yet the fireman got a verdict of five thousand dollars damages while the family of the engineer got nothing. The fireman had stuck to his cab while the engineer had jumped when he saw the collision was unavoidable. The railroad attorney argued that the engineer would have escaped if he had not jumped. Contrary to general opinion, the company is always seeking chances to compromise if the figures are not too stiff for the injuries received. The biggest amicable settlement on its books, that I can recall, was in the case of Colonel Harney who was the president of the Pioneer Woolen Mills. He was killed about twelve years ago while going over Tehachapi. Somewhere up in the clouds a freight car broke loose and tore down the mountain side. The Colonel happened to be standing out on the platform. The runaway battered into the rear car and the colonel was caught between the smashed platforms. For some reason the company was exceedingly anxious to settle at once. Even before the funeral a compromise was agreed on and the widow was paid thirty-two thousand dollars.

Female Looters from New England

Mrs. Hearst does not believe in fencing in her garden. The posies in her Berkeley home bloom within touch of the passer-by but the choicest flowers are never touched. The sidewalk is fringed with lemon and orange trees that are now bearing fruit. The small boys resolutely stick their hands in their pockets when passing by, for Mrs. Hearst's house is a sacred spot in Berkeley. But the other day some New England females were visiting the university, and of course they wanted to see the home of the fairy godmother. They were charmed with the novelty of seeing fruit trees bordering the sidewalk and laden with ripe oranges and lemons. One of them went into a neighboring house to borrow some sugar and the other went on a foraging expedition for glasses. Presently they were comfortably seated on the edge of the sidewalk making lemonade with lemons plucked from the trees. The indignant and amused glances of the passers-by did not in the least disturb them. When they had satisfied their thirst they helped themselves to the choicest oranges. The lady who had donated the glasses did not relish the use to which they had been put and she told the Eastern women as much. "Why, it was just as good as any you could buy!" protested one, "and think of being able to get it for nothing like that!"

CLEANING THE TOWN WITH COMPRESSED AIR.

The new method of house-cleaning, as exploited by the S. F. Compressed Air Cleaning Co., 701-703 Claus Spreckels Bldg., bids fair to put the old time styles out of business. Now one can have his home thoroughly cleaned from cellar to garret, carpets, furniture, draperies, decorations, ceilings and wall—everything that can collect dust and germs—without trouble or inconvenience in a few hours. No dirt left behind; everything cleaned up spick and span. A postal to the main office will give full particulars.

Sons in the Army and Navy

A son of Paul Neumann, a recent graduate from Annapolis, will sail for Central America today to join Admiral Glass. Young Neumann was ordered out here to join the New York but the ship had already left for Central America. Another Neumann boy, who went to London a few years ago to study medicine, became an enthusiast over the Boer cause. The result was that he gave up his medical course to fight with the patriots. Their mother recently returned from Mexico, where she visited her mother, who is of that country. Since Paul Neumann's death his widow has spent much of her time abroad, where her younger children are being educated.

He Landed a Prize

After a somewhat pyrotechnic career in this country the Earl of Yarmouth has succeeded in capturing an heiress. The Earl was on the stage in New York and proved himself a very bad actor, but he never intended to perfect himself in the mummer's art. The sole purpose of his trip to this country was to hypnotize an heiress, and he succeeded. The principal distinction of his noble house is that a bold ancestor was the original of Thackeray's Lord Steyne in "Vanity Fair." Of the same individual we are told by Byron that when he was very old it was his custom to sit on the balcony of his London house and make eyes at the milliners' girls.

Engagement Reported from Paris

Miss Marmion is a great-granddaughter of the late Rear Admiral David S. McDougal. Her mother was formerly Carrie McD. Van Voorhies of this city, who in the latter seventies was one of San Francisco's most beautiful belles. Her father is Medical Director R. A. Marmion of the navy. She is with her grandmother, Mrs. D. McD. Van Voorhies, studying vocal music in the French capital, and Mr. O'Sullivan is having his voice cultivated.

The Man in the Moon

Dear Janet wears a corsage low,
(Just to be in it),
A gorgeous half moon all aglow,
(She needs to pin it).
Now part of the pin is in the lace,
But most of it is above that place,
And wouldn't it be a great disgrace
If the moon had a man within it.

The White Rat's Nest

Every boarding house table has its butt and ours had the White Rat, a pale-faced little man with sharp features. Pretty Mrs. Zenas, who was our wit and beauty, gave this name to him when the landlady let out the fact that one of his eccentricities was a pet white rat which he kept in his room much to her disapproval. She railed at him frequently, but he essayed no repartee. He may have been in the mental state that would have caused a normal person to blush under her chaffing, but apparently nothing could bring the color to his face. His name was Peter Butler and he was a bachelor.

But though he was a single man himself he did not utterly disapprove of matrimony, for one day he brought home a spouse for the white rat. Had he been a rank unbeliever in the dual existence the white rat would have been doomed to live unmated, for Butler had its interests very much at heart.

Not long after Mrs. White Rat was given to him, the thoughtful rodent perceived that the bureau drawer which they occupied, was, so to speak, an unfurnished flat, and while it was well enough for a careless devil of a bachelor, it was entirely too bare for married quarters. Clearly it was his duty to find some furnishings. He hastily inspected his master's belongings, but found nothing suitable.

A hole in the wainscoting gave him access to the next room, where he encountered a small band of elastic that for some inexplicable reason appealed to his fancy. He conveyed this back to the drawer and Mrs. White Rat approved. Essaying once more he found in the same room another bit of cloth very much similar to the first one. Then he made his way to the room further on and by those mysterious byways which are known only to rodents, explored the entire premises.

Next morning not one of the lady boarders appeared at the breakfast table. One of the men said that his wife was a trifle indisposed, someone else's wife had neuralgia. The landlady looked worried.

Butler enjoyed that breakfast because Mrs. Zenas was not present to poke fun at him. Before he left he went back to his room to take a farewell look at his pets. When he opened the drawer he almost fell back in amazement, which very soon turned to mirth. And no wonder. The white rat had put together a nest made up of garters looted from the lady boarders. The butt at last had his secret joke on his persecutors. But he could not keep it to himself.

That evening he invited a few of the male boarders who were least objectionable to him up to see his pet. He pointed out the unique couch that the white rat had made.

The men grinned of course and gave vent to such expressions as, "Well, you old scoundrel. And we thought you were bashful! All from friends of yours?"

Butler made no reply except in chuckles. He was enjoying for the first time in his life the pleasure of being regarded as a rake, which is something more or less coveted by the average man. He all but flushed with pleasure and accepted the tribute silently.

But Mr. Zenas's eye dwelt curiously on the buckle of one of those little circlets with a hazy notion that he had seen it somewhere before. Suddenly he caught it between his finger and thumb and jerked it from the drawer, scattering a miscellaneous collection of garters, the female white rat, and at least a dozen offspring of exceedingly tender age.

There was a monogram on that buckle Y. Z., and as those were not common initials, it seemed highly probable that they stood for Yvonne Zenas.

There was something more than annoyance in the eyes of Mr. Zenas when he turned on the quaking Butler. Zenas's clenched fist was raised and a catastrophe was imminent when someone suddenly exclaimed: "Oh, look!"

Issuing from the hole in the wainscoting appeared the industrious builder of the nest. He was dragging behind him a circlet of incredible diameter, truly a garter of colossal size. The men looked from the ruined habitation to the little gatherer of material and one by one burst into shouts of laughter. Zenas laughed loudest of all.

"Even the landlady is forced to contribute," he observed. Our landlady is a dame of generous proportions from which fact he drew his conclusions.

"Well," observed another, fingering what he recognized as his wife's property. "We married men can return to our wives their—what belongs to them, but I am led to believe that Miss Halstead has also been levied upon." Miss Halstead is a spinster of uncertain age. "Now while most of the property can be returned without embarrassing anybody it seems hardly fair that she should not have back her—er—belongings, but who the deuce is to do it?"

"Let's leave them all here," suggested Zenas. "They have been replaced I believe. But Butler, you must stop that hole. Heaven knows what articles of apparel your rat will fancy next."

But Butler left the house as soon as he could arrange it. He took his pets with him, also the nest.

Vanity, Vanity, love, and insanity.
Patches, and wigs, so fine,
Out in the dark enkindled a spark,
And the fires of passion and wine.
Vanity, Vanity, smiles and urbanity.
No mask can hide my love.
Shaking I tremble, nor can I dissemble
When taking my lady's small glove.
Alack, alack, we wander back
To loving, three centuries ago;
In costumes quaint, with patch and paint,
No knight so fervent, I trow.
With high disdain she mocks my pain,
In rustling stiff brocade.
I sadly mourn for this lady highborn
And long for a humbler maid.
Was life so fleet, was bliss so sweet.
Was woman a caprice then?
Did she learn her part to steal the heart
From lonely, guileless men?
Vanity, Vanity, love, and insanity.
Silken hose may depart,
Emotions may range and fashions may change,
Unchangeable human heart.

The Modern Cinderella

Scene I.—A bal masque given recently almost anywhere in San Frisco. There is no prohibition against the men masking, and as a consequence there is more incog and more gayety than has been seen at the art school for these many years. Less than half of the men are clad in the conventional dress clothes and there are several people in the room who cannot recognize each other. In the unknown class is a Gayety Girl whom the majority of the men in the room have drawn a ring around and who, at the rise of the curtain, is throwing her toe at the chandeliers just to show that her hose are fast colors.

Petrucio (to Lothario, who stands outside the group)—Jose! wasn't that a sky-scraper?

Lothario—That kick's nothing to the one that will be coming when Mrs. Wealtherton sees her. Who is she?

Petrucio (whispering something into Lothario's ear)—They have a way of getting in, you know.

Lothario—Who brought her, do you think?

Petrucio—Some young thing, I suppose. Society's barriers are never so close that a traitor can't smuggle in an enemy once in a while.

Lothario—Well, pray for me, old chap. I'm going to take her down to the punch bowl.

The Crowd.—Bully kick! Do it again!

Ladies in the Distance—What can Mrs. Wealtherton mean by inviting such a person?

Dresden Shepherdess (waltzing with her partner close to where the masculine group and the Gayety Girl are holding forth)—Charles, come here!

Mephistopheles (leaving the bunch)—Yes, dear.

Sapho (to Carmen in another part of the room)—And who is the Gayety Girl, Mrs. Wealtherton?

Carmen—Don't speak of it, Mrs. Brannigan. She has been a great source of annoyance to me during the whole evening. I am sure she must be a—person, for I have nobody of her kind on my invitation list. Mr. Cotylian has arranged this evening for me, and I'm sure he must have been very careless to have allowed such a slip. Oh, here he comes now. I will ask him about it. (To Cotylian, who approaches): Oh, my dear Mr. Cotylian, can that be Mrs. Bannerly over there in the Gayety Girl costume?

Cotylian—No, Mrs. Wealtherton, Mrs. Bannerly has not yet arrived. The Gayety Girl must have slipped in without my notice, for I did not see her enter.

Mrs. Wealtherton—I fear she is a—person who has gotten in through some carelessness. Would you be so dear as to find out who she is, and if she is a—person, have her removed?

(Cotylian turns away with an air of determination.)

Scene II.—In another part of the ball-room.

Napoleon (to Julius Cæsar)—The Gayety Girl upset the punchbowl.

Pierrot (to Cadet)—Willie Cole's wife won't do a thing to him.

Cadet—Why? the Gayety Girl?

Pierrot—Yes, didn't you see him?

Cotylian (returning to Mrs. Wealtherton)—Nobody seems to know anything about the Gayety Girl. She is nowhere to be found. The servants say that she has already gone.

Mrs. Wealtherton—How strange!

Lothario (returning to Petrucio)—My, but she is a wild hawk! Gad! what a scandal there'll be in the papers tomorrow morning. I lured her into a cozy corner after she had kissed every man in the room and upset the punchbowl, but just as I was about to take her mask off for her she tore away from me and disappeared into a dressing room. She left this trophy, though. (Showing diamond studded garter.) It has the initials "V. B." on it—that ought to be enough to identify its owner.

Petrucio (examining garter)—Yes—that ought—to be enough—to identify her. I gave that garter to my wife last Christmas.

Scene III.—A newspaper office.

City Editor (to assistant)—Make a two column second page freak of that jewelry and clothing theft. Rush the photograph to the engravers, as it is getting late.

Assistant (sotto voce)—I thought that only actresses had the privilege of losing their diamonds for the papers. (He writes the following headlines):

STAGE

Thomas's Virile Drama

Augustus Thomas licked an editor in an Eastern town last week for referring to him as "Miss Thomas." If one had any doubt as to the masculinity and virility of Mr. Thomas, the play which is now on at the Columbia would dispel it. "Arizona" is a forceful drama, abundantly supplied with the atmosphere of the frontier settlement, and the characters and the story are handled in a manner that proclaim the familiarity of the author with the life that he depicts, together with his intense sympathy with the manners and customs of the people engaged in the upbuilding of our frontier communities. No American play ever met with such success in London as that which has attended the long run of "Arizona" in the British metropolis, and after seeing the play, being gripped by its strong story, and entering into the spirit of its theme, one can readily understand why it appealed to the Britishers. The members of the "Arizona" company make it evident that Broadway hasn't a monopoly of all the competent newcomers in the country. The company doesn't bear the Broadway hallmark, and it includes no matinee heroes or world-famous stars, but it has talent of a high order. J. W. Cope, who plays the rough and ready rancher, is a character actor of rare ability, and the Lieutenant Denton of Dustin Farnum is artistic, for though the role is that of a somewhat stilted hero there is nothing stilted in the acting of Mr. Farnum. He has sufficient temperament and magnetism to reach the dizzy height of a matinee idol some day. Miss Agnes Muir is a vivacious Bonita, and she is charming enough to make Denton's devotion plausible.

Saldierna's Return

One cannot fail to remark the improvement in the entr' acte music at the Columbia tnis week. And when you discover that Genaro Saldierna is in the leader's chair playing his little fiddle it becomes easy for you to understand. I could hardly believe my eyes when I saw the familiar rear elevation of Genaro Saldierna, for when I last saw that talented musician he was directing a big musical production at the New York theatre on Broadway. That was a year ago, and Saldierna was then regarded in New York as one of the best musical directors in the country. Saldierna is well known in local musical circles, and the Columbia management should be congratulated on having secured his services. Patrons of the Columbia may now enjoy the music between acts.

Iolanthe at the Tivoli

The San Francisco Operatic Society of amateurs used to count "Iolanthe" one of the favorites of its repertory. It is one of the lightest of the Gilbert and Sullivan operas and requires nothing ambitious in vocal flights. The comedian has the best chance to distinguish himself, and Hartman does his very best as the Lord Chancellor. Cunningham has a good song and Arthur Hahn, the new member of the company, makes a favorable impression. "Iolanthe" is full of bright wit and the music is charming, if not so catchy as that of "Pinafore" and "The Mikado." A good many inquiries, by the way, have been made as to when "Pinafore" is to be put on. Old as the hills, there are still some of the younger generation who have never heard Josephine sing of her sorry lot, or Buttercup tell how she mixed the babies up. "The Yeomen of the Guard" and "The Gondoliers" are still in reserve.

Campbell's Classic

The revival of "My Partner" at the Alcazar brings back to memory the early struggles of Bartley Campbell, the playwright. He was one of the first American playwrights to demonstrate that American theatrical managers were not in touch with the public pulse. He carried the manuscript of that play from theatre to theatre for years before it was accepted, and when it was produced it proved a most lucrative success. It was the forerunner of the numerous mining camp dramas that were the vogue twenty years ago, and though it is somewhat old-fashioned, it has in it the elements that thrill and awaken heart interest. The Alcazar stock appears to advantage in the play, and the strong situations are well handled. Ernest Hastings and Albert Morrison as the partners were in congenial roles and Alice Treat Hunt was a charming and most effective Mary Brandon.

The next bottle of whisky you buy resolve to try the "Jesse Moore." You've heard it was the best; prove it by practical test.

Ebert the Liliputian

Franz Ebert, the liliputian comedian, possesses a knowledge and love of music by no means in proportion to his size. The diminutive member of Anna Held's company spent his last afternoon in San Francisco at the Mascagni concert. It took him some time to obtain entrance by reason of his stature. There was a big crowd about the entrance and a long line of ticket buyers storming the box office when Ebert reached the Alhambra on Sunday afternoon. He stood around for a quarter of an hour or so before he succeeded in making his presence known. However he finally succeeded in gaining his ticket of admission. Ebert is a wonderful little fellow and some day a play should be written up to his talent. When he came here with the Liliputians there were others to share his starship, and on this latest trip he had not much chance to distinguish himself.

Sam Friedlander's Benefit

The big demand for seats for the Friedlander testimonial next Thursday afternoon leads the management of Fischer's to suggest to all persons who intend to take advantage of that opportunity to get twice their money's worth in genuine amusement, to speak early for seats. It is easy to get good ones now, but on the afternoon of the performance laggards will be lucky if they can secure standing room. The program has a most enticing look—the first act of "Hoity Toity" considerably enriched, the trial scene from "The Merchant of Venice" with Barney Bernard as Shylock, Miss Adele Belgarde as Portia and Mr. Paul Gerson as Antonio, and some specialties as yet unannounced. It must have been gratifying to Fischer and Rebmann, who are getting up this entertainment by way of token of their appreciation of an able manager, to have the best talent now in the city come forward so unanimously with tenders of assistance.

KOCIAN, Violinist, Alhambra Theatre, Next Week

The illness of Charles Erin Verner on the opening night of "The Parish Priest" gave Fred Butler a chance to show his capabilities. Mr. Butler assumed the leading role on short notice and made an unqualified success.

Mrs. Pat Campbell will play a short engagement at the Columbia in April, appearing in Sudermann's "The Joy of Living" and possibly repertory.

To banish the blues nothing is so efficacious as a drink of Chapin & Gore's Old Reserve bourbon or rye.

The announcement that we are to witness a production of a dramatization of Tolstoi's novel, "Resurrection," at the Republic in the second week of March, is a surprise, for we are usually vouchsafed the pleasure of seeing a play only after it has run a season or two in foreign parts. The first performance of "Resurrection" took place in London and in New York last week.

Features of Next Week's Bills

The line of ticket-buyers at the Tivoli did not diminish on Wednesday from nine o'clock in the morning until it closed at night. The four Mascagni performances will by no means be sufficient to satisfy the demand for seats. The program for the four nights, Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Sunday, will be the same —the "Tannhauser" overture, the Prelude, Dream and Intermezzo from Mascagni's opera "William Ratcliffe," the opera of "Cavalleria Rusticana" and the Hymn to the Sun from "Iris." Caro Roma will sing Santuzza, Bernice Holmes Lola, Avedano Turiddu and Arthur Cunningham Alpho. "Iolanthe" will be the alternating opera.

"Under the Red Robe" is not a play entirely new to us but Maude Odell, who will begin her starring engagement at the Grand in the Stanley Weyman romantic drama, should invest it with new interest. Miss Odell is an American actress and a favorite in the East. Gorgeous court costumes and fine scenery will be features of the production.

"Arizona" goes all week at the Columbia, to be followed by Gillette in "Sherlock Holmes." The advance sale for Gillette will open on Thursday morning.

Memoirs of Maggie Mitchell and Alice Kingsbury are revived by the announcement of "Fanchon the Cricket" as the Alcazar's next attraction. The last time it was presented in this city was at a benefit to Alice Kingsbury Cooley, the onetime star taking the title role herself. Alice Treat Hunt, on whom Ashton Stevens has set the seal of his approval, will be the Cricket. Sydney Grundy's "Sowing the Wind," which Henry Miller, Viola Allen and Isabel Irving once presented to us, will be the piece to follow.

At the California tomorrow night melodrama will reign supreme with the coming of the powerful New York play, "The Fatal Wedding," one of the big successes of the season, a heart interest play, pure and simple. It will be followed by the big Mormon play, "Corianton," which has been the subject of such wide discussion.

Tomorrow afternoon David Traitel's "Lord Strathmore," founded on Ouida's novel, comes to the Republic, with a special company of players headed by Virginia Drew Trescott. The press has been liberal in its praise of the company and its interpretation. For the second week of the engagement Miss Trescott will be seen as Maslova in Tolstoi's "Resurrection."

"Hoity Toity" has been pruned to two acts, ending at eleven o'clock. It is packing Fischer's every night.

The DeForrests, whirlwind dancers, will begin a limited engagement at the Orpheum. They are said to be better than ever this season. The Andraessen brothers, hand to hand balancers described as gymnastic marvels, will make their first appearance here. They are known as the "Danish Midshipmen" and are expected to interest local athletic circles. The Orpheum has brought out all kinds of performing animals, from Webb's seals to Lackhart's elephants, but it is said that nothing approaching Farmer Jones and his troupe of educated musical pigs has ever been seen here. Le Quatuor Basque in new selections, Reno and Richards, comedy acrobats, Louise Montrose, the dainty singing and dancing comedienne, will remain. Thomas J. Ryan and Mary Richfield will appear for the last times and Florence Bindley, the "girl in the diamond dress," will introduce new specialties, including a solo on the xylophone.

Maria Azpiroz, the little Spanish violiniste, has created a musical sensation at the Chutes. She will be heard in new selections next week. —The Playgoer.

MUSIC

The Personality of Mascagni

Maestro Mascagni, musician of parts, big, theatrical, magnetic, is a proof, pleasantly convincing, of the power of personality. Without that subtle something which our ignorance calls personal magnetism; without that fire of feeling which makes the atmosphere vibrant, melodious, and intoxicating as of a day in early spring: to undertake the baton's almost impossible task, of blending into beauty and making one the many musicians who composed Will Greenbaum's "Monster Symphony Orchestra," would have been no better than an attempt at artistic suicide. But the man has just enough of the god, the clay sufficient of the infinite fire, to make Mascagni love the impossible, and carry with a high hand to a successful conclusion an undertaking whose largeness appeals especially to an American audience, with its national fondness for a "big show" and its (alas!) indifference to the less obvious but more exquisite "fine effects." Mascagni's music is modern; the man himself is modern, almost American. Compositions such as the "Cavalleria Rusticana" give pleasant pause to the bustling, work-worn crowd of our electric life and thrills to the bent backs of the brain-fagged children of an unclassical age. We are too busy making money to make nice distinctions, to have finesse of feeling, in music, in literature, or in life. The maestro himself must have noticed, not without amusement, that accelerated movement and increased volume of sound (regardless of musical merit) called forth additional applause, and that crescendo seemed to be of itself a prime cause of acclamation. To be able to compose and play the tunes that people will dance to, and yet for art's sake to forbear, requires a self-control almost superhuman. Artistic reserve, perfection of form, nobility and purity of theme and treatment, personal humility, exaltation of art: these things are so very divine and sacred that the public will not profane them by paying for them. The spirit of our times calls into being an art appropriate to it and rejoices in the work of its own hands and calls it good. This is the day of the young, a democratic, indiscriminate day. Fine discrimination has never been in any time or land the forte of the many and may very readily become a fault of the few, making appreciation narrow and over-nice. The public is not seeking for those recherche effects which find the very centre of feeling and linger forever in the memory, and which are never recalled without emotion. The maestro, no doubt, wishes that all men were hunters of hidden beauties, but like a wise man makes the most of things as they are. What he made of things musical as they are in San Francisco was a marvel, and a proof, as I said before, of the natural magic of personality. But it is at least allowable to wonder what music Mascagni would compose and love to lead, could he make audiences to order.

When Mrs. Abbey Cheney taught music in this city she advocated the idea that the body should be trained as well as the hand and arm of the pianist. When she made her pupils study Delsarte in connection with piano technique she was looked upon as a faddist. But perhaps she was right. Look at Mascagni as he leads, and note how every motion of his body is in harmony with some movement of the composition the orchestra is rendering. Scheel used to move his hands and arms only, chiefly the hands, but every muscle in Mascagni's body is on the alert. If no sound came from the instruments, one could understand the spirit of the music by Mascagni's motions. And, apropos of Mascagni, think what a memory the man must have to direct whole programs without a note of the score before him.

We have had choruses drilled here before, for oratorios and choral concerts, but never one brought near to perfection on such short notice as the one that sang "Stabat Mater" on Sunday. The shadings were something out of the ordinary, especially considering the few rehearsals. The singers were gathered from the Loring, Von Meyerinck and other clubs, with a sprinkling of "unattached." The quartet, particularly Mrs. Northrup and Signor Wanrell, did admirable work. In the Inflammatus it was surprising how well the soprano's voice carried above the volume of sound from orchestra and chorus. In the orchestral numbers that formed the second part of the program the "Funeral March" of Chopin was the piece de resistance. It has never been played just like that before in this city.

The Fahey-McGinty Recital

An audience that filled Mauzy hall to the doors welcomed Miss Zita Fahey at her debut concert given in connection with Mr. E. V. McGinty on Tuesday night. Miss Fahey and Mr. McGinty are pupils of Joseph Greven and this concert was the tenth in a series of concerts given by Mr. Greven's advanced pupils. Miss Fahey's voice is of fine quality and she sings with dramatic expression rather beyond what one would ordinarily expect in so young a girl. Mr. McGinty also sang his numbers very acceptably. The program was divided into sacred, concert and operatic selections and in full was: Duet, Oh wert thou in the cauld blast, Mendelssohn; A Night in old Judea, Adams, Bendictus, Giorza, Mr. McGinty; "Save me oh God," Randegger, "Abide with Me," Liddle, Miss Fahey; "The King of the Winds," David, Sapphic Ode, Brahms, Mr. McGinty; Creole Lover's Song, Dudley Buck, My Desire, E. Nevin, A Song of Spring, Neidlinger, Miss Fahey; Under an Oak (Prince Ananias), Herbert, To the Evening Star (Tannhauser), R. Wagner, Mr. McGinty; Dost thou know (Mignon), A. Thomas, Gypsy Song (Carmen), Bizet, Stride la vampa (Il Trovatore), Verdi, Miss Fahey; Duet, I would that the love, Mendelssohn. Miss Fahey was particularly good in the operatic numbers, the Trovatore selection being her best number of the evening. The final duet was also well sung. Mr. Greven accompanied his pupils.

Kocian Next Week

Tho Bohemian virtuoso, Jaroslav Kocian, the phenomenal violinist whose performances in New York, Chicago and Boston have never been equaled, will give concerts at the Alhambra this week. Kocian is touring under the direction of Mr. Rudolph Aronson, the discoverer of that other famous violinist, Kubelik, who studied under the same masters as Kocian. Aronson arrived in the city early this week. Miss Julie Geyer will appear with the violinist, and Franz Spindler will be the accompanist. The programs include the most difficult and important works in violin literature. The sale of seats is now in progress at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s; prices are seventy-five cents, one dollar and one dollar and a half. The matinee on Wednesday has been especially arranged so that professional musicians occupied at the theatre Saturday afternoon may have at least one opportunity of attending. Tuesday evening's program will include the Paganini-Wilhelmj concerto in D major, Sevcik's "Fantaisie Boheme," a d'Ambrozio canzonetta, romance by Svendsen and Wieniawski's Scherzo Tarantelle. Miss Geyer will render a Schumann Novelette in E, a Rubinstein valse and Moszkowski's "Caprice Espagnol." On Wednesday afternoon Kocian's numbers will include the familiar Saint-Saens Introduction and Rondo Capriccio, which all students will enjoy, a Dumka by himself, a Tschaikowsky Scherzo valse, and Paganini's "I Palpiti." Miss Geyer will include Joseffy's Csardas in her numbers. Thursday evening there will be a Paganini Adagio and Rondo, a concerto by Vieuxtemps and other good things. The Saturday matinee will include Ernst's concerto F sharp minor.

The Clever Kilties

It's a novel entertainment that the Kilties are giving all this week at the Alhambra. If you haven't seen them you've missed a treat. They are to wind up their engagement with two performances tomorrow. The Kilties play anything from Mascagni's intermezzo to "Annie Laurie," and they are a well-balanced organization under skilled leadership. William F. Robinson is one of the best bandmasters that ever visited us, and though he isn't as sensational as some that we know, he has the knack of inspiring his musicians, and he directs them in a manner that compels performances of a high order. The Kilties give an entertainment that never drags, for the program is spiced with variety. It is interspersed with bagpipe solos, reel dancing, glee singing by a chorus in kilts, and some folk-song singing by a brawny Scot with a pleasant though untutored tenor. It is a marvelously disciplined organization, and the way those kilties work together to produce ensemble effects is truly admirable. You forget their knees while being charmed by their music.

A Clever Pianiste

There is no escaping the personality of Miss Elise Cellarius, the young pianiste who made her debut on Saturday evening last. Nature has been very kind to her, endowing her with beauty, self-possession and a strength very uncommon in one of her years. One does not expect such virile interpretation from a young girl whose dresses clear her ankles. Her power and freedom are remarkable. Her best number was the Moszkowsky Barcarolle, which was studied under the composer himself. Her Pirkert piece for the left hand alone was a remarkable tour de force. The pianiste's own composition, "Oriental Love Song," was a good bit of composition. One would have wished for a little more poetry in the group of Chopin studies, but it would be very unfair to cavil. Miss Cellarius has ample time before her and the school of Life in which to learn. Miss Aimee Cellarius assisted at the recital and played her group of selections in a finished manner. Both of the young ladies received an ovation from the audience.

Coronation Choir Glee Club and Concert Party

A novelty here will be the Coronation Choir, Glee Club and Concert Party, composed of singers who took part in the Coronation Services of King Edward VII at Westminster Abbey in August of last year. The party is composed of three boy sopranos, two male altos, three tenors and three bassos, assisted by Madame Marie Hooton, the English contralto, and Mr. Dudley Caustin, the entertainer and reader. The organization has just completed a tour of Canada and is en route to the Australian provinces. The company will be here but two days, giving concerts at the Alhambra Monday and Tuesday nights, March ninth and tenth. The programs consist of glees, madrigals and other styles of songs, with solos by various members of the organization. This is the first time that a choir of this kind has appeared in America and being the Lenten season will no doubt appeal to many who would not attend other forms of entertainments. That the Choir is authentic is vouched for by letters from Sir Frederick Bridge, organist of Westminster Abbey, and the Bishop of Toronto. Seats for the concerts, at one dollar, seventy-five cents and fifty cents, will be on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s Wednesday next.

Miss Mignon Judson, a pupil of Edward Xavier Rolker, has been singing in concert quite frequently this season. Miss Judson's voice is a rich contralto, which she manages well. She is a member of the First Presbyterian church choir, the other members of which are Miss Beulah George, one of H. B. Pasmore's pupils, Signor Michelena and Harry H. Barnhart.

The next Zech symphony concert will take place at Fischer's on March twelfth, when among other works will be presented the familiar "Russian Wedding" symphony by Goldmark, Slavonic Dance by Dvorak, a suite by Mr. von der Mehden of this city and Mr. Zech's symphonic poem, "The Rivin."

Zelie de Lussan will give two more recitals here during the latter part of next month. De Lussan closes her tour in Butte City, Montana, and will return here especially for these engagements. She will present entirely new programs and may be induced to give a performance of "Carmen."

Wenzel Kopta will give a violin recital before the Saturday Club of Sacramento on the nineteenth of March. He will be assisted by Cantor Stark, who will sing among other things Schumann's "Two Grenadiers." —The Music Critic

A Friend in Need

Sketched from Life.

Once upon a time there lived a man who had a good friend. They had been schoolmates and college mates, and their acquaintances called them Damon and Pythias because they were always inseparable.

Damon was a bookkeeper and he worked so hard during the annual stock-taking that he fell ill. He did not worry, however, for Pythias offered to substitute for him in his absence.

Finally Damon recovered from his sickness, and notified the firm that he was ready to return to work.

"I am very sorry," wrote the head of the commercial house, "but your substitute has proved so eminently satisfactory that we feel we cannot make a change just now. He has agreed to retain the position." But he did not add that Pythias had also agreed to accept a salary somewhat less than that given to Damon.

During Damon's illness, he had fallen behind in paying the interest on the mortgage on his little house. It had to go at a sacrifice, and who should step in and take advantage of the forced sale but Pythias.

"He is my good friend, after all," said Damon to his wife, "this is his delicate way of helping me out. He will return me my papers and my position together."

But Pythias failed to make good his friend's faith in him.

Damon's ill-luck followed him into his domestic life. His wife became weary of being poor and sued for a divorce on the ground of failure to provide. And, in the course of time she took a second husband—Pythias.

When Damon heard that he gave up the unequal fight against fate.

And the cynical onlooker, who had doubts of everything in existence, said, "That's what you can count on in this world when you put your whole trust in a 'friend.' You can thank God when it doesn't happen, which is once in a thousand." —The Cynic.

A NEW OAKLAND NEWSPAPER.

A new evening newspaper, the Oakland Herald, is to appear early in March. It will be devoted to the interests of Oakland and Alameda county, and will be metropolitan in equipment, with its own building, a new Goss press with color attachment, a battery of linotype machines, stereotyping and engraving plant. The publishers intend sending a free sample copy of the paper for two weeks to every person in Alameda county. Branch offices will be maintained in Berkeley and San Francisco. The San Francisco office is in the new Mutual Bank Building on Market street. F. J. Stuart is Business Manager.

WANT 7,200,000 BOTTLES.

Enormous Order for Product of a Pittsburg Concern.

Pittsburg has won another signal victory over foreign competition. A deal has just been closed which places an enormous order for bottles with a firm in this city, the largest of the kind in the history of one firm. Were the bottles to be placed end on end they would make a string about 1,500 miles long, from New York to Chicago and then back to Pittsburg.

William Lanahan & Son, Baltimore, Md., proprietors of Hunter Baltimore Rye, awarded the Pittsburg concern the contract for furnishing 50,000 gross of bottles during the year 1903. There are to be shipped fifty gross per day, and no less than three car loads per week. It will require 156 cars to carry the product from Pittsburg to Baltimore, or four ordinary freight trains.

Each bottle is twelve inches long. There will be 7,200,000 bottles, which will make a line of bottles about 1,500 miles long. Assuming that there are an average of thirty-two drinks to the bottle the order will have a capacity of 230,400,000 drinks, or about three drinks for every person in the United States. In all there will be a capacity of 1,440,000 gallons in the 7,200,000 bottles. The above speaks volumes for the popularity of Hunter Baltimore Rye.

A New Lighting Deal

The management of the Equitable Gaslight Company has announced that a proposition has been made by Reuben H. Lloyd and Garret W. McEnerney, by which shareholders of the corporation are requested to deposit their stock in escrow, giving an option to purchase at $5 per share for ninety days. If the majority of the stock is deposited Lloyd and McEnerney will put up $75,000 to bind the purchase; at the end of ninety days, if the purchase is not completed, on payment of $75,000 more the option is to be continued for a further period of ninety days, and if at the end of that time the stock is not taken, the $150,000 is to go to those who have placed their shares in escrow. At present there are 138,820 shares of the Equitable Gaslight Company outstanding; of this 87,500 is now held by a pool which was to terminate on March 1st. This stock will be placed in escrow under the foregoing agreement, and probably the same will be done with a large proportion of the 51,320 shares now outside the pool. As the amount to be paid by the parties wishing to purchase is so large in proportion to the total price of $694,100 for the outsanding shares it looks as though the sale would be quickly consummated. The purchasers insist upon a controlling interest and would be satisfied with that, but the directors of the corporation have insisted that all shareholders shall have an equal right to dispose of their stock if they so desire at the $5 a share offered. As a result of the announcement which was made on Tuesday, there was a strong demand for the stock on 'Change, and some 620 shares were sold at from $3.50 to $4.25. The ruling figure for the shares for some time has been between $3 and $3.25.

Lively Week on 'Change

The volume of business at the Stock and Bond Exchange during last week was very good and generally speaking prices have been maintained at a very satisfactory standard for the selling element. The demands of investors have been more than usually widespread and less confined to the leading securities than for several weeks past. The stability of the market is also shown in the fact that buyers have been more disposed to meet sellers' views as to prices. This has not only facilitated transactions but has added to the activity and interest in the market conditions. Although the channels for the best class of investments on this coast are somewhat narrow the local industrials and other securities are attracting more attention than ever before. For many years investments in these stocks have been largely confined to the capitalist class and a large proportion of the business has been done in New York. These Eastern investments are still a large factor but the local investments by the medium class people and persons who have accumulated a small savings account, seeking profitable investment, now constitute one of the principal elements in the financial life of the city. The local market furthermore is not so easily influenced by the ups and downs in New York as in former years and there is a steadily growing tendency on the part of San Francisco to stand alone, being subject only to the fluctuations incident to actual changes in the monetary standing or industrial activity of the corporate stocks listed here. Quite a notable advance has been effected in Giant Powder shares. This stock has advanced about $5 per share from the ruling rate of about a week ago and from present indications it does not look as though any great quantity could be purchased even at the advanced figures. During the last three weeks over 600 shares of this stock have changed hands, some of it being cash sales while quite a considerable have been at 30, 60 and 90 days. At present $71.50 is freely bid for it but there are few holders willing to sell at less than $72 and some are holding for still higher figures. Spring Valley Water shares have developed a good measure of strength and some round lots have changed hands at the present current rates. This stock has fluctuated but little during the past week and the closeness of the bidding price to the asking figure shows that there is but little difference of opinion on the subject of values. There are ready buyers at $87.25 and there is no doubt that $87.50 could be obtained without much trouble. Probably one cause of the showing of strength is the unofficial announcement that the March dividend will be paid as usual. For many years this stock was one of the steadiest on the list and the fluctuations from year to year were confined within a few dollars, the price usually ranging from $98 to $101. This was the time when dividends were a certainty every month, and the stock became very popular for investment of trust funds because of the certainty of its earnings. During the last two or three years, however, the occasional omission of dividends has weakened the character of the stock and that is the cause for the price dropping below the $90 mark. Contra Costa Water shares are in demand at $65, but there are few holders willing to sell at that price. According to street rumor a deal of considerable proportions is contemplated in gas stocks. For some time there was an effort to consolidate the Equitable Gas Company with the San Francisco Gas and Electric Corporation but for some reason or other the negotiations could not be perfected. Since that time there has been talk about a renewal of the proposition, but in a slightly different form. The San Francisco Gas & Electric Company have their gas mains laid all over the city, while the Equitable Company's mains are in certain districts only. In these sections where both companies operate there has been a sharp competition in prices and the rate war between the two corporations has been so active that neither has made much money. The offer of Lloyd and McEnerney is the first move in the direction of settling the lighting fight, but the time and the character of the next move is the question which is now puzzling holders. It is evidently a strong combination that is backing the enterprise but whether or not it is the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company is the question which is causing anxiety. If that corporation is backing it rate differences will soon be compromised, but if some other corporation or syndicate is back of the movement, the probability is that the contest over gas rates will go merrily on as heretofore. Oceanic shares are almost entirely neglected and a few days ago $5 was the best bidding price with $15 asked. Of course there were no sales and in fact there are practically no buyers. There was a fair amount of business in Hawaiian Sugar shares but values showed no material improvement although holders were not disposed to part with their stocks in large parcels. Alaska Packers' shares were held steady at $156.50 with bids at $155.50 refused. Bids for Firemen's Fund were raised to $320 but holders held out for $335. Offers for Bank shares were brisk and high but no quantity of any one institution was brought out. A bid of $202.50 for California-street Cable Company failed to attract a holder. In bonds trading was of greater volume than for some weeks past, with sales mostly confined to the electric power and railroad securities.

Financial Notes

Rumors are current that parties connected with the Realty Syndicate of Oakland are contemplating the establishment of a bank at Emeryville.

The Merchants' Exchange Bank, in liquidation, has paid a dividend of $2 per share to stockholders and the Sierra Lumber Company, an asset of the bank, has paid 40c. per share. The bank has paid up $98 to the stockholders. —The Financier

The March number of the Pacific States Investor has an interesting article on "Gold Mines, Ancient and Modern," which would indeed seem to establish the point made by the author, that there is nothing new under the sun. The question whether the mines of Solomon were located in the valley of the Nile (in which the gold mines of the Pharaohs of Egypt are being reopened), or in Rhodesia, South Africa, which also boasts of a modern and ancient gold field, is made the theme of a well-written story that makes the reader regret that it is not longer. In the editorial column the pending strife in Central America is dealt with in an intelligent and conservative way, with the prediction that the trouble will be short lived and self-limiting. The usual versatility is noted in the number and variety of the topics editorially handled, and which have contributed so markedly to the success of the paper.

No headache, no gastritis, follows the use of "Jesse Moore" pure whisky. It does one good. There is none other to equal it.

Tony Foster on Women

(From "The Wooing of Judith," by Sara Beaumont Kennedy.)

Ugly women are apt to be comfortable in their tempers; it's your pretty ones that dice with the Devil for a man's happiness and peace.

'Tis a wise man who knows when to see and when not to see. I have thought mayhap that was the secret of Solomon's success with so many women—he knew just the right moment to shut his eyes to keep from learning the deceitfulness of his wives.

I have often wondered why Providence should have been so sparing of metal when making a woman's heart; enough went into her tongue to give it a keen edge; but her heart!—no steel or flint or sand; just a soft, pudgy mud-pie that any man can dent with his finger.

A woman is always turning—turning her tongue for a stab, or her silly, soft heart for another dent. (Apropos a worm turning.)

It's not looking at a woman that sours a man, but it's summering her and wintering her, and eating the victuals she cooks.

Woman was made out of a cross-cut clay wet up with an April shower, and dried in an April sun.

For me, the test of a woman is in the mischief she makes. 'Tis said the devil went into the ark holding on to the tail of the ass; but I misjudge the book that's writ in is wrong. According to my belief, he went in bunched up in Mistress Noah's apron strings.

A woman's mind is not only without fastenings, but it is run-down-in-the-heel through too much shifting.

Women were God's first fools, and He never changed the pattern.

A woman's like a cat, you never know which way she'll jump; just as like to go backwards as forwards, or up as down. —The Reader.

Samuel Salt's Sayings

(From "Adam Rush"):

A merchant always watches the clerk who watches the clock, and the fellow who quits a job before he is through soon has no job to quit.

Well, there is more in us than we think, as Travers said when he sat down on a pin-cushion.

There's no hope this side of the grave for the man who knows it all—on the other side the Devil don't want him—the Lord won't have him.

A young man who really wants to get along must do some thinking—not only for himself, but for the man who hires him.

Sugar draws flies and politeness brings customers, but don't overdo it. For too much sweetness is worse than the measles.

When in doubt go to church, for there's nothing that lets a man think better than a long prayer and a slow sermon.

The Flame Series

"The Humpback, the Cripple and the One-Eyed Man" is the bizarre title of a booklet by Lionel Josephare, which constitutes number two of the Flame Series. The purpose of the volume may be gleaned from a single sentence in the preface: "Poetry can contemplate physical misery and lose none of its elemental grandeur, if it is true and intrinsically divine." The contents display the same originality of epithet, not always indeed well chosen, and the same defiance of conventionality which have marked the other published work of the author. The sufferings of the workingman are the theme of Mr. Josephare's muse, and it is in no light and lyric mode that she sings. "The Sovereign in the Street" is the subject of one of the longer poems; it and the one whose title is given to the booklet form the bulk of the collection. If anybody is looking for something merely pretty he should carefully avoid the present work; if he has strong convictions on social subjects and likes them forcibly expressed he will find much in it to chain his attention. [Published by A. M. Robertson.]

The Elizabethan Drama

In connection with the approaching production of "The Knight of the Burning Pestle" by the English Club of Stanford University, Elder and Shepard have issued a booklet which should prove very valuable to all who contemplate seeing the revival of a seventeenth century drama. The booklet is entitled "On Seeing an Elizabethan Drama" and contains not only a general description of the theatre of the period, but an epitome of the plot of "The Knight of the Burning Pestle," the text and music of the songs so freely interspersed amid the dialogue, and a satirical extract from "The Gull's Horn-Book," by T. Deckar, which instructs a gallant as to his behavior upon the stage of a playhouse, the station then most sought after by fops who wished to attract attention to themselves and their fine clothes. Those who are not students of the history of the drama can not possibly realize, without the aid of some such text book, how wide a gap lies between the theatre of our day and that of Shakespeare or Beaumont and Fletcher. For mechanical execution the book resembles those of the Elizabethan era, and is illustrated by several wood cuts and ornamental initials. On the whole it is a worthy piece of bookmaking and is a credit to the publishers.

Paul Potter is working on a dramatization of "Pendennis," but it looks like a thankless task. However, when the comic pictures in the Sunday supps can be staged, it looks seriously as if some one could be induced to dramatize the weather predictions. There has even been a proposition to dramatize "Sir Richard Calmady," though the author, Mrs. Harrison (Lucas Malet) has refused to consider the proposition. As she truly remarks, by way of one objection to the undertaking, they would have to resort to a dime museum to find a subject physically fitted to take the part of Sir Richard. It is the day of the dramatized novel, however, and the rule seems to be, "make hay while the sun shines," and apparently anything will do to make hay of. The "Pendennis" play is for Hare, the English actor.

Artistic bookbinding has reached a considerable height of late, and some of the daintiest things in art bookwork have been shown at the bookstores that make a specialty of that sort of thing. A very unique specimen of art bookbinding was received by Mr. George. T. Bromley the other day. It is the poem he has so often recited, "When the Cows Come Home," and the work on it was all done by hand. The pages are daintily printed in pen and ink, and illuminated in colors, and the illustrations are photographs in harmony with the text, referring to passages in the verses. The book was done by the Misses Miner of Oakland.

A New York bookseller's catalogue contains this announcement: "383.—Napolean. From Cassica to Dr. Helena, edition de luxe. Publisher's price, $4.00. Our price, $3.15." It is not unlikely that in other respects the volume compares favorably with the announcement. Editions de luxe, as a rule, appeal to the class who judge books by their covers. I believe it was Dr. Johnson who said the best editions were those which could be held in one hand and read by the fireside. With very few exceptions, outside of those which treat of art subjects and are copiously illustrated, editions de luxe are a delusion and a snare to the ordinary purchaser. To others they are snobbery and affectation.

Of the newest papers the Linen Bonds displayed by COOPER & Co. are most effective.

Here is one of Lady Bulwer's stories of the "society lady." During a pause in the conversation a lady, who is wisely left nameless, whispered to Lady Bulwer: "Who is this Dean Swift they are all talking about? I should like to invite him to one of my receptions." "Alas, madame," responded Lady Bulwer, "he has done something that has shut him out of society." "Dear me! what was that?" "Well, about a hundred years ago he died."

Small Boys' Trials

[The two Baronidis boys who were drowned in the marsh at Stege, Berkeley, the other day, belonged to that family of clever children who used to contribute to the Examiner's children's page. They are the only children who, East or West, ever showed in their letters a particle of brains or originality. This little essay, which I have preserved for some years, was written by one of the boys. I decided at the time that if ever I saw a book with Baronidis on the title page I would read it with the expectation of getting some good of it.—The Gleaner.]

THE TRIALS OF SMALL RELATIVES

CHARLEY ALWAYS GETS NEW CLOTHES, WHILE JOHNNY HAS TO WEAR THE OLD ONES OF HIS BIGGER BROTHER

(Written for the Christmas "Examiner" by Norman J. Baronidis of Berkeley, who has attained the wise age of ten years.)

A few weeks ago "The Examiner" offered a prize for the best composition on "Brothers and Sisters." A nice little boy, who wrote a very nice little piece, won the prize. The essay said how nice it was to see brothers and sisters so polite and loving to each other, giving up to the older ones and never, never quarrelling. And so it would be, only I never saw any that didn't. I think the boy that's all alone in his family is much the best off. If he wants some one to play with he can always find some of the neighbors' children, and if they quarrel, why, they can go back to their own homes and not bother him. If he is the oldest of a lot of brothers and sisters he is expected to look after the younger ones, and if his little brother gets hurt coming home from school his mother says: "Why, Johnny, I thought you'd look after your little brother better than that." If he is younger the older ones boss him, or try to, anyway. I am sure Fauntleroy wouldn't have been half such a good little boy if he'd had a whole lot of brothers and sisters bothering around after him. Just fancy him crying: "Dearest, make Marmaduke stop pinching me. Look out, I'll tell dearest on you!" I guess she'd have been only plain "mother." He wouldn't have had such a good time down at Mr. Hobbs's store, neither. He'd have had some of them brothers and sisters after him, and Mr. Hobbs would have chased the whole gang away. There's another thing. When a boy is all by himself his clothes always fit him. He don't have to wear his big brother's old overcoat because—"It's too small for Charley and just fits you, Johnny dear." Charley grows out of his things so fast he has to get new ones and let Johnny wear out the old ones. If Fauntleroy had lots of brothers and sisters he wouldn't have been dressed up so nice. There wouldn't have been enough stuff in his mother's velvet gown to make suits for all of them, like Mrs. Errol did for Cedric. I have read a story about the real Fauntleroy, the one the book was copied from, and it said that when he saw his new little brother that came suddenly one night he said: "Frow him in the fire." I wouldn't want to do that, but anyway one boy is plenty for one family. His mother has got time to read to him, tell him stories and play with him when he wants to play. When I grow up I am going to have just one boy of my own, and I'll see that he has a good time.

Again, there is the Home at Glen Ellen. It was intended for feeble-minded and idiotic children, for whom there was no provision. There were a number of little children, some only eight or nine years of age, confined in the State insane asylums, where they were thrown into contact with the adult insane, and where there was no proper means of caring for them. The asylums were over-crowded, and the children had to be discharged. The Glen Ellen institution was designed for them, and was at first known as the Home for Feeble-minded Children. But the "children" long since disappeared from the designation, and apparently, from the Home as well. Today, nearly one-third of the male inmates have to be shaved, and at the present moment one of the charges under investigation is the unauthorized removal of two "girls," who have been put to domestic service. The "girls," it appears, are aged, respectively, twenty-four and twenty-five years. The Juvenile Court means well, but there is always danger that these courts may become the adjuncts of associations for the prevention of family discipline, and made instrumental in filling homes and refuges which draw State aid per capita for their inmates. That was the immediate and first effect of their establishment in other cities, where they became the stamping grounds for professional busy-bodies and recruiting stations for public institutions. In New York a perfect reign of terror was instituted, and parents in the tenement house districts hardly dared send their offspring on the simplest household errand, lest they be called upon to show cause why they should not be deprived of their guardianship.

Roosevelt and the Navy

The naval appropriation bill reported by the Senate committee on naval affairs provides for the construction of four more battleships and two armored cruisers. The sentiments of the Senate are evidently in accord with those of President Roosevelt, who has begun to take a deeper interest than ever in naval affairs. He believes that the safety of the country and the maintenance of the Monroe Doctrine are dependent to a great extent on a heavy increase in the navy within the shortest possible time. He is making every effort to attain that end, and he has been advocating the adoption of a ship-building program that will provide for laying the keels of at least ten battleships every year for a term of years sufficiently long to bring the fleet somewhere near the standard of naval strength maintained by other Powers. The report of the Senate committee was undoubtedly inspired by the President, for it is in harmony with his policy. At a cabinet meeting last week it was disclosed that he had become concerned over the slow progress of war vessels under construction, and he directed the Secretary of the Navy to ascertain if there was not some way in which American warships could be built as quickly as those of European countries. He was also concerned over the deterioration in the quality of big gun target practice. He had examined reports which showed that the gunnery efficiency that existed when he was Assistant Secretary of the Navy had fallen off to a marked degree. At his instigation orders were issued to three naval ordnance experts to observe and report on the target work of the North Atlantic Battleship Squadron. Moreover it was decided to keep the squadron at target practice in the Gulf of Mexico for the next three months. At the same time orders were wired to Rear-Admiral Glass of the Pacific Squadron to begin a systematic course of target practice. The squadron had just arrived at Acapulco, Mexico, on its way to Honduras to protect American interests, and Admiral Glass was instructed to indulge in as much target practice as possible on his run from Acapulco to Amapala. So it is evident that the President is of the opinion that it is essential for this country to be prepared for an emergency, and that it behooves us to have a navy strong enough and efficient enough to deter any foreign Power from becoming too bold in the discussion of an international question.

Why Married Women Shouldn't Teach

"Dorothy Dix" has been taking up the cudgels in behalf of the poor, downtrodden married women, whom the New York Board of Education has very sensibly decided are no longer to keep possession of class rooms and draw fat salaries. "The Crime of Matrimony" is what Dorothy chooses as a title under which to set forth her disapproval.

> Fortunately, no such cruel fate awaits the schoolmaster who marries, and so we are left with the puzzling conundrum to answer of why matrimony is a crime in a woman, and a virtue in a man, since they have got to marry each other.

The puzzle is much less of a poser than the Dorothy Dixes would have us believe. Marriage does not debar men from pursuing their accustomed callings because it imposes no new duties which are incompatible with those already existing. When a man has taken unto himself a wife it does not devolve upon him to keep her hosiery darned, her house in order, or to have her meals ready on time. He is not set apart by nature for the function of bearing and rearing children, although, as Bartle Massey said, "It had better ha' been left to the men." Despite the opinions of the advanced women, the fact still remains, and it will take another generation or two to uproot it, that the reason and justification for marriage is the establishment of homes and the reproduction of the race. No one can carry on two opposing industries at the same time and be successful in either, much less both, and the invariable outcome of the married woman's engaging in gainful occupation is the wreck of the home. Dorothy objects to the argument that the married woman should be debarred from teaching on the ground that she has a husband to support her, because that is to degrade the public school system to the level of an eleemosynary institution, in which physical need is a higher qualification than intellectual ability, but she scarcely shifts the point, for if on the one hand the married woman is not to be debarred because she has a husband to support her, she should not be admitted merely because she has a husband to support.

The Success of American Women

In Washington the other day, an Austrian woman remarked that if she could be born again she'd marry an American husband. It is the theory of foreigners that the supremacy of the American woman at home is due to the courtesy, gallantry and humility of the American husband. They do not give the American woman credit for achieving supremacy by the force of her own personality, and yet the success of the American woman abroad is significant. Her influence is felt in more than one of the courts of Europe. Mrs. George Cornwallis West, formerly Lady Randolph Churchill, in an article in the Pall Mall Gazette points out that American women are occupying many of the seats of the mighty, "and," says she, "the most carping, jealous critics cannot find fault with the way in which they fill them. In the political, literary and diplomatic worlds they more than hold their own." And she contends that their success is greatly due to the wonderful adaptability which they display without at the same time losing their individuality. Lady Randolph Churchill is herself an example of the "adaptability" of the American woman. She is now a leader of British society, and she exercises a powerful political influence in London. An American woman is the wife of the Chief Executive of India and rumor sayeth that he owes much of his success to the diplomacy of his wife. The influence of American women is felt in the court of Berlin, and the wives of some of the most active politicians in France are natives of this country. The chief characteristic of the American woman is her versatility. Her individuality has been fostered from childhood and she has enjoyed greater freedom than is vouchsafed the girls of Europe. Consequently she becomes far more companionable than her European cousin, and being ambitious her active mind plans successfully the conquest of obstacles.

The Terrible Microbe

Dogs, cats and birds are to be excluded from the German Emperor's palaces because of the chance of their conveying infectious diseases. In these microbe-ridden times the world is growing more nervous every day, and a little more than half the time is spent in safeguarding against deadly germs. As a consequence kissing is going out of fashion, pussy is feared because she may have caught the Bubonic plague from the last rodent she tackled, the parrot is ostracized on account of a cough which may disseminate tuberculosis, and the canary's sneeze is charged with having introduced influenza into the family. It is becoming a terrible bore to keep in touch with all the precautionary measures against contagion. To the wise the unfumigated 'phone is a deadly weapon, and it is the height of folly to use an unsterilized knife or fork. The ubiquitous microbe is ever on the alert to enter the human system, and the great, all-absorbing problem of the day is to anticipate the bacillus at every turn. In view of all that modern science has revealed concerning the facilities for infection, it is impossible to comprehend how God's benighted creatures of a few generations agone managed to accumulate on the face of the earth.

Progressive Public Education

The plans for the latest new school house contain provision for an emergency hospital. This is in line with "modern progress," and quite what should be. Little by little at first, but lately with rapid leaps and bounds, the public school department has undertaken or had thrust upon it all the duties of home and church. It is an exemplification of the old adage about driving the willing horse. At first it was elementary education, the three R's, but gradually all else has been added, until the three R's have been jettisoned in order to make room for the flourishes and fandangoes. Food, clothing, baths and medical attendance have been added to simple housing. People who are today paying taxes to maintain elaborate brick and stone, steam-heated and decorated school houses can recall their own pilgrimage to the seats of learning, where the village carpenter, or the parents themselves made the desks and benches, and each child carried his billet of wood for fuel. No Legislature ever convenes without a bill presented providing for free text books, and there is always an undercurrent of agitation on the subject of free luncheons. Kindergartens and "day homes," that in England are known as "minding schools," provide clothing to be worn during school hours; it is only one step further to do as much for primary pupils in the poorer districts, and once the wedge enters, it is but a question of time when the public will be taxed to furnish a school uniform. Some of the new school houses have already been provided with expensive bathing facilities for the use of the athletic teams, and Director Roncovieri is anxious to see the system extended. New York provides a corps of trained nurses to go about and tie up cut fingers and apply dabs of vaseline to bruised shins. And so it goes, from day to day and from week to week. There is so much to be done in the matter of washing, feeding and clothing children, teaching them their prayers, if they learn any at all, coddling, coaxing and nursing them, that there was only one thing left. Now we are to be equipped for that. It is but a short half-step more to having the children born on the school premises, and the teachers acting as monthly nurses to the mothers.

The Saunterer

As It Is Lent

What a sorry spectacle is presented by the old dame of society whose ceaseless energy as a hostess is hastening her footsteps toward the grave, and who declines to submit to Time's ravages gracefully. I have in mind no one in particular; society is full of them. I doubt whether the up-to-date dowager, the old lady who feels the clutch of Time upon her person and resorts to art to conceal the calamity, is really one whit happier than her predecessors who at fifty wore caps and found in the ambitions of their younger contemporaries the greatest interest of their contented lives. Youth is the halcyon period in a woman's life, but there are compensations for the old party who has the strength of mind to be and to look herself in an age notoriously artificial and meretricious. Few, however, are there, who do not prefer to urge their maids and dressmakers to heroic efforts to assist them in simulating about thirty when the lights are carefully shaded. It is as though they hope to continue indefinitely the opportunities for winning admiration, and perhaps, even love. Now that the Lenten season is on it would be well if some of them would begin thinking of their God and a future life.

The Vanderbilts Were Bored

Society was very much shocked over the sudden departure of the Willie K. Vanderbilts. Some of our society folks imagined that they were going to stay a month or six weeks just to be entertained. The fact is that the trip to this city was made purely for business purposes and that they would have left sooner if they could have wound up the financial affairs that engrossed the attention. They regard conventional and formal social intercourse as a dreadful bore, and most of their time here was spent in dodging entertainments and making excuses for not attending functions. They are going abroad shortly and will be accompanied by Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs.

They Were There

Since the departure of the Vanderbilts it has been stated in the dailies that they did not attend the Mardi Gras ball. Those that said they saw them in the Spreckels box were told that they were mistaken. It is not a matter of vital importance whether they attended or not, but as I reported that they were there I felt that I could not have been mistaken unless I was the victim of an hallucination. The fact is that the Vanderbilts accompanied the Spreckels party to the ball and after a brief session in the box declared their intention to procure masks and appear on the floor. Thereupon they left the building and never returned. The supposition now is that they had no intention of wearing masks, and merely wanted a pretext to get away.

Why the Vanderbilts Withdrew

The withdrawal of the Vanderbilts from the Hotel Fairmont project is still the subject of comment. I have learned that though they were not enthusiastic over the project from the financial standpoint, their main purpose was to segregate the family fortunes. When the death of Charley Fair occurred and the prospect of renewed litigation arose they came to the conclusion that it was not wise to have big fortunes involved in such a way as to invite entanglement. It is the intention of Mrs. Vanderbilt to separate the interests of herself and sister as much as possible. She was willing to stand by the hotel venture while it appeared as though they would have the money left by their brother to spend on it, but now that there is likelihood of that fortune being the subject of a contest she deems it advisable to withdraw.

They Want Legs

"Frawley went away from Manila thoroughly disgusted," a San Francisco newspaper man writes me from Manila. " 'They won't stand for anything,' said Tim, 'but comic opera or burlesque. Legs will do the trick. It's too cursed hot to listen to the woes of the heroine or the rhapsodies of the hero. The audience perspires and goes out for a highball during the most thrilling moments. It is my honest belief that Manila wants legs. If the Lord spares me to return to San Francisco, I shall organize a funny show to take to Manila in the fall, the leading feature of which shall be legs. You see, there's a great lack of these ornamental parts in Manila, and the expatriated American, as well as the Englishman and the German, sighs for the shapely sights that dazzle his eyes and dizzy his brain at home. I'll give them legs galore. With twenty of the beauties I can find between New York and San Francisco I can put on a show in the Philippines which will coin money. I shall emulate James Neill and have a crest, but instead of a melancholy heraldic device, I'll have legs rampant on a field of gold.' "

Eva and the Mayor

Though the Frawleys left Manila with thin purses, they all agreed they had had the time of their lives. The pretty women of the company had no cause for complaint of the niggardliness of their countrymen in Manila, and more than one merchant and army officer has a sad debit in his ledger due to entertainment of the fair histrions. Eva Dennison carried away more trophies than did any other, and on the day of their departure she had at least six touching farewells with gallants, each of whom thought himself the favored one, and pitied his rivals. Miss Dennison's most ardent admirer, and the one who seemed closest to her heart, was "Major" Brown. Brown is one of the unique characters of the American colony. He is the wine tout for the branch house of a Jewish firm, and is himself of Barney Barnard's type. Brown is stout, very stout. He has not seen the lower button of his vest in seven years. He is not handsome, but his victoria and horses are the finest in Manila. He paid desperate court to Eva from the outset, and what with wine, carriages and flowers ad lib., and little suppers a-plenty, he set a merry and expensive pace for those others made mad by the charms of the handsome actress. When Christmas came there was a wild rush by the johnnies to offer something at Cupid's shrine which would eclipse the gifts of odious rivals. Some sent curios and others tokens of gold, but Brown was Foxy Grandpa and guessed the feminine mind well. His simple oblation was a string of diamonds which made the tributes of silk and metal look like thirty cents.

Flirted with Grant's Grandson

Miss Dennison might have had a grandson of General Ulysses S. Grant at her feet had she cared or been more diplomatic. Lieutenant Algernon Sartoris, whose mother was Nelly Grant, fell a victim to her burning stage glances but the fever left him when he found that a plebeian wine agent, whose efforts were usually directed toward speeding the festivities in Sampaloc—the tenderloin of Manila—was premier attendant in my lady's train. Sartoris met Miss Dennison after a performance. The lieutenant was carrying a swagger stick made of a stingaree's tail and strikingly trimmed with antique silver. Now if there's one thing dear to the youthful army officer in the Philippines it is his swagger stick. It is half the length of a walking stick, and usually has engraved on it the initials of the owner and the insignia of his company and regiment. Miss Dennison saw the Sartoris stick, went into ecstasies over it and it was promptly presented to her. Subsequently he invited the lady to partake of a bird and a bottle, but found that she had a previous engagement with Major Brown. So it was for several days. Sartoris found himself ever trailing fat Brown, and finally gave up the chase.

Sartoris Weary of Soldiering

By the way, Sartoris is apt to create a sensation in the United States Army. He wants to get out. He's been a soldier only a year or so but he is disgusted with the life and his prospects. Sartoris is a curious chap. He's about twenty-five years old and has spent most of his life in London. He has never earned his living but has only a small estate. He is a strange mixture of impulsive boyishness and grim blue devils. Witty, well-educated and highly cultured, the descendant of the warrior-president is a puzzle even to his intimates. His mother has found him hard to manage and a year or so ago a nice berth was found for him as an infantry lieutenant. He was full of martial spirit at first but chafed bitterly after months in a miserable hole in one of the Philippine Islands, cut off from all luxuries and even comforts, and with no society or sport other than dark-skinned Filipinos and monotonous cockfights. He lost forty pounds and was sent to Manila on sick leave. There life took on a roseate hue again, what with the club, the theatre and the pretty women and good fellows of the capital. When his leave expired he cabled to the Secretary of War his resignation. This was promptly refused, and then Algernon expended large sums in besieging by wire all his influential relatives. He cabled Brigadier General Fred Grant and his mother that it was "imperative" he be released from the army, and he openly stated that if not allowed to resign he would take flight to Hongkong and refuge with the British authorities there.

"I am a British subject," said Sartoris, "and shall claim the protection of the flag."

Marooned in Manila

Secretary Root consulted with Roosevelt, and then with the Grant family. They begged him to keep their dear boy in the army. Out of it, they did not know what to do with him. Sartoris groaned and protested but in vain. He swore that he would be attacked with melancholia, and made dismal prophecies of his filling a padded cell or a suicide's grave. As a last effort he cabled Root:

"See family. Must get out."

The next day Sartoris was prostrated by a wire from headquarters in Washington:

"Saw family. Stay in."

Sartoris had expressed his intention to go into Wall street when made a civilian again, and he also has completed a novel which is sure to make him famous. It shows keen insight into the foibles of society and the dialogue is especially brilliant. He is a handsome fellow and looks so much like Lord Kitchener that he is called "The Sirdar" by his brother officers.

Mrs. Will Crocker's Raven Rampant

The bird of ill omen that always croaks when Mrs. Will Crocker speaks of entertaining was noisier than usual this season. Mrs. Crocker intended to entertain for her niece, Elsie Sperry, and Miss Bourn whose parents are great friends of the Crockers, but the raven croaked "Not this year." Deaths in the family prevented Mrs. Will Crocker from showing the measure of her hospitality last year, and this winter her little boy took the scarlet fever.

And the Princess Poniatowski had appendicitis, supplying another note in the gloomy bird's chant.

The Morgans Were There

All our society people are not reluctant to make concessions to conventionality. There are the Morgan girls, for instance, who were eager to attend the de Lussan musicale at the Horace Hills. They were invited but as they are not quite out of mourning they hesitated before accepting, for they did not like to shock society. Finally it was suggested that they could attend the concert and hear the singing without being seen, by ensconcing themselves in the linen closet at the head of the staircase. With the understanding that they should have the freedom of the closet they accepted the invitation. However they did not escape detection.

By the way Zelie de Lussan finds that society concerts are worth while. She received four hundred and fifty dollars for singing for a woman's club in Sacramento, and I believe that she received about the same sum from the Horace Hills. Society people no longer feel that they confer great honor on professional vocalists by inviting them to their homes and then expecting them to entertain. Professional singers that have paid out good money for their musical education do themselves an injustice when they furnish entertainment at private houses without charge.

Glad-handing the Lions

The club rooms of the Spinners in Kearny street were crowded with visitors at the reception given in honor of the Peixottos on last Saturday afternoon. The attention of the women was divided between the Peixottos and Bertha Runkle, who came in late in the afternoon, a radiant picture in black velvet. Grace Llewellyn Jones, a picturesque figure in white with a strikingly artistic coiffure, paid her respects to the Peixottos and was much admired. Gelett Burgess, once the motif of so many functions of this kind, was scarcely noticed among the crowd of other notables present, and he quickly made his exit. By the way I hear that Burgess is going East the latter part of this month. Boston, where he has quite a coterie of admirers, is to be his home for the next few years.

"Us" and Their Chronicle

Juliet Wilbor Tompkins is no longer with Munsey's Magazine, of which she was one of the sub-editors. She is doing independent work for various publications. Her "Chronicles of Us" is running in one of the magazines and its characters are drawn from life. The author's sister, Elizabeth Knight Tompkins, and Gelett Burgess, are some of "Us," the others being members of a bright little bohemian clique in New York.

The McCreerys Separated

Last week I reported that through the death of Mrs. Kip the Richard McCreerys would come into a large fortune, and now I hear that the McCreerys are separated. Domestic infelicity runs in both the McCreery and Lorillard families. Mrs. McCreery is a Lorillard, her mother being the daughter of the founder of the great tobacco house. Mrs. Kip, the mother of young Mrs. McCreery, was the wife of Lawrence Kip, son of Bishop Kip. She was the sister of Pierre Lorillard, the most extravagant of New York millionaires.

New Decorative Idea

Something entirely new in decorations was introduced at the card party given last Saturday night by the Samuel Bissingers at their home, corner of Jackson and Buchanan streets. The rooms where the card tables were placed were all decorated with cards of every kind, size and description. Immense festoons of cards were strung from every side, and along the walls wherever possible were fancy cards and colored posters. The Bissingers, by the way, have been doing a deal of entertaining this winter, one or two of the affairs being in honor of their niece, Miss Elizabeth Bissinger. Theatre parties and dinners have followed in rapid succession.

Morpheus and Bucephalus

Many of the winter's debutantes are simply sleeping since Lent began, while others are trying to counteract the ill-effects of over-dining by constant exercise. Long walks are a fad again, and those girls who belong to the San Francisco Riding Club are practicing strenuously for their riding exhibition which will be a post-Lenten affair. Those who are doing the best work in practice are Miss Holbrook, Miss Lucie King and Miss Callahan.

Buckley-Stanton

Lewis Edgar Stanton, Contracting Freight Agent of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad, located in this city, and Miss Mabel H. Buckley, daughter of Mrs. Edward P. Buckley, were married last Monday by Reverend William K. Guthrie at the First Presbyterian church. They have gone to Southern California and Mexico on their honeymoon.

Miss Virginia Gibbs, who has been ill for several months, is better and able to go about. She is one of the younger Gibbs girls, all of whom look so much alike that it is difficult to tell them apart. They are generally known as "Mrs. George Gibbs's nieces."

The Naval Kissing Bug

Hero Hobson, in his lecturing tour of the West, is expected to include San Francisco in his itinerary. The Hero will probably be lionized, but he has determined to bar kissing. Hobson has been kissed in and out of season, and he says he doesn't like it. He is not striving for a record such as General Sherman enjoyed. The naval lion lately gave his version of the kissing business, and it seems likely enough. He said that when he landed in the United States after the war was over he was met by members of his own family. Some of them were so injudicious as to resort to public osculation. Then the whole assemblage followed suit, much to the Hero's disgust. He couldn't do a thing, however, but submit. Everywhere he went other silly women started the same performance, and that was how poor Hobson got his reputation.

Flowers and Jewels Galore

Though it took George Newhall a long time to decide upon quitting bachelordom, now that he is engaged he is proving himself the most devoted of lovers. Not a day passes without his fiancee receiving some token of his affection and devotion. Violets and roses are sent in abundance to the Taylor home in California street, and gifts of jewels are of weekly occurrence. Miss Taylor has received several beautiful rings and pins from Mr. Newhall, and on St. Valentine's day he sent her a superb crescent of diamonds. The pompous man of commerce is quite a different sort of chap in love.

Mizner to the Rescue

An amusing scene occurred in a Jackson street car the other day. The car was crowded, and seated on opposite sides were Addison Mizner and Horace Platt. A pretty girl of ample proportions entered, and Mr. Platt with his usual gallantry began to writhe in an effort to extricate himself from the narrow space in which he was wedged, his laudable purpose being to provide the young woman with a seat. He succeeded in getting to his feet, but Horace Platt's figure is of fashionable leanness and his seat wasn't wide enough to accommodate the average well-nourished woman. However he offered it most graciously to the pretty girl and she looked at the few inches of bench in dismay. Thereupon Addison Mizner, broad of beam and debonair, who had been watching the scene, arose and tapping Platt on the shoulder said, "Crawl back into your crack, Horace, and I shall give the lady a seat." And Mr. Platt meekly obeyed.

The Passionate Poetess

The Poetess of Passion who is expected here next week will be entertained by the literary set. It is said of Ella Wheeler Wilcox that she has lived down the effusions of her passionate past, and has done some good things recently. Though she has done some good things she has permitted her pen to drivel so much that she can never hope to live down her present. She is a relative, by the way, of the W. P. Morgans of this city, and it said that Ella Morgan was named for her.

They All Welcome Carrie

"Good Morning, Carrie," sings the cheerful gutter snipe as the Smasher from Kansas swings down the line with a reporter at her elbow to tell her where to go, and suggesting the best manner to rough things up a bit and get arrested. The San Francisco hoodlum has not had so much fun since election and Carrie, in spite of her grudge against the demon rum, is utterly impervious to joshing and greets it all with a cheerful smile. In fact she has found the San Francisco public unexpectedly good-natured, and in the average case she has been invited into saloons instead of being driven forth with force and arms. All up and down the line the Rum Fiend has been suspiciously cheerful at the invasion of Carrie. The fact is that the saloon men appreciate the advertising. A Geary street saloon keeper told me this week that a visit from Carrie was better than a column display in the Sunday papers. Carrie had wiped off the bar with her Bible a few hours before, and as a consequence people thronged the place to see the real broken glass left by a real temperance cyclone from Kansas. Now, to bring an extra crowd of from fifty to five hundred people into a saloon in an evening means an increase in trade of from ten to a hundred drinks, for the crowd that follows in the wake of Carrie is not a temperance gang—not by many a bumper. The saloons that have been Carrienationed have taken pains to get their names and addresses in the papers, and I am told that a reporter was offered a large bribe not to forget a certain place which had fallen prey to the wielder. "Gee!" remarked a rum dispenser when he heard of Carrie's arrest, "it's a shame to put so good a woman in jail. Why, in my opinion she's underpaid. She came into my place last night and gave a free lecture that increased my business seventy-five dollars' worth for the evening. The saloon men of this city ought to chip in and give the old girl a

That Crimmins Baby

How fantastic are the tricks Madame La Bavarde seeks to play with our society people. Referring to the visit of the stork to the Crimmins home she deliberately trifles with the sex of the baby. Among other things she suggested that the little "heiress" should be christened "Margaret" after the mother. Mrs. Crimmins's baby is a boy, and despite his tender age would no doubt resent quite lustily any effort on the part of Madame La Bavarde or any other meddlesome person to change his sex. He will probably be christened Martin.

The Breckenridge Tragedy

It was rather a strange story that appeared in the despatches Thursday, of the accident that happened to young Jack Breckenridge in Paris. Overcome by a fit of vertigo he fell from the second story of the Hotel d'Abbe and received only a slight bruise on his back. He did not even lose consciousness. The last I heard of Jack Breckenridge he was in a sanitarium in Paris, but it now appears that he recovered from the mental disorder from which he was suffering. However, the attack of vertigo suggests that he is far from being in sound condition. The friends of young Mrs. Breckenridge, whose romance came to such a tragic end in Paris, are eager for news as to her condition, but the reports that have been received are meagre and vague. No doubt the relatives of both Breckenridge and his wife desire to keep the sad details from the public.

Generosity Not of the Rich

The parishioners of St. Brigid's church in Van Ness avenue are rejoicing with their pastor, Rev. Father Cottle, over the prospect of the completion of the sacred edifice. The work of constructing the church was started about five years ago, and a halt was called owing to the lack of capital, about the time the basement was completed. A temporary roof was then spread over the basement and beneath it services have been held ever since. There are several millianaires among the parishioners and one or two of them have made handsome contributions to the fund for the completion of the church but the others could never be prevailed upon to "loosen up." However Father Cottle has perfected a financial plan whereby sufficient money is to be raised and the work on the building was lately resumed. He has announced that it is the poor and not the rich that have volunteered to defray the cost of completing the work.

An Indignant Sculptor

There has been a clash between art and commerce in the Bohemian Club. One of the merchant princes of the club, a gentleman who is known as an art connoisseur and a patron of art, has given serious offense to Bobby Aitken, the distinguished young sculptor who rattled the dry bones of the local art world a year or so ago. The merchant asked Aitken to make a bas-relief of his daughter and the sculptor gladly consented to do so. When the work was almost completed and the artist was putting on the finishing touches, the merchant asked him to send in his bill. He was well satisfied with the work and was ready to pay for it. Aitken, so the story goes, said that he had no intention of charging for it; that he wished to present it to his friend.

"I cannot consent to that," said the patron of art. "Art should be encouraged in the club, and the best way to do it is for those that have the money to buy the works of the artists. I insist that you send in your bill."

Aitken thought the matter over. He would have charged, ordinarily, one hundred and fifty dollars for the bas-relief, but as his patron was a fellow member and an officer of his club he decided to cut the price in half. He sent in a bill for seventy-five, but much to his amazement he received an indignant letter telling him that the price charged was exorbitant. The merchant prince expressed a willingness to pay twenty-five dollars. Hence Aitken's indignation. I have been told that he has decided not to surrender the bas-relief.

It is reported in an Eastern paper that since Mlle. de Lussan's arrival in this city she has received the attentions of a well-known society and club man who lost his heart to her upon her visit several years ago; also that there are rumors that his faithfulness will at last be rewarded. How about that mysterious Brazilian millionaire to whom the charming singer was supposed to be engaged?

Cupid in California

Cupid, it seems, has been making free of the Stanford University quad. Nor does the sanctity of the Library itself, that holiest of holies, suffice to overawe the gracious god. In all his notorious nakedness he passes to and fro "forninst" fair co-eds and brawny footballers, coming between them and their books and throwing them into a pink study instead of a brown one. The scamp must go warily, a god in disguise, or else get his wings clipt. So says President Jordan. Now it seems to me that the learned doctor is thereby placing himself in the position of locksmith. Can it be that the head of one of our great universities is not aware of the divine discipline that lies in the intensive study, according to the source method, of the human heart? No man or woman can be truly cultured until he or she has known the liberal education of love. A university is a place to fit one for life. From that greater university no one may graduate until Cupid shall have signed the parchment. Put a stop to love-making! I can see you doing it, Mrs. David Starr Partington-Jordan!

Cupid Abroad

In the quaint school-town of Portarlington, Queen's county, Ireland, there once lived the venerable old maid, the Very Reverend, the Dean De Puritan. Now it had pleased Providence to place in the aforesaid town two boarding-schools and but one Episcopal church. The good, the very good, the goody-good dean would not have caviled at the divine ordering of things, had it not been for the fact that the schools were of different sexes. That was the thorn in the faultless flesh of the Dean De Puritan. Of course boys and girls alike had to attend both services of a Sunday. But no love-making, not if the dean knew it. Accordingly, by means of a black curtain he divided male from female; male from female divided he them. Did he detect but a glance at the curtain, and he would forthwith pound on the pulpit and spout fire and brimstone. But he counted without his Cupid. It was his holy habit to catechise the girls on Tuesdays and Thursdays and the boys on Wednesdays and Fridays. One wet Wednesday the dean forgot to remove his galoshes in the hall of Arlington House (for so the boys' school was named), and being very punctilious, returned thither from the class-room to do so. Arrived there, he was astonied for the space of two seconds to behold a crowd of young rascals scrambling for his silk "topper." Seeing his reverence, his very reverence, these lost souls vanished with a yell, leaving the "topper" and a regular theatrical snow-storm of billet-doux on the floor. Cupid had made a letter-carrier of the Dean De Puritan. The chaste brow, the sacred frosty hair, of the would-be bishop had for years had nothing between them and countless cross-shaped kisses and confessions of flamelike love but a slim band of leather. My dear Doctor Jordan, remember the Dean De Puritan.

The Gunn-Woods Wedding

Miss Kate Gunn had her choice of going abroad for an extended trip or marrying, and she chose the latter. Her wedding with Mr. Woods will be one of the first Hymen functions after Easter and will, I hear, be a large affair. "Everybody" will doubtless receive a card, as the Gunns have lived here all their lives and know every one in town. Miss Gunn has chosen Miss Bender, Miss Bruce and Miss Hooper as her bridesmaids. The bride-to-be is a very popular, attractive brown-eyed girl.

A Treacherous Tunnel

Tunnel Nine on the Shasta route, which has cost the Southern Pacific three or four comfortable fortunes in the endeavor to keep it open, is right at the best trout-fishing water on the Sacramento river. Any afternoon in the month of June you are sure to meet Charley Gould, the former Fish Commissioner, or Walter Mathews, the Oakland architect, or John Cadman, the insurance man, close by the hoodoo tunnel. Ex-Congressman Glascock and Claiborne, the Stockton banker, know the lay of the land and Emil Nusbaumer, the Oakland lawyer and politician, is at home in its pools and eddies. The road at this point is convenient for fishermen but it is a bad piece of engineering. The mountain through which the tunnel runs is full of springs which rot the timbers. It is the most uneasy bit of ground in California and is constantly sliding and shouldering. It has caved on the tunnel several times. The road should run on the other side of the river at this point. Not only was it bad judgment to dig a tunnel through this slippery hill but the cost of two expensive bridges might have been saved. It is true that some hard digging through rock would have been necessary on the other side, but tunnels now cost less and bridges more than they did some years ago. This road has nearly doubled the capacity of its bridges on the Shasta route in the past five years, putting in a complete new set, and there is something like twenty of them in forty miles.

A Newspaper Strike Settled

The Newspaper Reporters' Union, which was organized in this city some months ago by a few enterprising spirits in the downtrodden profession, has fallen upon evil times. Several of the leading members employed by the Examiner and Post have lost their jobs, and others that were working on other papers are finding that there is such little demand for their services that it is somewhat difficult to eke out an existence. The officers of the union have concluded that the newspaper proprietors have entered into a conspiracy to squelch the organization, and there have been rumors of strikes and other direful things. It has been hinted that Organized Labor would be likely to call out all the printers, pressmen and other mechanics employed on the daily papers, and leave the local journalistic field to the weeklies until the great Newspaper Trust came to its senses and duly recognized the Reporters' Union. One day it was reported that Mr. Hearst had been notified that a big strike in the Examiner office was imminent, and that it was suggested that if he didn't come to the support of the Union his Presidential boom would be seriously damaged. And it was said that he immediately sent out orders over the longest leased wire to the effect that every man on the Examiner staff should join the union.

Sentiment Against Unionism

The probability is that if Mr. Hearst ever issued such an order he would precipitate a much more serious strike than could occur through the efforts of the union. The fact is that the best newspaper talent in town is not in sympathy with the project to unionize journalists. There is a preponderance of sentiment among reporters against being organized as though they were teamsters or hodcarriers. The men of ability in the profession do not care to be classed with the "skates," and they feel that theirs is a profession in which no uniform rules fixing compensation can be made to apply fairly to all concerned.

Their Eloquent Noses

The announcement of the approaching marriage of another of Lord Rosebery's daughters reminds me of the story told of the mother of the girls. She, as is well known, was Hannah Rothschild, of the famous Jewish bankers' family, who have controlled the finance of the world during the past century. On one occasion, when the daughters were arraying themselves for some function, she gave them a keen look and said, "You are all Christian in your dress and all Christian in your manners, but, my dear girls, you can't rub out your noses, and they are all Jewish."

Peggy's Pompous Husband

Sweet Peggy Primrose, the younger daughter, has always been much beloved for goodness of heart. In some ways it was a distinguished match she made in marrying Lord Crewe, but people felt sorry for her when they heard some of the tales of this nobleman's haughtiness. He was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland for a time, and no one was more strict in requiring deference than he, at the functions of state. As he was a widower during the time of his occupying the position, he called upon a married sister to assist him in doing the honors. And it was told of him, as an altogether over-exacting piece of haughtiness on his part even for that clime, that he required his sister to go out from his presence backwards. The London press considered this as really overdoing the matter.

The Earl of Rosebery is an admirable man. He represents the best thought in politics in England, being neither too conservative, nor too radical in his opinions. He takes great interest in the welfare of his country from a broad point of view. One of his epigrams is worth remembering. "How can you expect the poor to be anything but wild beasts if you give them nothing but lairs to live in?"

She Boosted the Withrows

Lady Sibyl Primrose, the fiancee of Charles Grant, has played the part of the good fairy to the Withrow sisters of this city, who have been very successful in London. She studied music with one and sat for her portrait to the other. A number of San Franciscans are familiar with Lady Sibyl's face, for Miss Withrow brought the canvas out here and exhibited it. Lady Sibyl Primrose is the only English woman who has any fame as an after-dinner speaker. Her toasts are so witty and graceful that she is in great demand at dinners. Apropos of the position the Withrows occupy in London society I have just heard some amusing stories of the attitude their dear old puritanical mother took when she learned the ethics of the smart set. It is considered a privilege to receive a card to Mrs. Ronalds's Sunday-afternoons and to refuse it is almost like neglecting a royal invitation. But Mrs. Withrow would not set her foot in the charmed door when she learned Mrs. Ronalds's romantic past in which the tuneful Sir Arthur Sullivan figured conspicuously. Nor could the old lady be dragged into any drawing-room where the blot on the family 'scutcheon was in the public eye. As the Withrow sisters are safely of an age where mother's apron-strings are a useless appendage, they could make their way chaperonless.

Lady Granville Gordon's Ostracism

It was stated in the despatches from London a few days ago that notification had appeared in the Official Gazette to the effect that Lady Granville Gordon's presentations at the royal court had been canceled. This meant that she would not be permitted to appear at any drawing-room or other social function given by the Queen. In other words it meant social ostracism. And it probably means also that the Queen is beginning to sit up and take notice of the looseness of London's smart set's morals. The revelations of the Hartopp divorce case were of a startling and shocking character, but even that cause celebre has been surpassed in indecency by the recent confession of Lady Gordon in a case brought before the courts to obtain the custody of her child. Lady Granville Gordon was formerly the wife of her present husband's cousin, Eric Gordon, who divorced her and obtained an order for the custody of the only child. She immediately married Lord Granville Gordon, but refused to surrender the child to her former husband. When an attempt was made to enforce the order she re opened the case by putting an extraordinary story before the judge. She swore that the child was really Lord Granville's, and she declared that she had been Lord Granville's mistress before and after her marriage to Eric Gordon. She even testified that her relations with Lord Granville were resumed immediately after her honeymoon with Eric Gordon. But most astonishing of all was the statement that her husband occupied an adjoining room, assenting to the entire arrangement. Lord Granville is a brother of the Marquis of Huntley and a brother-in-law of Earl Lansdale. After hearing such testimony there is no reason for any one to imagine that Pinero's plays are overdrawn.

Mascagni Was Ungracious

To an Italian friend the other day, Maestro Mascagni confided that he never knew how much he was appreciated in this city until Monday night when the press and public applauded a comic opera production of his classic tragedy, "Cavalleria Rusticana." It was really a heart-rending affair, but the people knew that the Tivoli management was not to blame, for it could not be expected in the midst of its comic opera season to produce Italian grand opera on the spur of the moment. It was rather ungracious, however, on Mascagni's part, to utterly ignore the singers when indicating by gesture to whom credit was due for the performance. He came before the curtain with the principals, and when he was greeted with a storm of applause he leaned over and indicated with his hand that it was the men of the orchestra who were entitled to the credit. To be sure it was, but there was poor Avedano, the tenor with the lost register and the pinched note, with his legs encased in Napoleoni's purple hose, as contrite a looking artist as ever apologized for a rash venture. He had gallantly tried to fill an emergency and was entitled to praise for his courage. I have always known that dramatic tenors were rare, but never did I realize how scarce they are in these parts until I heard Avedano demonstrating his inability to be heard above the orchestra's most pianissimo passages.

Millionaire Cowell

It is said that the half-demented individual who pumped a little lead into millionaire Henry Cowell on the latter's ranch in Merced county was probably laboring under an hallucination. Probably he was. And it is quite as probable that he wasn't. Indeed it is quite probable that he had some very great grievance against the millionaire, and that his rash conduct was the result of protracted brooding over what he considered deep wrongs. No man can accumulate wealth as Cowell has accumulated it without giving many people the impression that he has wronged them. Henry Cowell is one of the strictly unsentimental class of millionaires. He conceives the joy of living to be the accumulation and hoarding of money, and to him the greatest ill that flesh is heir to is the heartache that accompanies the signing of checks. Henry Cowell is one of our modest millionaires. He indulges in no luxuries, is never guilty of ostentatious display and wears clothes that are spotted. He is no doubt as honest as a millionaire can be, but he is tight-fisted and drives a hard bargain.

His Business Methods

Henry Cowell is worth a paragraph or two because he is an interesting type of the sordid materialist with a dollar-mark for a soul, and for the additional reason that notwithstanding his great wealth he is comparatively little known. Cowell belongs to the Russell Sage class, a man of good morals, perhaps, and a high respect for the law, a great capacity for accumulating riches and none for the enjoyment of it. Not long ago he confided in a friend that his income had amounted to one hundred thousand dollars a year for twenty years, and for a much longer period and without cessation he has been plodding away as though he believed that a day's rest meant final retirement to the Poorhouse. He owns eight enormous ranches, and he visits them every month probably to see whether they have shrunk. He is the largest producer of lime and cement on the coast, and he tells with great gusto how he has frozen competitors out of business by lowering the price. He relates that he secured for fifteen thousand dollars a plant that cost one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, by the simple process of lowering prices to a ruinous figure, and that he got all his money back in a few weeks by putting the price at an exorbitant figure.

Execrated in Santa Cruz

However those are good, clean, business methods, according to the commercial ethics of the day. But nowhere are Cowell's methods so well known as in Santa Cruz county. The figure of Henry Cowell which, by the way, is strikingly reminiscent of that of C. P. Huntington, is familiar to the residents of the seaside town where he resides and where his family formerly lived. And the people of that town execrate Cowell, for it was not many years ago that they organized mobs to tear down fences that he had erected across roads which he had suddenly discovered were his private property. The people of Santa Cruz have many grievances against Cowell, and they tell stories of how he acquired ranches by foreclosing mortgages which of course he had a perfect right to do. But people are unreasonable, especially in small towns, for when they have a millionaire resident, instead of being proud of him and pampering him they actually expect him to be a public-spirited citizen, and to encourage business by extending time on mortgages. They're sore on Cowell because he was always Johnny-on-the-spot when a mortgage was due. And they say that although he owned half the timber land in the county, if one of his employes took home a stick of wood, and Cowell found it out, he would deduct the price from the man's wages. It is by such methods that our rich men grow richer. No doubt many stories of Cowell's charity could be told, but unfortunately they have never been recorded.

It's To Be Pulled Off

In spite of the croaking tabbies, and the mumps-afflicted little brothers and sisters of Gladys Merrill, her marriage with Harry Bates has not been indefinitely postponed. Though any number of things have occurred that would seem to have permanently hoodooed the union of these two devoted hearts, the determined efforts of two good mothers to make their offspring happy have been successful. And so next Wednesday, D. V. or without, so long as the pastor is there to officiate, the Merrill-Bates wedding will be solemnized in the First Congregational church. It will be a large wedding with bridesmaids and all the et ceteras, and there will be a reception afterwards at the Merrill home. Lenten marriages are not considered out of place in the church to which the bride and bridegroom belong.

Miss Spinster—Why do you wear that key in your watch-charm?

Tom Bach—It's my latch-key, and I wear it as a symbol of independence and a token of freedom.

The Wheels of Fashion

Notwithstanding that this is Lent some of our society folks are looking forward with glad expectancy to the arrival of several social lions from the East. Among those expected are the George Crockers, the Seward Webbs and Mr. Harriman, the railroad magnate. Lent is not as fashionable here as it is in New York. Several of our most conspicuous swells have made their appearance at the Mascagni concerts. Though they are having grand opera at the Metropolitan in New York, the gleaming shoulders, tiaras and famous necklaces have gone into retirement for the season. The upper servants of the great families, stiff, prim and demure, are to be found in the private boxes of the mighty. The world of fashion in New York abjures the devil and all his works openly, at least, though there may be cakes and ale in private. It is quite different in San Francisco, for here many of the elite ignore tradition on the subject of Lent as a time for sackcloth and ashes, for quiet and thought. The wheels of fashion are always whirling.

Mrs. Eleanor Martin gave a small luncheon at the Palace Wednesday. At another table Mr. and Mrs. Raoul Duval were entertaining Dick Tobin, Maurice Duval, the handsome young brother just out from France, and several ladies. Mrs. Duval, in spite of her illness since her marriage, has regained her rosy complexion and looks as fresh as ever she did.

"I should imagine that Jones could easily win fame as a writer of fiction."

"Why do you think so?"

"He's such an artful liar."

Phelan Broken Down

There will be a large colony of San Franciscans in Santa Barbara during Lent, for it is growing popular as a resort for people with that tired feeling. James D. Phelan has hied himself Southward to regain his health. Too many entertainments, big dinners and late suppers sent him to bed for several days and his physician told him that he was so run down he would get pneumonia if he didn't quit the giddy whirl. Little Jimmy didn't need a second tip.

The Irrepressible McDonald

It is most surprising to learn that "Doctor" Arthur MacDonald, the so-called patho-social investigator, who is not unknown in this city, has been taken seriously by the United States Senate. He succeeded a week ago in having a bill reported by a Senate committee, which provides for the establishment of a laboratory for him, for "the study of the abnormal classes," under the supervision of the Attorney-General. "Doctor" MacDonald does not possess the certificate of any recognized college, nor is he given recognition by men of science. His fad is the investigation of abnormal femininity, and in the prosecution of it he entrapped young girls and married women by means of personal advertisements leading them to the disclosure of their most intimate affairs of the heart and of sexual propensity, and subsequently publishing their confidences in a book which appealed to the prurient and which he sold for fifty cents a copy. He also manipulated school boys and school girls with tape-measures and testing devices, ostensibly for the purpose of obtaining data for scientific generalizations concerning the relation between physical conformation and moral or intellectual character. His conclusions prove him a fraud. Yet his statistics have been published at the expense of the Government. They establish more than anything else the propensity of the "Doctor" to exercise his anthropometric energy and psycho-psychical curiosity upon girls rather than boys and especially upon girls of sixteen or over.

A Universal Tongue

The perennial discussion of the necessity for a universal language shows signs of activity once more, but the probabilities of such an invention ever being put to practical use are as far-off as ever. It is one of the fondest theories of scholars that something of the kind is urgently needed, and from time to time an effort is made to supply the blank. Thus far, all these artificial languages have failed in the same place. Notwithstanding their beautiful simplicity and perfection, they somehow never get into use. Volapuk, an invention of Sir Thomas Urquhart, seemed, twenty years ago, to be making progress in the right direction. Its grammar was of the simplest and most perfect description, and it construction so mechanical that it almost went of its own accord. Something like a score of grammars and dictionaries were published, and clubs for the study of the language and the encouragement of its use sprang up all over the world, yet today there is not known to be a solitary individual who makes use of it. One of the humors of the study, when Volapuk was in the height of its vogue, was the flourishing club located at Walla Walla in Walla Walla county, of what was then the Territory of Washington—and there wasn't a W in the new language.

Kocian's Love Affair

The newspapers are making much of an alleged intent on the part of Pauline Astor, only daughter of the supersensitive multi-millionaire, to elope with Kocian, the violinist. A lively managerial imagination may be responsible for the gossip. Assuredly the tale lost nothing in the telling. A romance of this sort, it is evident, is, for a virtuoso, as good a bit of business as is a timely divorce or two, or a burglar-and-diamond story for an actress. There are no doubt in San Francisco many young ladies with unspent pin-money in their purses who, though they would not for love of music go to hear the artist, would for the love of love buy box seats to see the beautiful boy beloved of the heiress to the Astor millions. Poor rich Pauline! Money, that is as an unscalable wall of gold between a girl and her heart's desire, making her a prisoner of wealth, is a most provoking form of poverty. Surely Kocian can support a wife, and were Pauline but poorer, she might be richer in happiness. As things are, the young lady's people seem to think that in marrying an artist she would be making a most lamentable mesalliance. What a comedown fate in all probability has in store for her: from the Bohemia of her dreams with the heavenly Kocian to Humdrumdom with a pasty duke.

In the Matter of Mesalliances

Now, to my mind an artist, as such, in view of his joy-giving gift, is, in this vale of tears, the superior of a duke as such. For with the possible exception of a prince, who, or rather what, is so dull, so joyless, as a duke? Moreover, to my way of thinking, an artist as such is more than a match for a millionaire's daughter; he is a catch. It is intrinsic worth, personality, not extrinsic wealth, mere possessions, that counts in marriage. To be an equal mate for a great musician, a woman should come with some gift in her hand that is hers by a right rarer, diviner, than that which title deeds bestow: some beauty of face or form or character, some grace or charm of person—an exquisite culture it may be, or a genius for goodness or appreciation. Of Miss Astor I know nothing, save this good, that Kocian found her fair and loveable, and that she seems to have eyes, ears and a heart—"a heart of music." Miss Astor, it may be, is music itself made manifest in the flesh, fit mate for any man, even an artist; but this, if it be the happy fact, is a reality far removed from reality, a matter of fine fact, not a matter of millions. Mesalliances are made between men and women who are in themselves unequal, not between those who have unequal possessions or occupy so-called unequal social positions. To maintain the ecstasy of love, to prevent feeling from falling into the sere and yellow leaf, requires a skill equal to that that goes to the making of a great musician. Let Miss Astor marry Kocian and keep him indefinitely delighted, and by so doing she will prove herself worthy to be an artist's wife.

The Goodmans Divorced

The rumor that a divorce was recently granted Mrs. Minnie Goodman from Arthur Jule Goodman, familiarly known as Arthur Jule, the clever water-color artist, formerly of Cincinnati but now of London, is verified by Mrs. Goodman herself. Mrs. Goodman is best remembered here, in her old home, as the wife of Frank Unger, the versatile Bohemian who has been luxuriating of late years in the capacity of major-domo to rich women. Only those who know Mrs. Goodman and have come under the spell of her genial personality can understand her latest domestic rupture. Arthur Jule is one of the most charming of men, and they two understood each other perfectly. To the outside world it will always be a mystery, but to those who understood Mrs. Goodman it is not hard to explain.

Unger Wooed and Won

When Minnie California Buchanan graduated from Mills Seminary she was an heiress to fifty or sixty thousand dollars. She was a fascinating and popular girl and in those days with handsome Frank Unger led the germans given by the fashionable Southern set. Like Dorothea in "Middlemarch" she had splendid ideas of helping the man she should marry, and Frank Unger persuaded her that, with her by his side, he would achieve grand things. Their marriage was a failure. Frank Unger, in the role of "good fellow" and dashing cavalier, dissipated his wife's fortune. To support herself and little girl Mrs. Unger took to writing dramatic criticism for the San Franciscan and Ingleside, weeklies that enjoyed an evanescent prosperity with Harry McDowell and Arthur McEwen as leading contributors. Later she went to Paris and met the delightful Arthur Jule. He found in her the inspiration of his life and was so fond of her little girl that she was persuaded once more to give to a man her womanly courage and enthusiasm in the achievement of great things.

Mrs. Atherton's Characteristic Exclamation

Arthur Jule followed the Californian woman to New York and it was there they were married. I recall an amusing incident of the marriage. Gertrude Atherton was among those invited to the ceremony and after she had received a cordial greeting from her old friend exclaimed, with her characteristic frankness:

"Going to marry one man!"

"Well," said the bride-elect, half apologetically, "the law permits only one at a time."

For awhile the Goodmans worked together, Arthur Jule illustrating the magazine work of his wife. Then they went back to Paris and plunged into the art world. In telling of her experience one day, Mrs. Goodman remarked, "For ten years Artie held my hand while I gave every thought and idea to furthering his interests." Later on in London, their delightful lodge in St. John's Wood called "The Wigwam" was a centre of gayety, fashion and art. The most interesting people were to be found there, traveling Americans, and artists from the theatres and studios. Meanwhile Mrs. Goodman was writing dramatic criticism for T. P. O'Connor's bright weekly, M. A. P.

The Drifting Apart

So long as Arthur Jule devoted himself to his art for art's sake his wife strove to aid him. But finally he went back to lithography, and devoted himself to commercial affairs. His wife appeared to think he had no more need for her. At any rate they drifted apart, her whole sympathy going out to her daughter, whose genius was beginning to loom on the horizon. Gladys Unger was working in the Parisian studios and doing amazing things. One day when she was but eighteen she produced a play. The mother immediately concluded that Fate was pointing its finger. She resolved to give all her sympathy and support to her child. Off she went to Paris and there she has been keeping house for Gladys ever since. And now Gladys Unger the Californian girl is the youngest dramatic writer who has arrived. Her curtain-raiser, "Edmond Kean," is said to be a brilliant piece of work. The speeches of Kean are remarkable for their sonorousness and beauty.

The Frenchiness of the Maid

Apropos the Goodmans I am reminded of a story told by a friend who visited them not long ago in London and who was on intimate terms with the artist and his wife. The story suggests the laying down as a maxim that if a woman employs a French maid she should be prepared for French results. Jule was engaged at the time of the occurrence in painting drop-curtains for London theatres, and he was also making sketches of theatrical stars. One day he returned home with an excellent likeness of a petite artiste whose greatest histrionic talent reposed in her nether limbs. And those, Jule had neglected, his time being limited. However he finished his work at home and the next day the friend who is responsible for the story called. Mrs. Jule was out but her maid, the French one, let the visitor in, and the latter stood admiringly before the sketch on the easel, to Marie's intense delight. When she could repress herself no longer she said:

"I tink is gran'. Mrs. Jule, she pose for ze legs."

Gossip of the Service

Colonel J. B. Rawles, who will retire from the service in the autumn, has announced his intention of becoming a permanent resident of this city.

Among the recent promotions to the rank of Major-General was that of Brigadier-General Henry C. Merriam, who was in command of the department of California during the war with Spain. Mrs. and Miss Merriam became quite popular in society during their sojourn here. The latter is now the wife of a wealthy Denverite.

The news of Captain Thomas Gillespie Carson's engagement with Miss Alma Nickerson has been received by the San Francisco friends of the gallant groom-elect. Captain Carson, familiarly known as "Kit," was stationed here before the war with Spain and he made a brilliant record in Philippines. His fiancee is the daughter of Captain James D. Nickerson, U. S. A. retired.

Military Monterey

The importance of Monterey as a military town is to be greatly increased. The Jacks family recently deeded more land to the Government so that the size of the reservation could be increased, and fifty thousand dollars are to be added to the one hundred and twenty-five thousand ordered spent in the erection of the cantonment buildings. This week Major-General Hughes detailed Lieutenant-Colonel Heap of the Engineer's Corps to make a survey of the new land. There are two regiments of infantry at Monterey and I believe that a squadron of cavalry and two batteries of artillery are to be added.

Kimball Shifted

Captain Amos W. Kimball, who has been quartermaster at the Presidio for four years, though supposed to be stationed there only temporarily, was greatly surprised a few days ago when ordered to the Philippines. Officers are seldom permitted to serve as quartermaster at the Presidio for more than two years, and the length of Captain Kimball's service was a surprise to everybody unaware of pull of his father, Colonel Kimball, at Washington. The latter was only recently retired as a Brigadier-General. Captain David G. Stanley will succeed Captain Kimball as quartermaster.

Was She a Partello?

Mrs. Charlemagne Tower, who has achieved great social success in the Courts of Berlin and St. Petersburg, was referred to by Madame La Bavarde the other day as a daughter of the Partellos of Washington, D. C. Her friends in this city, and they are numerous, have always thought her to be the daughter of G. Frank Smith, who was once a law partner of the late Frank Pixley. But probably Madame La Bavarde has been keeping tab on births and knows a thing or two that nobody ever suspected.

Languid Lady Herbert

One of the California girls who is part and parcel of the diplomatic life in Washington, has written an amusing account of the manner of Lady Herbert, wife of the new British Ambassador. Her account is out of joint with the newspaper gush over Lady Herbert, who is a daughter of the match-making mamma Wilson who secured Cornelius Vanderbilt for a son-in-law against the wishes of his family. Lady Herbert is "awfully English, don't you know," writes her critic, "and adopts the lazy, languid, bored air whenever she talks to one of her sex which is My Lady's privilege. She is the most punctilious person in Washington in matters of etiquette and any affair at the Embassy has the importance of a function. When Lady Herbert gives a dinner-party she always dresses to match the decorations, quite a novel idea. There was none of this formality about Lady Pauncefote, and there is none of the English homelike hospitality, which was the keynote to the Embassy in the Pauncefote regime."

Lynch's Klondike Dinner

They are still chattering in clubdom of Jere Lynch's dinner to the Klondikers. It made a genuine hit. It is said that of the company at least four were millionaires who never put on a dress suit in their lives, nor did they do so on that evening. It was like a chess problem to seat them so as to minimize the danger of rough-house, so many are the little differences existing between these financiers of the frozen North. Edgar Mizner solved the problem successfully and during the evening the spirit of peace and harmony prevailed. Louis Sloss easily carried off the honors as the wittiest of the post-prandial spellbinders. The decorations were very picturesque. A little log cabin on the table with its single door and window and a candle within was an artistic conceit, and realism was imparted by a snow scene gleaming in the electric lamps. It was a color gem and I understand that Gordon Ross is now reproducing it on canvas.

Mardi Gras Aftermath

The one function which Miss Bertha Runkle has attended since her arrival here where she was not mobbed was the Mardi Gras ball. She was a fascinating Columbine in black and gold, but her connection with the wide-selling "Helmet" being concealed by reason of her mask, she escaped lionizing. She scarcely wandered from her Pierrot's side, Pierrot being Gelett Burgess. The latter's idea of harlequin humor was to prod passers with his playful wand in the least protected parts of their anatomy. At the ball the matrons were decidedly the belles, Mrs. Tobin, Mrs. Reilly, Mrs. Follis, Mrs. de Ruyter and Mrs. Buckbee. Mrs. Alexander Keyes was very stunning in her oriental style of princess gown that harmonized with her eyes. Adah Howell, with her fluffy blondness, was a charming Highland girl and had a train of admirers. The "Hopkins twins" succeeded in fooling everybody and their costumes were not even mentioned in the dailies the next day. They were costumed as country gawks, though their pose was rather that of the tough girl of the Bowery made popular by Ada Lewis. They wore gingham frocks and hay-colored wigs, and they carried out their disguise to the detail. One of their intimate friends said to them:

"Really, I can't tell whether you are men or women."

"Oh, we're men," laughed the country girls with one voice.

Amedee Joullin's Lincoln green and buckskins had, I am told, done him good service before, when he sang the Outlaw Chief's role in "Bluff King Hal," when the Stewart-O'Connell opera was presented for the benefit of the Art Association. An incident of the ball that shocked the prudes occurred at supper when a daring Rough Rider girl calmly sat and smoked a cigarette.

The Grand Canyon of Arizona has been characterized by the globe trotter as the most wonderful of all things on earth. David Starr Jordan, Joaquin Miller, Lummis, Stoddard and other notable writers have told of its beauty. Miller says, "a sabre thrust in the red bosom of Mother Earth." Sons of the Speculators

A SOCIAL SATIRE.

Virtue is the fear that the other man will get rich first.
(The suggestion is original.)

Murray Wilton's father possessed the desire, peculiar to the world, but in himself intense, to make money. This every-day impulse points each man a different path. The consequence is that the world presents the appearance of a flock of sheep running in wild directions down the side of a mountain.

The point to be remembered about Elijah Wilton is, that he not only wanted to get rich but he got rich. He turned round and broke through the crowd of descending sheep till he reached the top.

Ordinarily this completes the tale. But the story-teller is such an unconventional individual that he always investigates a man's method.

Elijah was cashier of a bank in Ohio. This gave him a great advantage, because twenty-five years ago the Chicago pit haughtily ignored the budding cities of Southern Ohio. In the security contempt confers, Elijah planned a corner on wheat which should take place in Chicago. He owned the brains but not the capital. However, the bank vaults were full. He stole the funds, temporarily should he succeed, criminally should he fail. He plunged. He succeeded.

While the air yet trembled with the infernal roar that rose from Chicago, and Wilton was deified on the mountain-top, another man burned with the anxious fever of gaining riches. He was cashier of a second bank in Wilton's town. He knew that he had the genius, before him were the funds. The mere sight of millionaire Wilton taunted him. He planned, he stole, also for better, for worse, and he plunged.

And his computations were more subtle than Wilton's—only, the eyes of the Chicago sheep, watching the Ohio town, made it the central metropolis of the world. Orders placed from there were tabulated. With a frantic alarm of joy the Chicago speculators singled out Earnet de Vandray when he tried to corner the market, and the herd trampled him to death. He spent seven years in the penitentiary.

There was a note of triumph in his ruin.

His defeat was the social sarcasm of Wilton's success. It would live while Wilton lived, and it would not die should de Vandray die.

De Vandray's sentence was the ruin of Wilton's honor. It was the harsh, cynical laugh from fate. These men were brothers, and the blood of one damned the other. Though de Vandray failed, he was the man who succeeded.

From fear, which we argue is the spring of virtue, the Wiltons walked on the street with de Vandray when he came out of the gaol, and were among those who loaned him the money to start all over again in New York.

Though Wilton lived to be eighty, he felt on his money the taint of theft and greed.

One scintillating evening on Broadway, in spring, Murray Wilton met Reginald de Vandray.

Reginald climbed into Murray's cab. While slowly driving through the theatre-throngs, the two young clubmen spiritedly discussed the sales of stock. Their conversation was not commercial —it was that froth of talk which crests the tide of pleasure-loving New York. Her business is her dissipation and her dissipation her business. She is Monte Carlo to the most, and earnest in subtle things. She lacks French freedom—but it is possible to be both decent and indiscreet.

The young men drove to the apartment of Murray's mistress. He had inherited largely his father's wealth and Agnes's surroundings testified to a lavish expenditure. But if ever a woman merited luxury the beautiful girl who reigned over Murray Wilton queened her fortune. In a moment the passionate eyes of Reginald de Vandray were on fire, and only Murray's confidence in both the girl and the man prevented him from observing that he had lost both comrade and mistress.

It is bad taste to steal a man's mistress, or stolen fruit. She is the soul of his originality, his poetic impulses, his uniqueness, his sensuous self. The robbery insults his conceit, violates his inspirations, and is a crime committed against his characteristics. So much the more vicious is this irregularity than the offense would be were she his wife. The last breaks only a brittle law, the first injures sentiment.

But love has been a long time a moral cripple. If she limps in one limb she will limp in both.

All during the evening the glances of Agnes and Reginald were tiny flames of fire. Thus the strength of youth, eager for achievement, loves to waste itself, and calls each step that crumbles a victory. But the common glory of fire and love is in their flame. And when it burns it brands, and where it brands, there is ruin.

The next day Agnes could not be found at her apartment. Murray was frantic. On the following day she called at his office and said, "I am married."

"Whom have you married?"

She blushed and hung her head.

"Whom?" he demanded.

"Reginald de Vandray." Married!—the mocking term of our world's convenience.

And Murray, the mocked, the wrecked, the husk of a man, haunted by the perfume of his lost love's memory, resolved on revenge. He would place Reginald de Vandray beneath a howling, terrifying mob of madmen, the speculators of the pit; forced to that depth from which his father crawled.

And de Vandray, the man to be ruined, resolved on ruin.

To whom would the battle be? Wilton was richer than de Vandray.

And the woman, the bauble which was a prize, the trifler of empires, the golden apple, was moved to become an actor in this contest of her lovers. The hoarse horror brewing in the pit, the strenuous seething of the street, where the western allies of Wilton were exultantly planning to destroy Reginald de Vandray, infused energy into her voluptuousness, and for an hour she was not that effete parasite, known in romance as the Queen of Hearts. At evening she went to see Murray Wilton. "I have returned, I repent!" she cried, flinging herself into his arms.

What emotion she must have felt at that moment stupefies a moralist. Traitor to the arms that enfolded her, she was true to the arms of ruin, but most faithful to that promiscuous nature through which men fought for her. Her fidelity was after all only to her fickleness, which blinded her, when she believed she was in the service of Reginald de Vandray.

And she urged Wilton to continue his destruction. And she found out the means thereof. And her information she imparted to Reginald de Vandray.

Flushed with victory, the combatant in whose hands a new weapon was placed, rushed in the morning from his bed to the pit, certain of that brilliant stroke by which the weaker overthrows his pack of enemies. And as he triumphantly entered the exchange a singular accident befell him. Amid the hum of instruments speaking despatches, the voices of the speculators, the calls of telephones, the hurry of messengers, he was gloriously repeating that wonderful word, that golden key, which would crown him victor, dazzle the world: "Go short of St. Paul, go short of St. Paul!" It was the sincere whisper at morning light of the beautiful Agnes. It was the solving secret of this seething tumult. It was the vision of genius which defeats its enemies.

And suddenly he decided not to use it. A queer sense of honor grappled him by the throat and conquered him more than could Wilton; he was downed, and he didn't care for the heaps of gold, the tinsel of distinction, so much as the sterling sense of personal integrity. He was heir to that man who had come from the penitentiary, whence he had gone for a social indiscretion, not to the one who went in. The spirit of the gambling speculator had fallen from him.

Dazzled by the phenomenon, he believed that he had lost his courage, manhood. The market opened—the day of de Vandray's ruin. He went to a booth and telephoned Agnes what he had decided. He couldn't hear her answer. Then he went to his broker's office and sat still. His opponents were perplexed over the state of the market. Their game was putting up no defence. They consulted. What was the trick? The contest was momentarily suspended. Not till noon had they concluded to run de Vandray to cover.

At twelve Reginald received a messenger, panting. He had not waited for the elevator. "Your father," he read, "dying at the apartment of your mistress, entreats that you ruin the son of the man whose victory defeated his, your own worst enemy." The writing was in Agnes's hand. Compunction faded from Reginald's mind. He stepped up to his broker.

"Begin to sell St. Paul," said he.

It was his own stock. Wilton, too, was selling it. In the great crash of St. Paul that day, while Wilton's allies were crying victory, the news crept round that Reginald de Vandray was a rich man.

Saved—and by the devoted deceit of a woman. Only in his arms she confessed her lie, that his father was well, waiting to extend his congratulations.

She confessed to him her folly, and her last words were words of love.

The final speech of Lies is always honey. Her love was the confession of the betrayer of the betrayed. He grew cold in her embrace. When she cried "love," it seemed to echo "death." And each warm kiss was a drop of stolen blood.

The maid who entered the apartment in the morning found a beautiful woman alone on the bed, strangled.

Paul G. Clark.

Living Up to Her Reputation

Scene, boudoir of Miss Social Lionne. Miss Lionne, in a striking suit of pajamas, reclining on a couch. Opposite her, her bosom friend, Miss Kitty Imitator.

Miss L.: Well, tell me, Kitty cherie, what was said of me at the Mardi Gras ball.

Kitty: Would you really care to hear?

Miss L.: Yes, better know the worst at once.

Kitty: To tell the truth, dear, you didn't carry off the honors. Society was bitterly disappointed. They expected something new.

Miss L.: Well, I had worn my chandelier costume only once. What did they expect?

Kitty: At the least, Mr. Goop told me, a group of candelabra in full blaze.

Miss L.: There's no pleasing our sated society. I wish I'd gone as Cupid.

Kitty: Well, I may as well tell you that Mrs. Fly fancied that was the costume you'd chosen, and she's wild because she didn't wear that disguise.

Miss L.: She! She couldn't have filled the tights. Never mind, I will give a Gods and Goddesses party at Mi-Careme, and then she can try what she can do as Little Blind Love. I shall go as the Armless Venus myself, or as Hercules.

Kitty: It's hard, dearie, to be original these days.

Miss L.: You bet it is. Why, I have worked like a horse since I made my debut to keep the social ball rolling in new ways. My heart gave out the first season but while taking the rest cure I managed to work my brains a bit. Remember my Children's Dinner?

Kitty: Yes, indeed, particularly those sweet pink socks you wore. And I remember what a hit you made at the Millions' bal masque when you went as a yacht in full sail.

Miss L.: I flatter myself I did carry away the cake on that occasion.

Kitty: Also at that other fancy dress affair where you went as a Plumber's Boy, and carried a kitchen stove on your shoulders.

Miss L.: No other woman in our set has the muscle for that feat. But the thing is now to do something to keep up my reputation. Being Lent, nothing is possible.

Kitty: You might hire Kocian to play for a table full of guests at a fish dinner.

Miss L.: No, I've done with that sort of thing. Any one can do that—there's no originality in it. My metier is originality. Give me originality or give me—social oblivion. Hand me the eau de cologne, Kitty, my head aches. I feel a great idea coming.

Mops her brow with cologne.

Miss L. (after a long pause): Ha! I have it. I'll give a dinner—it'll have to be fish, of course, and the guests lobsters. We'll all dress in fish scales—I'll be a crab myself. Mrs. Slush Saylor, who is so thin, can come as a shrimp. And I'll have the sailor boys come and sing their chanties. No—I'll do better. I'll have a big swimming tank and the women will be mermaids and the men fish. We'll have a table set around the edge of the water, and we'll jump in and take a dive between courses.

Kitty: Won't it be rather cold?

Miss L.: I hadn't thought of that. Perhaps we could wear rubber costumes and divers' caps.

Kitty: You are clever, dear.

Miss L.: That's right. But you see I must do something to efface the impression of the Mardi Gras.

Kitty: I hear that the reporters shed tears when they saw you—they had hoped to get a column out of your costume alone. And there was a special staff of artists there to sketch you.

Miss L.: Gently, dear. But I'll not disappoint them again, if I have to go as Trilby posing to the life classes.

—The Sycophant.

STAGE

Mascagni at the Tivoli

The Tivoli has scored some great triumphs in its time but none greater than that achieved Monday night, when Pietro Mascagni stepped to the front of the stage and raised his baton for the "Tannhauser" overture. In the years to come the Tivoli management may point with pride to the fact that the popular Italian composer was among the many great musicians that have appeared within the walls of the Eddy street opera house. And if ever in those years to come the spirit of "Doc" Leahy should care to probe the dust of the historic past his fondest delight shall probably be in digging up memories of last Monday night's triumph, scored in the presence of perhaps the most brilliant social audience that ever witnessed a Tivoli performance. Such was the eclat of the occasion that it is most unfortunate that the performance itself was not of an artistic character. The instrumental performance was of course superb, and under the spell of the Mascagni influence the operatic old guard raged joyously, but when it came to the singing and acting of Mascagni's own "Cavalleria Rusticana," the little band of Tivoli singers utterly failed to rise to the grand occasion. Their efforts were more tragic than the opera itself. It is a sad story, for we should like to have sent Mascagni on his way with pleasing impressions of the musical culture of San Francisco. He was undoubtedly pleasantly surprised at the ability of our musicians and the enthusiasm of our audiences, and it must have unnerved him somewhat to preside over the mangling of his own opera. It was all very unfortunate for, as Town Talk has been saying for years, the Tivoli has done more than any other institution to foster musical culture in this city, and it has given some most artistic performances of "Cavalleria Rusticana." Indeed one of the best ever given in this city was that of the Italian singers a few months ago, when Montanari, Collamarini and Agostini were in the cast. Perhaps the worst was that of Monday night. Fortunately Mascagni's enthusiasm pervaded the audience, and the work of his orchestra was hailed with gleeful bravos from the throbbing enthusiasts. So great was the enthusiasm that the people were not inclined to be captious in their criticism of the singers on the stage. Such was the glory of the occasion and so eager was everybody to felicitate Mascagni that they didn't even think of what his feelings must have been when he heard the pitiful strident outbursts of Avedano and that awful duet between Santuzza and Alfio. Somebody got off the key, and both seemed intent upon preventing their voices from blending. Nobody will deny that the quality of Caro Roma's voice is delicious, but Santuzza is not a role in which she could acquire fame under the most auspicious circumstances. She was uncertain at times, and failed to give phrases the proper accentuation, errors that were plainly the result of unfamiliarity with the score. And worse than all, she sang the role in English, while even Cunningham with his rich Celtic brogue had mastered the Italian. How strange that a woman with the name of Roma should be the only one of the principals who didn't know the Roman of her role! Cunningham's Alfio was the only artistic feature of the performance. Bernice Holmes was the Lola of the cast and she got off the key even before she came within sight of the audience. Her acting was as limp as her singing. Notwithstanding the tragedy of the performance the comedy element was not lacking. It was supplied by Mrs. Mascagni, who sat in the audience but who joined her husband as often as she could, and who must have been greatly disappointed that she was not called before the curtain. However she rushed behind the scenes with Pietro and stood in the wings while he bowed with his hand over his heart. She could be seen by only a few hundred of the people in the audience. I should say that Mrs. Mascagni wields the baton in the family circle.

A Grandson of Wallack

The coming of a grandson of Lester Wallack to join the Alcazar company revives memories of that famous actor. Only a few of those who acted in the Wallack stock companies are now living. Edgar L. Davenport is one, also J. H. Stoddart. Some of the brightest stars of the stage world were in Wallack's companies—Rose Coghlan, Mr. and Mrs. John Gilbert, E. Holland, Harry Montague, Charles Coghlan, E. A. Sothern, Dion Boucicault, Charles Wyndham, Rose Wood and Laura Keane among others. Wallack was born in New York, but had his education in England. All of his people were actors, so the Alcazar man comes naturally by his dramatic ability. Lester Wallack played with Charlotte Cushman in England and after he returned to this country he made his debut as "John Lester" at the old Broadway theatre in New York. He used to tell a story of how as Sir Charles Coldstream in "Used Up" he was called upon to stamp his foot angrily. On the night of his first appearance, when the foot-stamping episode occurred, his foot struck a trap door, which opened and he fell through up to his shoulders. The audience was delighted when he extricated himself and went on with his part. It was the next year that he appeared in "Monte Cristo" and the following year he wrote his first play, a dramatization of "The Three Guardsmen." "Rosedale" was not written until 1863. It was Wallack, by the way, who introduced Boucicault and his Irish dramas to the New York public. Though a failure was predicted, the contrary happened. A grandson of a man with a reputation like Lester Wallack's is rather handicapped, by the way. To live up to the reputation of one's forefathers is the hardest thing many young actors and actresses have to contend with. Ethel Barrymore said her name helped her, but Sydney Drew found his the reverse.

Though Maggie Mitchell's name is coupled with that of Fanchon the Cricket in the minds of most Californians, they also remember Alice Kingsbury, afterward Mrs. Cooley, and the mother of Frank Cooley. Alice Kingsbury played "Fanchon" for fifty-six consecutive nights in this city in 1866 or thereabouts, and her Cricket was a most charming creation. She was a Kentucky girl, but came to California and afterwards made her home here.

A Song With a History

Those two colored comedians, Cole and Johnson, who were at the Orpheum two weeks ago, are coming to the front as the most popular composers in the country. Their song "Under the Bamboo Tree," is being whistled all over the country, and they have written another song, "On the Congo," which is one of the big hits of "Nancy Brown," the new musical comedy now running in Broadway. And by the way, another hit in the same piece is a song written by a colored man named Shepard N. Edmunds. The song has quite an interesting history. The father of the author was a Tennessee slave who became a body servant of President Lincoln, and he heard the latter use the famous phrase, "You can't fool all the people all the time." This phrase was the maxim on which the old man raised all his children, and it is the keynote of the song.

Dicka Cool, who made her debut at the Republic in "Chimmie Fadden," is Mrs. Ward in private life. She is a daughter of

Miss Trescott in "Strathmore"

Virginia Drew Trescott will no doubt he seen and heard to better advantage in Tolstoi's "Resurrection" than she was in Virna Woods's dramatization of "Strathmore." Miss Trescott's art is somewhat immature, but she has talent and temperament which even the vicious dramatic school which has left its traces on her work could not irreparably impair. She is a good elocutionist and with proper training and experience should become a most successful actress. However no actress could do justice to herself in "Strathmore."

Miss Trescott's tendency to elocutionize reminds me of a story told by a young actor of his first professional engagement. He applied one day for a small part in John Drew's company which was about to open rehearsals in a new play. Arriving at the hall where the players had assembled he inquired whether Mr. Drew was there. The actress to whom he addressed the inquiry said that Mr. Drew had not arrived. To her he imparted the nature of his business and thereupon she proceeded to give him some advice.

"The first question Mr. Drew will ask," she said, "is whether you can recite. Tell him no. He may insist that you know something, and pretend to be anxious to hear you, but be firm, for if he finds that you recite he will conclude that you are an elocutionist and he won't listen to you."

When Drew arrived he did just as the actress had predicted, and he almost persuaded the applicant to show what he could do. Fortunately he resisted Mr. Drew's most persuasive appeals and was engaged. The recitation habit is responsible for many a bad actor. Nearly all dramatic teachers are afflicted with it.

The Typist's Approval

On the same principle that a man must be truly great to be a hero to his valet, so must an author be genuinely clever to claim the interest of his stenographer. Indeed the lady at the keyboard is the first critic and often the one most dreaded by the man who writes for a living, for her criticism is the one which usually gives a hint as to how a piece of work will be received by the great public, whose judgment is not based on the higher criticism. This week two young women were busy hammering out the libretto and cue-books of Wallace Irwin's new burlesque, "Chop Suey." The girls were at work in an office adjoining that of Manager Oppenheimer at the Republic and several times during the afternoon the theatrical promoter noted a cessation in the clicking of the machines and heard the stenographers indulging in a prolonged giggle. This sounded good to his ears, and at length he visited the scene of trouble. "What's the matter?" he inquired, "isn't it funny?" "Funny!" chortled one of the maidens, "why, if you would give me as funny stuff as this all the time I wouldn't mind working overtime." And by such tokens as these the management of the Republic is beginning to look toward March fifteenth with a happy smile.

The minstrels whose voices will lend eclat to the new Republic venture that opens March fifteenth are Richard Jose, the contra tenor, Sidney Harris, baritone, Harry Sylvester, tenor, Al T. Dickinson, basso, and Carl Cameron, tenor. The end men and comedians include William Keller Mack, Charles Stine, Jim Ryder, Harry Conlon and George Clifton. Peurl Wilkerson will be interlocutor and Leo Bruck will be the orchestra leader. The burlesques, "Chop Suey" and "Padlock Holmes," written by Wallace Irwin, will serve to introduce Joe Kane, the clever German comedian, Marie Lamp Adelman, Claudia Rogers, Myrtle Rosedale, Birdie Starrat, Maude Maguire and Genevieve Ward and a chorus of twenty-five "Chop Suey Girls" in Chinese costumes.

Ida Conquest who was John Drew's leading lady during his last visit here and who has been here several times since her first hit as the lame girl in "The Dancing Girl," is Gillette's leading lady in "Sherlock Holmes." Gillette will be well received at the Columbia on Monday night. His last season here in "Secret Service" was one of the most successful shows ever given in this city. Gillette is inimitable and his Sherlock Holmes is said to be one of the best things he has ever done. The play is founded on a hitherto unpublished incident in the career of the great detective and Mr. Gillette has introduced into it some of the most thrillingly realistic situations known to the stage in years. Especial attention is called to the fact that during this engagement the curtain will rise at eight o'clock precisely each evening. Late comers will not be seated until the end of the first act.

The Grand will give a magnificent revival of the strong romantic play of the Napoleonic wars, "The Countess Valeska." Miss Maude Odell will have the title role. The play is one in which the interest is sustained throughout every one of its four acts, and is built upon the vicissitudes of war, which intervene to separate and to finally reunite the Polish Countess and her soldier lover. The situations are strongly defined, and the action breathes of the martial condition of the days when war sounded its wild alarms in all parts of Europe. The incidents are all laid in the vicinity of Friedland, and take place during and previous to the famous battle, from which Napoleon emerged as master. In one of the acts he appears attended by his marshals and suite.

Tolstoi's powerful drama, "Resurrection," taken from his story of the same name, will be given at the Republic beginning tomorrow afternoon. The drama is now being successfully produced in New York and London so San Francisco is fortunate in having a metropolitan success simultaneous with its presentation in the two great cities. Virginia Drew Trescott should do well in the role of Maslova, in which Blanche Walsh achieved a triumph in New York. Prices will be raised for this production on account of the expense entailed.

Nobody should miss seeing "Sowing to the Wind" which at the Alcazar will be given its first presentation in this city at popular prices. It is one of Sydney Grundy's best plays, and abounds in charming situations and clever dialogue. There is a good moral to it, too, that old saying about "The sins of the fathers," etc. Ernest Hastings will have the role which Henry Miller created in the American production, and Alice Treat Hunt will have Viola Allen's part. Oza Waldrop, who has returned to the company, will have the ingenue role that Isabel Irving played in the Baldwin presentation of the play. "Mlle Fifi," next.

"Corianton," which will be the California's offering, is a story of ancient America, a romantic and quasi-religious play. It is based upon the struggles of two prehistoric tribes for supremacy and introduces many spectacular features. Though called a Mormon drama, its author denies that he wrote it with purpose to win converts to his Church. The play comes from Salt Lake direct.

The S. R. O. sign at Fischer's is getting to be a well-whiskered chestnut, for it is always staring the people in the face with its usual smile. "Hoity Toity," the last season's output of Weber & Field's, has tested the enlarged capacity of the theatre every night. Olive Vail, the new soubrette, will sing "Cherry Blossoms" as her opening song next week. "Helter Skelter" is in rehearsal. We're gradually catching up to New York.

There will be four more Mascagni performances at the Tivoli, "Cavalleria" and the hymn from "Iris" will be given with some changes in the orchestral selections, Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Sunday nights. "The Mikado" will alternate, with the same cast as before. Zelie de Lussan in "Carmen" will be the attraction near the end of the month.

Lillian Burkhart will receive a rousing welcome at the Orpheum. Of the many who have turned to vaudeville she is undoubtedly the most successful. Refined comedy is her forte and she comes with a little company of players well worthy to support so eminent an actress. Her opening offering will be "Fifty Years Ago," by Hubert Henry Davies, a former San Franciscan now in London. The Salambos, well remembered here as fire eaters, come with a brand new act in wireless telegraphy and electricity. Briefly, it illustrates how electricity is generated in the body and transmitted by means of glass tubes into electric and arc lighting, and also shows how the electric force is transmitted from the Salambos to objects held some distance away, in explanation of the mystery of wireless telegraphy. Musical Dale, one of the most expert campanologists of the day, is another favorite. Rice and Walters, acrobatic grotesques, will appear in "Bumpity-Bumps" for the first time in this city. The comedian of the team is the best clown seen in vaudeville since the days of George Caron, and all his fun-making is legitimate. Dave Nowlin, the "merry mimic," will make his first appearance here.

Farmer Jones and his pigs will be at the Chutes, with Pickert and Whippler, character dancers, Dalton and Lewis, in an amusing comedy sketch, and Delia Richardson, soprano, Fay and Morton, comedy club jugglers, and Goto's Japanese troupe will be features. The amateurs will appear on Thursday evening.

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

The Brilliant Kocian

First it was Gabrilowitsch, then it was Mascagni; it is still Mascagni, but now comes Kocian, and Pietro must look out for his laurels. "I don't believe that Paganini himself at nineteen could do any more wonderful work," declared a local virtuoso, after the audience at the Alhambra Tuesday evening had bravoed the young Bohemian, booted the barn floor and burst many a goodly pair of gloves. There lives in our musical midst a child who can make on the violin music that is music. I don't believe that Kocian himself at twelve could do any more wonderful work than does she; yet this darling of a dozen years was in despair. "Kocian can play some, yes; but did you hear the lady?" was the compliment Miss Geyer got from a San Franciscan musician of no mean repute. "What's the matter with Spindler?" asked one accompanist of our city. "All that hard stuff in his fingers, and not a speck of print before him!" And so it went. But to come back to Kocian. Wonderful work for a boy of nineteen! There you have it, both the praise and the—blame. Were the work less wonderful, it might be more musical; were it less brilliant, more beautiful. For music is not a diamond, but a dream. Yet even the classicists who heard Paganini played as they will not hear it until Kocian comes again, and the difficult artificial double harmonics of the Sevcik number done in an off-hand manner and with an occasional toss-back to a refractory, fifteen thousand dollar love-lock, are enthusiastic in praise of his technique. Let a boy who will display his ability have but the genius of a Kocian and he may almost any day become a man who can make eternal music, undying in the memory of men.

Kocian will give a matinee today at the Alhambra, his program being: Concerto—F sharp minor, Ernst; Impromptu, Chopin, Traumeswirren, Schumann, Miss Julie Geyer; Cavatina, Cui, Hoeka Modrooka, Sevcik; Gavotte from Suite, Rubinstein, Miss Julie GeGyer; Danse des Sorcieres, Paganini. Kocian, by the way, has been entertained largely during his visit, chiefly by Henry Heyman to whom he brought letters of introduction. On Sunday there was a breakfast at "The Family's" club-rooms followed by a drive to the Cliff, Park and Presidio. Tuesday night after the concert there was a charming little supper at Henry Heyman's home, when a number of musical friends of Kocian were the guests. Kocian is not so good-looking on the stage as he is in his pictures. He is very blond, with a moustache like Paderewski's and long hair that falls into his eyes when he becomes excited. He stands awkwardly, but he may get over that when he is older.

The De Witt Testimonial

As a testimonial to Mr. J. de Witt, stage director of the Tivoli grand opera company, the pupils of Mr. J. Greven and members of T. D. Herzog's ensemble class will give an entertainment in the Alhambra theatre next Wednesday night. A program of rare excellence will be given. "The Magic Flute," Mozart's beautiful opera, will be given as oratorio, with Madame Lenore Greven sustaining the difficult soprano role, the highest ever written for soprano. The "Rigoletto" quartet will be another feature, also the famous sextet from "Lucia" with chorus.

The Kilties' Band will give two farewell concerts to-morrow (Sunday) afternoon and evening at the Alhambra at popular prices of fifty cents and twenty-five cents. In the afternoon the program will be made up specially for young folks, and the evening will be devoted principally to standard melodies and Scotch music. The choir of the band will sing a number of the famous Scotch glees and the best soloist of the band will have important notice.

Chamber Music Concerts

A test of true art is its power of permanently possessing us. There are people whom it is very pleasant to meet once, but whom we exhaust at a sitting; books which we read eagerly enough, but never dream of rereading; pictures which, seen today for the first time, take hold of us, but which tomorrow we pass indifferently by; music which moves us for the moment, but which to remember makes us ashamed, as of a meretricious thing. On the other hand, we have our infinite, inexhaustible friends; our books which we reread with added delight; our pictures which we can neither pass nor behold unmoved; our music which is as sweet in the memory as in the ear, which repetition robs not of its joy, in which is felicity forever. I am minded of these things by the perpetual pleasure afforded me by the Beethoven numbers on the artistically arranged programs of Mr. Henry Holmes's chamber music concerts held in Heine hall. Beethoven's music is ever ennobling and has the eternal charm. And Mr. Holmes is a true artist; hearing him for the twentieth time is more happiness than hearing him for the first. The Beethoven number on the program was the violin solo, Romance in F. op. 50. The music is a masterpiece of a master; the bow was in the hands of a master, the fiddle the finest in San Francisco, and Mr. Fred Maurer was at the piano. The Romance may very readily be made or marred by the accompanist, and it is needless to say that Mr. Maurer did not mar it. The result was a thing of beauty. Miss Parlow played her solo in such a manner as to make one go into the hazardous business of prophesying. If by the time the young artist has doubled her twelve summers, she has not a place among the world's foremost fiddlers, then I will cease consulting the spirits in matters of music. Mr. Holmes announces a new series of concerts commencing April seventh at Heine hall.

Concert Company on Tour

The Pasmores, Mary, Susan and Dorothy, assisted by Miss Beulah George and Miss Zueletta Geery, have returned from a very successful concert tour in Nevada. Everywhere they played they were cordially received, though they came unheralded. In Winnemucca, though they had to play eighteen numbers, just doubling the nine numbers (including Haydn's trio in G. No. 1) on the program, even then the audience was not satisfied until Miss George had dismissed them, as it were, with "The Holy City." At Wadsworth, Reno and Carson the reception accorded them was equally warm, if not quite so demonstrative. Prof. Philip Krall, who is the recognized leader in musical matters up there, is leading the movement for a return tour. The Pasmores, assisted by Mrs. Florence Wyman Gardner, Miss Anna Moore, Miss Zueletta Geery and Mr. H. B. Pasmore, will give a concert in Assembly hall, Stanford University, next Thursday evening. On this occasion Mrs. Gardner will sing the famous aria, "Gli an gui d'inferno," from Mozart's "Magic Flute," with a cadenza that takes in the high G, the "Eiffel Tower G" as it is dubbed by the Parisians; Miss Moore will sing Mr. Pasmore's newest song, "O that we two were maying," and the Pasmores will play for the first time Mendelssohn's trio in D minor, op. 49.

The curator of the Music section of Alameda Adelphian has been fortunate in securing Dr. H. J. Stewart to address the members of the club in April. The Adelphian is in a most prosperous condition and the Music section has provided many good things for the year's programs. Prominent in this section are Mrs. Charles W. Philpott, president of the Ladies' Social Circle, Miss Louise Maguire, Mrs. H. A. Hebbard, Mrs. George H. Perry and Miss Maud Cohen, the curator. Mrs. Perry is curator of the lately organized Shakespeare section for the study of the Bard of Avon's works.

There's a deal of talk about a new symphony orchestra to be a permanent establishment, and of a great leader to come from the East. In the meantime the Zech symphony orchestra is at hand and next Thursday afternoon will be heard at Fischer's. The constant and thorough rehearsing by Mr. Zech of his players is making itself felt and noticed at each concert. The advance in smoothness is a remarkable feature. The program will include Goldmark's "Russian Wedding" symphony, Mr. Zech's new composition, "The Ravin" and an original suite by Von Der Mehden of this city.

Mark Hambourg, the brilliant pianist who made a successful appearance here some years ago, is coming back here on his way to Australia and will give recitals.

Of the newest papers the Linen Bonds displayed by COOPER & Co. are most effective.

Waldemar Lind's Debut

At Steinway hall, Thursday evening, February twenty sixth, Waldemar Lind, a local violinist, who studied abroad a few years under Caesar Thompson, made his debut on the concert stage. Mr. Lind, unfortunately, selected a program of much difficulty. Although he rendered the numbers with praiseworthy skill, it was obvious that his performance would have been much more pleasing had he played selections of less intricacy. His intonation is good and his bowing like that of nearly all Caesar Thompson's pupils is particularly admirable. He was probably heard to best advantage in the Paganini-Thompson etudes and the Passacaglia by Haendel-Thompson. The other numbers on the program were a Concert by Christian Sinding, Concert No. 2 by Max Bruch, and the beautiful Serenade by Tschaikowsky. All the numbers except the first were played entirely from memory, quite a tour de force in its way. Arthur Fickenscher accompanied at the piano in an unsympathetic manner, often completely drowning out the tones of the violin by his fortissimo playing.

A Story About Jenny Lind

Waldemar Lind, by the way, is a cousin of Jenny Lind, the Swedish nightingale who warbled to our grandparents under the stage managership of Barnum the Great. And not long ago I read a story about that famous singer that shows how her memory is kept green in the hearts of those who knew her. It was fifty years ago, when Jenny Lind was singing in New York, that she accepted an invitation from the young midshipmen of the U. S. frigate St. Lawrence to visit their ship. On the appointed day when the diva went aboard the frigate the captain recognized her. There is a strict etiquette observed among a ship's officers, that when one of the messes—the captain's, ward-room and steerage (the midshipmen's)—is entertaining a guest none of the others must intrude. The captain called his orderly and ordered him to say to the gentlemen of the steerage mess that he was going ashore and his cabin was at their disposal. However, the luncheon was served in the steerage, and the company only adjourned to the captain's cabin for coffee.

"Ask her to sing something," whispered the paymaster's clerk.

"I'll thrash you if you dare!" returned one of the midshipmen, under his breath.

The ward-room officers had guests, too. They brought up guitars and sat on the poop-deck above, singing "The Suwanee River" and other popular songs.

"How pretty!" cried Jenny Lind, with enthusiasm, clapping.

When at last she was leaving, she paused on the step between the carved sides of the gangway. Looking up at the floating stars and stripes, she said:

"I wish to salute your flag."

Uncovering her head and holding her hat in her hand, she began to sing "The Star-Spangled Banner." As she sang the first verse every officer and every man came silently on deck. When she had sung the song to the end, deafening cheers rang out from the St. Lawrence, and were taken up by every ship near by. Steamers blew their whistles, and every man within reach of that thrilling voice knew that he had heard one of the most inspiring songs in the world sung as he would probably never hear it again.

Coronation Choir and Concert Party

The Coronation Choir and Glee Party, composed of the leading singers who took part in the coronation services of King Edward and Queen Alexandra at Westminster Abbey last August, will appear at the Alhambra next Monday and Tuesday nights. The company was organized by Mr. Branscombe, one of the leading tenors of the choir, for a tour through the British colonies, and has just concluded a successful tour of Canada. It is now en route to Australia, and this will be the only city in the United States in which this company will appear. The party consists of six boy sopranos, male altos, and the usual quota of tenors and basses, and Madame Marie Hooton, a London concert contralto, who will appear as soloist. Mr. Dudley Caustan, an English entertainer, will appear in humorous musical selections, sketches and monologues. The program for Monday night will include: Madrigal—The Pleasaunt Monthe of Maie (1784-1854), William Reade; part song, "O Hush Thee My Babie," Sir Arthur Sullivan; The Yeoman's Wedding Song, Poniatowski, Mr. Hilton; Ailsa Mine, E. Newton, Mr. Branscombe; "O Dry Those Tears," Tereso Del Riego, Madame Hooton; quartet, Of a' the Airts the Wind can Blaw, William Shore; The Swallows, F. H. Tuesday's program will be different. Seats for the concerts run from fifty cents to one dollar.

With the Money Makers

The Flurry in Gas Shares

The feature of the week, and in fact one of the most notable events in the Stock and Bond market for some years past, was the excitement in Gas stock shares. It is well known that for a long while there has been sharp competition between the several gas companies in this city. For many years the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company, which is really the successor of the old San Francisco Gaslight Company, established by Peter Donohue more than forty years ago, held undisputed sway in gas production. Its stock seldom varied more than $1 or $2 from $100 a share, and so sure were its monthly dividends that it was always regarded as one of the safest and best securities for the investment of trust funds and money belonging to the estates of widows and minor children. But with the growth of the city and the rapid development of the electric light conditions changed for the old company and troublesome rivals entered the field. A few years ago the Equitable Gaslight Company was organized by a local capitalist for the express purpose of selling gas to consumers at $1 per thousand cubic feet. The new company at once commenced active operations and was soon supplying gas to the district east of Stockton and east of Fourth streets, which was one of the most profitable sections of the city for the old company. Of course this competition naturally forced rates down. The old company which had been getting $1.70 and even more recently $1.25 per thousand cubic feet, in order to retain its clients was obliged to cut to 75c, and with the growth of the Equitable Company the 75c. rate had to prevail in all sections where the new company's mains were laid. Shortly after the Claus Spreckels building was erected the owner complained that the two tall smokestacks at the electric light power-house on Jessie street, east of Fourth street, belonging to the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company, were a nuisance, in that the smoke discolored the gray stone of the new Spreckels building and made it uncomfortable for tenants to open their office windows. A request was made that smoke consumers be attached to the two tall chimneys, but the officers of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company curtly refused to remedy the evil complained of, or in fact do anything in the matter at all. It was then that Claus Spreckels said he would organize and equip a gas and electric company, which would run the old company out of business. Forthwith the Independent Light and Power Company was organized and construction commenced at once. The plant now is very extensive, with the finest and most modern equipment both for gas and electric lighting to be found anywhere on the continent. This new company has been and is making heavy inroads on the patronage of the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company, and wherever its mains are laid the old company, in a vain effort to retain patronage, can only charge from 50c. to 75c. per thousand cubic feet. Recently, within a few weeks, a new factor entered the field. Two well-known attorneys, Reuben H. Lloyd and Garrett W. McEnerney, representing powerful financial interests, at present unknown, made a flat offer of $5 per share for all the shares of the Equitable Gaslight Company that should be placed in escrow within the next ninety days and if necessary with an extension of another ninety days, at the same time putting up a bonus of $150,000, which in the event of their failure to comply with the terms of the option should be forfeited to the stockholders of the company. Almost simultaneously with this it was given out, unofficially, that an option had been secured on the stock and plant of the Independent Light & Power Company, on the basis of a $7,000,000 valuation. The uncertainty of the identity of the capitalists seeking to acquire these properties caused some people to believe that the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company was the power behind the throne, and on the strength of this certain speculative interests commenced to boom the stock of that corporation, under the belief that if it acquired control of all its competitors there would be an increase in the price of gas and as a natural sequence a sharp jump in the price of shares. On the strength of this booming process, San Francisco Gas & Electric stock was forced upward from $42 to $58 a share. The latter price, however, was so manifestly top-heavy that it could not be sustained and the tumble commenced. The rumors and counter-rumors and publications in the daily papers compelled the San Francisco Gas & Electric directors to make some kind of a showing. This they did a few days ago in a letter to shareholders in which they stated that outside capitalists were engineering the deal with these other companies and that the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company was not represented in it. They requested shareholders, however, to place their shares of stock in escrow with the Mercantile Trust Company, there to remain for a period of one year, at the same time asking signatures to a power of attorney, permitting a sale of these shares of stock in escrow at a price of not less than $990 a share. Whether this means that the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company contemplates some re-organization scheme or will endeavor to sell to other parties for a stock and bond consideration in lieu of money remains to be seen. It is evident, however, that the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company will have to adopt some means of maintaining their existence against combined and powerful competition which seems to be threatening. It is reported on the street that Claus Spreckels, the owner of the Independent Power Company, is seeking to crush his rival by acquiring all these other properties and thus making it still harder than now for the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company to profitably supply gas and electric light to consumers. On the other hand it has been stated that Eastern capitalists are backing the offer, but whichever way it may be the outlook for the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company seems to be unfavorable.

Quiet on 'Change

Outside the deal in gas lighting shares described elsewhere the local stock and bond market has been quiet during the past week. This might be expected, since the excitement in gas shares was maintained at fever heat for several days and was the main topic of conversation and interest. As that flurry seems to have partially settled down, the situation has assumed more normal conditions, and other stocks are again receiving attention of which they were deprived during the excitement. Sugar shares have been selling fairly well, but mostly in small lots, and prices have been subject to unimportant fluctuations. Hana has shown some little firmness and $4.50 is freely bid but there is scarcely any to be had at less than $4.75, while many holders refuse absolutely to sell at less than $5. Hawaiian Commercial remains about steady but there appears to be a good strong undertone which keeps the bidding price within less than $1 of the asking figure. At present $47.25 to $47.50 may be considered the asking price, with bidders offering $46.50 to $46.75. Several round lots of Hutchison shares have changed hands at $15.87 1-2 and several more could be purchased at $16 if holders could be found willing to sell, but as this is a dividend paying stock, it is held largely for investment purposes, with little reference to the ordinary speculative fluctuations from day to day. Onomea is offered at $22, but this is regarded as a little too high and the firmness of holders prevents business. Paauhau is held well in hand at $16.50 to $17, and while there have been a few sales at $16.75 to $16.87 1-2 the offerings are very light. Makaweli is strong and in demand at $27.50, but there are no offers at less than $28.50, although possibly a bid of $28.25 might bring out a small parcel. Water stocks cut but a small figure in the week's transactions. Spring Valley was offered more freely and prices naturally receded. Liberal lots were offered at $86.62 1-2, but buyers were not desirous of paying more than $86.25, and only then for limited parcels. Contra Costa shares were also on the down grade, selling as low as $63.50. Values for Bank stocks were well sustained with holders backward in offering shares, despite the tempting offers from buyers. The flurry in some of the leading gas shares naturally hardened values for the stock of all the corporations listed. In general stocks there was no marked movement. Alaska Packers was sold at a slight decline while the favorable annual report of the directors of the California Wine Association held the rate for the stock of that corporation firm. Oceanic continued overlooked, with $10 the best bid obtainable. The stockholders of this company will soon be notified when they will receive the new stock at the rate of two shares for each share of old, in accordance with the increase of capital from $2,500,000 to $5,000,000, that was authorized at the annual meeting held on January 21st. After official announcement of the distribution has been made a meeting of the stockholders will be called for the purpose of authorizing a new bond issue. General trading in bonds has been very slow but values have been quite well maintained. —The Financier.

LETTERS

The Lost Dauphin

Bernard Capes has just published a novel entitled, "A Castle in Spain," in which the lost Dauphin is made to figure. The uncertainty as to the fate of the unfortunate royal child has made him a frequent figure in fiction. Mr. Capes imagines him to have been taken from the prison in secret, the body of another child having been substituted, and the report given out that the Dauphin had died. He was taken to a convent near Talavera, in Spain, and the plot of the novel is made up of the adventures of the hero, who is sent, in the wake of Wellington's army, to recover the child. In this connection, a brief letter which was published in the New York Sun of February eighth, has more than a passing interest. It is signed "Henry Llewellyn Williams," and from the surname, "Williams," one may conclude that the author of the communication is connected in some way with the Eleazar Williams who furnished Mrs. Catherwood with the groundwork for the plot of her novel, "Lazarre." Mr. Williams gives his endorsement to the conclusion of the Sun's critic, who was unconvinced as to the reality of the claims of an American Dauphin. He says that during the two Restorations, those of Louis XVIII and Charles X, one Charles G. Naundorff, a watchmaker from Germany, prosecuted his claims to recognition as the son of the murdered king, but as the Orleanists had the funds, he received no recognition from the Royalist supporters. Jules Favre acted as his counsel, and was so convinced of the truth of his cause that he spent both time and money in upholding it. Charles Naundorff died, unrecognized and in poverty, and his son succeeded to the claim which, of course, it was futile to assert during the second empire. This son also died or disappeared, and so far as is known, the race ended. When Jules Favre was a member of the National Defense Committee, 1870-80, he found amongst the National Archives, positive proof of the genuineness of his client's claim, but as he was debarred from using in a private capacity information which reached him as a Cabinet Minister, he could only record his discovery. Naundorff's story followed the popular legend, in stating that the child who died and was buried as the son of "Citizen Capet" was one who was substituted by the connivance of Royalist sympathizers.

A prophet may be without honor in his own country, but surely local authors can enter no complaint against book-buyers in this city. The Bookman's list of the six best-selling books for the month of December is as follows: "Cynic's Calendar of Revised Wisdom," "Seedy Gentleman," "Footprints of the Padres," "Philosophy of Despair," "Virginian," and "Blue Flower." The first four are local publications, and by local writers, for the fact that Charles Warren Stoddard is no longer a resident of San Francisco has not cut him off from us. The other two books are enjoying a high tide of prosperity, and deserving it much better than books of the hour usually do, yet they have been, comparatively speaking, relegated to the background. When Californian writers have anything to say that is worth saying, it is rarely that they can enter a just complaint of lack of recognition.

We are to have a new edition of the Carlyle letters and diaries, "containing much new matter, etc." Now, hasn't the world had just about as much tittle-tattle and gossip about the Carlyles as it can stand? What more is there that can interest any one? Don't we know how Tammas neglected to leave money for household expenses, and grumbled when the grocery bill was too high, or the dog next door barked, and all that? Is there anything to add to Jeannie's jealousy of Lady Ashburnham, and does it make any material difference if the details of another house cleaning are not quite clear to us? "Scotch thrift" was never so completely exemplified as in the cases of the Carlyles and Stevenson. It seems as if almost every week some excuse is found for publishing a new volume, or a new edition of an old volume, or a volume about some other volume. The whole thing is just one remove from charging an admission fee for the privilege of viewing the bodies.

A novel by Gwendolen Overton is promised shortly, and will be awaited with interest. Her "Heritage of Unrest" was an exceptionally strong piece of work, which attracted even more attention in England than it did in America. Although no hint of the plot of her new venture is as yet given out, the publishers assure us that "The Birthright" will surpass "A Heritage of Unrest." As a rule, these advance notices can be accepted as so much wind, the conventional "hot air" of the profession. There are perhaps as many as a score of writers in the English language of whom such prophecies carry even the shadow of fulfillment. Miss Overton ranks well up in the list.

The Literary Hack

"Maxwell Gray" has been taking a hack at the literary hack, and deploring the poor work which must result when jaded powers are spurred to accomplishment because the day's wages is needed for the day's sustenance. It is an old and oft-repeated tale, and we are all ready enough to admit that little good work is accomplished when the heart is not in it. For all that, some of the best writers we have ever known have been graduates of the "hack school." They learned to stick to their tasks and do their work, and their "hack" experience supplied in another form what Anthony Trollope declared to be one of the greatest aids to the production of literature—a piece of shoemakers' wax in the seat of the writing chair. Shakespeare was a "hack," producing his plays not for the joys of literature, but for the prosaic needs of daily bread. Dickens was another "hack," and Thackeray another. Sir Walter Scott "hacked" hard and persistently to pay his debts, and one might prolong the list indefinitely. There are very few who write and write anything worth reading, who are not spurred on by need in some form. No doubt there are, amongst the "upper circles," many who could produce masterpieces if they gave their minds to it, but the circumstance that they are emancipated from the need of earning their living is all-sufficient reason why they do not. It is all very fine to talk of "Art for art's sake," and working for the joy of work, but there is nothing to prove that the much-derided "hack" does not enjoy the labor of creation quite as much as he does the pecuniary compensation. On the other hand, it does not follow that a thing is good because the producer's egotism and self-satisfaction find it so. If "Maxwell Gray" and others who share her opinion are in the right, then the dilettante society amateur should distance all other writers, the artists and musicians should be relegated to the background, and only those whose efforts are not tainted by vulgar considerations of future compensation would accomplish anything worth while. As it is, it is just the other way. It is the spur of necessity which makes Pegasus a good steed.

The Reign of Fiction

Because there have been few phenomenal sellers, and less sensational advertising of novels of late, it is taken for granted in some quarters that the reign of fiction is over and people are going in for more serious reading. There is probably a modicum of truth in the idea. One result of the diluted wash of the "historical" novel has been to turn the attention of the best of readers of popular works in the direction of history and biography, but there is not the least danger that the reign of fiction is over. Story telling has endured since the beginning of time, and will probably continue until the crack of doom, but the sensational advertising has been in the nature of the exemplification of the old fable of the boy and the wolf. One after another, poor, weak, flabby, artificial books has been put on the market with great flourish of trumpets and beating of drums. Each in turn has been heralded as the greatest and best, and each in turn has shown itself to be unworthy of serious consideration. The cry of "Wolf! wolf!" has been raised so often that people have come to the conclusion that there is no wolf, and they are inclined to go soberly about their affairs without undue excitement. In the long run, "every herring must hang by its own head," and the assertions of publishers and the columns of advertising count for little. To quote President Lincoln's favorite aphorism, "You can fool all of the people some of the time, and some of the people all of the time, but you can't fool all of the people all of the time."

Edward W. Townsend (Chimmie Fadden) has two books under way, one of which is to be called "Lees and Leaven." The other is as yet unbaptized, but will probably be called "A Summer in New York." After "Days Like These," there should be no question about their reception.

Edmond Rostand is reported to be engaged on another poetical drama. Does it follow that it will be succeeded by another attack of insanity?

Other People's Ideas

From "The House with the Green Shutters," by George Douglas:

"Like most scorners of the world's opinion, Gourlay was its slave, and showed his subjection to the popular estimate by his anxiety to flout it. He was not great enough for the carelessness of perfect scorn."

"Strong men of a mean understanding often deliberately assume, and passionately defend, peculiarities of no importance because they have nothing else to get a repute for."

"It is only when a mind feels secure in itself that it can laugh unconcernedly at others."

"A coward always sniggers when insulted, pretending that the insult is only a joke of his opponent, and therefore to be laughed aside. So he escapes the quarrel which he fears a show of displeasure might provoke."

"Our insight is often deepest into those we hate, because annoyance fixes our thought on them to probe."

Tarmillan: "Man, it's an irksome think to write, and to be asked about it makes you squirm. It's almost as offensive to ask a man when his book will be out, as to ask a woman when she'll be delivered."

Allan: "It's the danger of the aphorism that it states too much in trying to be small."

Allan: "Courage is the great thing. It often succeeds by the mere show of it. It's the timid man that a dog bites. Run at him and he runs."

Tam: "There are various kinds of imagination. In its lowest form it merely recalls something which the eyes have already seen, and brings it visibly before the mind. A higher form pictures something which you never saw, but only conceived as a possible existence. Then there's the imagination which not only sees but hears—actually hears what a man would say on a given occasion, and entering into his blood, tells you exactly why he does it. The higher form is both creative and consecrative, if I may use the word, merging in diviner thought. It irradiates the world."

Johnny Coe: "A little ability 's a dangerous thing. To be safe you should be a genius, winged and flying, or a crawling thing that never leaves the earth. It's the half-and-half that hell gapes for. And owre they flap."

"The diversions of some men are merely subsidiary to their lives, externals easy to be dropped; with others they usurp the man. They usurp a life when it is never happy away from them, when in the midst of other occupations absent pleasures rise vivid to the mind, with irresistible call."

"There is nothing more vindictive than a weakling. When he gets a chance he takes revenge for everything his past cowardice forced him to endure."

"To bring a beaten and degraded look

The Monkey and the Chestnuts

A New Version.

There were once two women who were such warm friends that they would have followed the Scriptural precept. Each would have given her life for the other. With them friendship was more than a name. They were very fond of reading Ella Wheeler Wilcox and one of their favorite poems was "Maurine," in which appear such sentiments as :—

"Friendship is not friendship at the best Till circumstances put it to the test."

These they loved, and quoted on all occasions.

It so happened that there came a man upon the scene. He made love to one woman on certain occasions, flirting desperately with the other at other times. Both women became more than a little interested in him, as was natural. There is no woman on earth who is not susceptible to flattery, if it is delicately applied. And there is no flattery more subtle than that directed at the heart.

One friend, who thoroughly believed the man adored her, discovered that her friend, the other woman, had in the process of flirting lost a bit of her cardiac organ to the man. Her own heart was only slightly dented. "After you, my dear Alphonse," she said to herself, and resolved to leave a clear field to her rival. "Better lose my lover than my friend," she reasoned, "for lovers grow on bushes, while friends happen but once in an eternity." And she quoted from E. W. W.:

"Time can heal the saddest hurts of Love,
While Friendship's wounds gape wide and yet more wide,
And bitter fountains of the spirit prove."

The other woman, meanwhile, who was desperately enamored of the man, noticed that her friend was also not averse to his attentions. She communed with herself, wept a little and prayed more, then "You first, my dear Gaston," she said to her soul. And the next time the man called, she was not at home.

Now the man had never been quite sure, up to this, which of the women he loved. They were both agreeable, to both he warmed on occasion, both were brilliant and beautiful, and it was hard to determine which were the more charming.

But when the one woman closed her doors upon him, he found it was she whom he loved the better. She could not have found a surer way to stimulate his growing passion. The result was he called one night, took her unawares and proposed to her. Fortifying herself with the thought of her friend's broken heart in the event of acceptance, the woman refused the man coldly and decisively.

He went away more angry than sad, and happening to meet the other woman in the street the next day, he asked her to dine with him. On the spur of the moment, she found no excuse to decline. They dined and he, stirred by the wine and her proximity, asked her to marry him. She had not seen her friend that day, and the spirit of self-sacrifice, heated by a touch of pardonable vanity that she was his choice, moved her to thoughts of her dear woman friend. She refused him.

The next day, the two women met, but they exchanged no confidences from a feeling of delicacy toward the man.

The man went his way. He still saw the two women occasionally but he no longer felt the same interest in them. He had met another woman, just as beautiful and brilliant, who did not conceal her penchant for his society. In the course of time they were married.

Then, and not till then, did the two women friends mention his name and their former regard for him.

"I refused him," said one, "but I thought he would marry you."

"You refused him? So did I," returned her friend, "but because I thought you loved him."

But instead of making closer friends of the two women this discovery struck a death-blow at the sentiment. Each was hurt in her vanity that the other should have imagined her heart could be broken by any man on earth. They never felt quite the same toward each other again.

Which shows that self-sacrifice is not always the right thing in this world, for most often the other fellow gets the benefit of it.

Hearst in Politics and Journalism

Mr. Hearst stated in an interview some days ago that he purposed devoting his time to politics, and withdrawing from active management of his newspapers. Perhaps Mr. Hearst is of the opinion that a candidate for President shouldn't have too many responsibilities on his shoulders. Being a man of good judgment he feels, no doubt, that it would be better for him to run on his merits than as the proprietor and editor of a string of newspapers. The most successful moulders of public opinion, editors who have created statesmen, have courted disappointment and chagrin by running for office. Silence is golden, but no editor has ever profited by the maxim. He talks too much through the columns of his paper, and he pays the penalty of his loquacity when, as a candidate for office, he makes a bid for popular favor. The most successful newspaper proprietors are usually men without political ambition. When a newspaper proprietor is seized with political aspirations he destroys confidence in his paper, for he can no longer resist the temptation to color its utterances. And even though his utterances should be perfectly honest they would inspire distrust. Exemplification of this tendency of human nature is at hand today. The Hearst newspapers are engaged in disparaging the present Administration. They are too adroit to openly attack the Administration, but they publish stories calculated to arouse prejudice against the President. They tell how he has increased the expense of living in the White House, and they do it in a way to convey the impression that he has imperialistic notions about the splendor that should distinguish the environment of the Nation's chief. They have aroused public sentiment in the South by frequent reference to Roosevelt's friendship for the negroes, and they have appealed to that sentiment which revolts at the lust of animal slaughter by publishing thrilling cartoons, and telling of the exploits of Roosevelt as a hunter of wild game. Even though Mr. Hearst were not a candidate for President his papers would no doubt be dealing in that same kind of anti-Administration literature, but being a candidate people are inclined to criticise his attitude and to charge him with indulging in personalities for selfish purposes. Already his zeal in dealing with the Republicans' dilatory methods in connection with the Trust fight is viewed with suspicion, and in fact his papers cannot make a move without its bearing upon his political aspirations being considered. It is therefore apparent that he is treading on extremely dangerous ground. And that he is not unaware of the fact is evident from his announcement that he intends to leave the management of his papers to others. No doubt he wishes to anticipate the reaction that would be likely to set in were the attacks on the Administration to become too severe. The situation is an extremely delicate one and will be watched with deep interest. Mr. Hearst is playing an extremely hazardous game, but he may be depended upon to play it with great skill. Those who admire him as a newspaper man and who appreciate him as a tremendous force for good in the field of journalism, fear that the task he has set for himself is one that may lead him to overreach, and there are others among his admirers who do not take his Presidential aspirations seriously. They believe that he is more concerned about his newspaper enterprises than he is about the Presidency, and that he has gone into politics merely for advertising purposes.

The Carmen's Demand

That branch of the local Labor Trust represented by the employes of the Street Railroads company has given notice of intention to demand higher wages in May next. Some months ago the street railroad men made certain demands for increase of wages and shorter hours which were refused. As a consequence they refused to work and after a brief "tie-up" of the system the differences between employer and employes were arbitrated and settled in a manner satisfactory to the latter. During that strike public sentiment was with the gripmen and the conductors, and that was why they had little difficulty in enforcing their demands. They are likely to face an entirely different situation when the proposition to raise their wages once more comes up for consideration. Indeed, should they insist upon having their wages raised in accordance with the notice given, the probability is that they will be met with most emphatic refusal, and that strenuous efforts will be made to operate the street railroad system without their assistance. In other words, a serious strike is imminent, and one in which public sentiment may not be with the workingmen. A clash between labor and capital under such circumstances should be deeply deplored. The enemies of labor are eager for something to occur that shall prove disastrous to unionism, and nothing more disastrous could occur to the labor organizations of this city, than a strike with popular sympathy on the side of capital. It is believed in financial circles that the corporation which owns the street railroads of this city is not in a sound condition; that it is not making sufficient money to keep the system properly equipped for the transportation of its patrons, and that it is going from bad to worse. If such be the case then of course it would be ruinous to raise the wages of its employes. However, the question is one that could be easily settled by arbitrators.

The Jesuits and Their Enemies

It is reported that the German Government has removed the ban from the order of Loyola, and that the Jesuits are to be permitted to conduct their educational institutions once more within the dominions of the Kaiser. It is remarkable what a vast volume of misinformation has been spoken and written on the subject of the Jesuits, and with what prejudice they are regarded even at this late day by people representing a cultured element of the public. There are people who have read that masterpiece of fiction, "The Wandering Jew.," and who have absorbed from its pages such a deep-rooted prejudice against the Jesuits that they are astonished to learn that such an intelligent man as Emperor William would menace the peace and quiet of his country by permitting those arch-conspirators to gain a foothold within his dominions. The real Jesuit is a far less romantic and picturesque person than he is in the hands of popular authors. The members of the Society of Jesus of the present day are for the most part quiet scholars engaged in teaching school, or writing books, or in prosecuting scientific investigation. They are not the scheming and crafty priesthood they are represented to be by Henry Seton Merriman in that absurd tale, "The Velvet Glove," and nobody ever hears of their engaging in politics. For a considerable time attacks have been made on the alleged doctrines of the Jesuit body, as though they were doctrines separate in themselves and distinct from Roman Catholic doctrines, and a great many attacks have been made with alleged quotations from writers, which in every instance have been shown to be misquotations. The most popular calumny hurled against the Jesuits is that they profess and practice the doctrine that "the end justifies the means," and that in pursuance of this atrocious maxim they have committed perjury, theft and murder. This belief is very general and it is vouched for on the authority of some distinguished theologians, and also of the Encyclopædia Brittanica. Yet it is strange that intelligent people should believe that the Jesuits should persist in spreading their nets before the eyes of those whom they wish to inveigle. Why, if they desire to impose on men, should they be at such pains to let all the world know that they are impostors, that all their pretense of sanctity is sham and that none should venture to sup with them unless provided with a very long-handled spoon? However the doctrine that the end justifies the means is said by those that attribute it to the Jesuits to be found in the writing of members of the Society. An examination of the writings of the Jesuits quoted by their enemies is sufficient to prove that they have been misrepresented, and that at the very outset of their treatises they teach as a fundamental principle that the end however good does not and cannot justify the means, if those means themselves are bad. In this connection it is interesting to recall that in 1850 Father Roh, a German Jesuit, issued a public challenge, offering to pay the sum of one thousand Rhenish guilders to any one who in in the judgment of the faculty of laws of the University of Heidelberg or Bonn should establish the fact that any Jesuit had ever taught the doctrine that the end justifies the means or any doctrine equivalent to it. That Emperor William has decided to remove the ban against the Jesuits is not surprising to those familiar with recent developments in various countries of Europe, that have tended to arouse sympathy for the scholarly men who have done so much for science and literature in recent years. In England especially has there been great reaction in public sentiment so far as the Jesuits are concerned. Only a little over a year ago representatives of the Society in London seized the opportunity to resent calumnies against it by instituting libel suits against certain newspapers, and in every instance they either obtained retractions or recovered judgment.

Tolstoi and Rockefeller

One cannot help but be amused at the indignation which is hurled at the head of the scion of the house of Rockefeller because of the views he has expressed in regard to the accumulation of riches. Mr. Rockefeller interprets the Scriptures to suit himself, which is the glorious privilege for which Martin Luther contended, and where people with nothing, or very little of the world's goods and gear, are in favor of a literal interpretation of the injunction to "sell all thou hast and give to the poor," he interpolates a modification—if "what thou hast" interferes with thy salvation. Where the fun comes in is that young Rockefeller is condemned for saying in words what the belauded Count Tolstoi lives in acts. Rockefeller dresses well and keeps clean. Tolstoi sports rags and is a fit subject for a Board of Health survey and condemnation, and there lies the chief difference between them. Tolstoi preaches the blessings of poverty and humility, but he takes good care to live within the reach of all he wants. Disciples who come from afar to worship at the shrine of the saint with the expectation of finding an anchorite and ascetic, voluntarily depriving himself of luxuries and devoting himself to the good of his fellow men, are disillusioned when they discover a luxurious home with a generous table, servants, carriages, and in short, all the belongings of a wealthy land owner. There is the count, in peasant blouse, to be sure, but it and the shoemaker's bench which are dragged into the foreground of every pen picture are mere stage properties. Rockefeller says plainly that gifts to the impecunious are pauperizing. Tolstoi withholds his hand and preaches the opportunities for brotherly love and Christian charity. Tolstoi's estate is behind the times, even in Russia, in the matter of useful improvements and what the poorest farmers in our country would regard as absolute necessities. Much is made of the theatrical exhibition of Tolstoi drawing water on a sled for domestic purposes, but when one of the huts of his village caught fire, and twenty houses were destroyed for lack of a fire engine, practical people discounted the value of the titled example. There were but three spades in the whole community, and one hammer, passed from hand to hand in turn, but Tolstoi did not take it upon himself to pauperize the unfortunates. On the contrary, he thought it all right. One solitary instance of "charity" is reported to us. A boy of fifteen or thereabouts, a cripple with but one arm, was taken to the Tolstoi castle to be fitted out with a pair of cast-off shoes and a gift of money. The shoes given him were too small for his feet, and full of holes, and the money was entirely forgotten. In fact, poverty, abstinence, temperance and cleanliness of body or mind are foreign to this faker. He is a mass of inconsistencies and contradictions, demanding results without effort, in every direction. If he were in America, where the ubiquitous reporter could reach him, and the snap-shot fiend "catch" him unawares, the bubble of his reputation would have been effectually pricked long ere this, and instead of posing on the top of the tower, like St. Stylites, he would be shown to be a hypocritical humbug, who parts with nothing but words. If our Rockefellers, Carnegies and condemned plutocrats generally were to place themselves actually in the position which Tolstoi occupies they would be mobbed. Where Rockefeller sees no reason why he should not hold on to his wealth and serve the Lord at the same time, Tolstoi turns his property over to his family, but enjoys all its benefits, and then falls back on poverty and humility as an excuse for parsimony.

The Talking of Triggs

Professor Oscar Lovell Triggs, of Dr. Harper's hustling university, is once more attracting attention to the institution by saying things that excite derision. If Professor Triggs were not a member of a university faculty his utterances would escape attention, but as he is a college professor he is given a hearing, and in view of what he has said from time to time one cannot help wondering how he manages to hold his job. The presumption is that he finds it advantageous to pose as the panegyrist of John D. Rockefeller, for the latter has been so liberal to the University of Chicago that Dr. Harper probably vouchsafes him a voice in the management of the institution. Perhaps Rockefeller is responsible for Triggs. It was at a meeting of the Cook County League of Women's Clubs that Triggs gave to the world his very latest thoughts. The subject was "The New Man." "The present order of man will pass away," said Triggs. "There shall come a new humanity. Notice the passing of patriotism, which is merely an expanded egotism. Notice the new state of diplomacy. All this points to the new era when the social spirit will prevail, when the selfish, the egotistic motive will be gone. The business man will wish to share his successes with the rest of society." What a profound thinker is Triggs! His definition of patriotism is clever enough to pass for a bon mot at a pink tea. But isn't there something wrong with the culturine on which our college professors diet when they confound chauvinism with patriotism? What a fine institution for the training of American youth is that Chicago university in which the doctrine is set forth that to be patriotic is to be conceited; that love of country is merely self-love on an expanded scale! "Notice," says Triggs, "the passing of patriotism"! We should like to know where the passing of it is to be observed. Nothing has happened in this part of the country to indicate that patriotism is becoming extinct. Perhaps Triggs thinks that he has banished feelings of patriotism from the Chicago university by exposing its kinship to egotism. But hearken to the addle-pated academician on the subject of the "new humanity," and then marvel that such a man should be permitted to represent an American institution of learning: "The business man will wish to share his successes with the rest of society." In other words the earth is to become one vast Altruria, and the new business man will divide his profits among his customers, and everybody will share in the dividends of the big corporations. Triggs has beautiful dreams. We shouldn't be surprised to learn that the professor is a dope-fiend.

The Ideal Paper

Dr. Parkhurst, professional reformer, is in the throes of establishing an ideal newspaper. Thus far he has had only the easy part of the job, getting people interested enough to subscribe funds. By and by, when it comes to making the enterprise pay, it will be a different story. People are often willing to contribute out and out charity, and take their return in having their names associated with those of social somebodies, but when it comes to investing in a business enterprise, they look for cash returns. It is the easiest thing in the world to sit at an office desk and map out on paper an ideal daily or weekly. We are all willing to admit that much of the "news" which is published is of no value whatever to ourselves, at least, and we all know that the details of crimes and private scandals and peccadilloes are set forth with too much particularity. But we also know, and to our shame, that the paper which goes the deepest into these details, and gives most publicity to rumors and conjectures, is the most sought for. Any one can establish an ideal paper if he can control capital enough to back his enterprise, and he will find no difficulty in securing editors, contributors and reporters in accord with his views. He can exclude all the questionable advertisements, and readily fill their places with the best, but when he comes to look for ideal readers, he will find it another story. Some of the very ones who are most loud-mouthed in denouncing yellow sensationalism would be the first to complain of a lack of spice in their diurnal diet. The editors may not be deluged with letters from "Vox Populi" or "Publicus," voicing the complaint, but there will be some excuse formulated for patronizing the best sheet which most nearly conforms to the popular demand. Either the carrier arrives earlier in the morning, or the market reports are more satisfactory, or the editorial page is easier to get at, but down under it all the plain truth is that it dishes up sensations in more palatable form. The newspapers are as good as the people that patronize them, and the ideal reform paper will go the way of all spasmodic reforms. Either it will gradually relax until it cannot be distinguished from its contemporaries, or it will speedily suspend operations.

HAVE YOU BEEN THERE?

The Showman

The world has been treated recently to some admirable fooling in the way of mediæval justice. Certain far-off echoes that have invaded this continent were concerned with the spectacular features of the trial of Colonel Arthur Lynch, M. P., for high treason. They seem to have left the general impression of a stage play with elaborate setting of costume and accessories. The judges were habited in red and wore those full-bottomed wigs, which on a rear view convey the effect of an old-fashioned beehive of a variety as much out of date as the wigs. Solemnly seated as the centrepiece of this delightful masquerade, their lordships, with their wigs flowing down their august backs, listened to the reading of an indictment altogether in character and calculated to keep up the illusion. This document recited that the prisoner, "not having the fear of God in his heart and instigated thereto by the devil," did commit divers and sundry offenses against the Majesty of Great Britain, to-wit, among other things being a British subject he had fought for the Boers. An American lawyer defending the prisoner would assuredly have asked for a non-suit at the close of the case for the prosecution, on the ground that the Crown lawyers had failed to prove instigation by the devil; but perhaps this was not permitted by the rules of the play.

The heavy villain of the piece, Colonel Lynch, was, we are told, "pale but polite." He seems to leave a sense of inadequacy. He was not what the dramatic critics call "convincing." Surely he ought to have hurled something—defiance, at least, if he had nothing else in reach. But perhaps his was the method of modern melodrama.

The play was played out to the end. Having convicted the prisoner of collogueing with the devil—pho! who said "devil"?—the bigwigs proceeded to sentence Colonel Lynch to be hanged. Of course the bigwigs knew and every man in the courtroom knew that no such sentence would or could be carried out. In that view it is to be regretted that they did not stick to the old form and sentence the prisoner to be hanged, drawn and quartered. It is a pity to spoil a romance because men have not the courage of their barbarism. These additional indignities done on the body of a traitor in a bygone day were meant, not to give pain to the offender, but pleasure to the spectators. It would have been a nice attention to the comfort and enjoyment of the audience had the bigwigs been permitted to produce the drama to its logical absurdity.

Melodrama is not a monopoly of British politics. We are perhaps lacking in the accessories of costume and a shivery, historical background, but, in default of better, the border drama exemplified in some recent elections of United States Senators does very well. Some of these presented a grim visage to satisfy the most bloodthirsty. In others the wrinkled front of villainy frowned and squirmed. There was always a sense of something going to happen. In Colorado there were pistols. In Delaware there was the wicked gasman. The audience in the gallery delights to boo and execrate the gasman who, notwithstanding these expressions of hate, has been giving a continuous performance for years, the Lord knows how many. He does not seem to be getting much nearer to his goal, if he has a goal other than that of every stage villain. Foiled again! Perhaps he likes to be the gasman.

From Utah they have sent a Senator to whom objection is made that he is an "apostle" of the wrong breed. The objection is somewhat confusing as a specification of constitutional disability, but the most inexperienced playgoer knows that melodrama never stops to explain. Action only is wanted, and the man who asks leave to stop and consider is clouted on the ear with the next catastrophe. The illusion is everything and that cannot be maintained if analysis is permitted. The great thing is to keep up the sense of something going to happen. Of course, there is always the comfortable sense that nothing does really happen. In Colorado nothing has happened and in Delaware nothing. It is doubtful if anything is likely to happen to the latter day apostle. That is the play—keep the people on the edge of comfortable expectancy.

* * * *

The attachment of the American people to the Monroe Doctrine gives the lie direct to the charge that our ideals are purely material and gross. It might be difficult to state in terms of legal tender what advantage accrues to the United States from the enforcement of the doctrine. Indeed, an illustrious colonel from Kentucky—a very picturesque personage—has engaged in a demonstration of his sense of the national impolicy in this regard and flouts with bitter gibe our attitude of international Providence assumed for the advantage of ungrateful neighbors, who suspect we are pursuing our own. It has been the consent of nations that altruism may not be recognized as a motive or justification for international interference, and hence the Monroe Doctrine and Mr. Hay's remonstrance in the case of the Roumanian Jews are something altogether new to diplomacy. It is perhaps for this reason that our disinterested efforts have made us the object of unworthy suspicion, even by the people for whose protection we exert ourselves. Nevertheless, these considerations, whether animated by Kentucky eloquence or impelled by shabby suspicion, do not weigh. We cleave to our historical doctrine with affection. It is part of our tradition, our reputation, and we must live up to its obligations. A reputation is something that entitles a man to engage in a fight, so the pugilists tell us. Diplomacy recognizes no such thing as a free fight. You cannot go to war and be respectable unless you have a casus. If this country is to be a world power we must play the rules of the game. Therefore, we have exalted the Monroe Doctrine to the dignity of a casus belli; but the other nations and Colonel Watterson treat it with contumely, as something scarcely respectable, because we cannot make money out of it.

The point is this: There is no people and no nation more malleable to the impulsion of an idea than the Americans. He fulfill obligations of our tradition, and there is no other country that would go to war on a point of logic. There is a certain, fine, romantic streak that runs all through the national life, and if we find that Uncle Sam feeds his soul, his glassy essence on the pie that mother used to make, we need not feel ashamed when some one tells us that this is merely an affectionate memory based on incipient facts. The Monroe Doctrine is pie that Mother made. —Pop.

The Hearst Boom

Having launched the Hearst presidential boom and given the politicians all over the country something to talk about, James H. Budd returned quietly to town the other day and resumed the practice of law. I had a talk with the ex-Governor on the subject of Hearst's presidential aspirations, and he told me that Democratic sentiment in favor of the nomination of the young Napoleon of journalism was growing throughout the country. "It is only in California," he said, "that you hear of any objections, but that is quite natural. Never in the history of California did the people of this State get behind a Californian who aspired to high office at Washington. From Stephen J. Field to Justice McKenna the envious Californian croakers here made themselves heard whenever there was an opportunity to give signal recognition to a representative of this State. And as a consequence of the failure of Californians to stand together as do the people of Eastern States, California cuts not the slightest figure in national politics. So far as Washington is concerned California is more remote than the Philippine Islands."

He "Holds" New Yorkers

William Marion Reedy, the brilliant editor of the St. Louis Mirror, has been spending a few weeks in New York and from there he wrote a gossipy letter to his paper last week in which he stated that though much is being said in other parts of the country about the candidacy of men like Shepard and Parker, New York has a presidential aspirant in the person of William Randolph Hearst. Though he is not a Hearst boomer he has this to say of him:

> Mr. Hearst has been much maligned. He has been gay. He has liked the ladies and bought them diamond necklaces and things. He has, on occasion, "opened wine" most lavishly. But he has quit all that. He has become serious about all things, including himself. He has done some big things in his time here. He made a bet that he'd bring on a war with Spain and he won it. He supported Mr. Bryan in two campaigns and did so with supreme intelligence. He has exposed the efforts of Rockefeller, Archbold and others to dictate to the Senate its action on the recent anti-trust measure. He has been a brilliant journalist, as brilliancy is reckoned nowadays, and he has lived down, by sheer force of character, the bitter accusations that he, through the instrumentality of Caricaturist Davenport, brought about the assassination of William McKinley. "Willie" Hearst, as he is often called here, has made a bigger impression upon this great town than any young man who ever came here. Of course he had millions to start with, but how many men have come to New York with millions, only to drop the millions and scarcely make a ripple on the surface of things! Hearst has written himself large here, and he shows no signs of growing stale in his work. * * * Mr. Hearst interests New York, and has been doing so for some years. It is something for any young man to be able to do things that hold New Yorkers for awhile.

The Fair Case

While Governor Budd was in the East he was retained as attorney for the relatives of Mrs. Charley Fair in the contest over her estate. Budd was formerly one of the attorneys for Charley Fair, but he never represented either Mrs Vanderbilt or Mrs. Oelrichs. He took no part in the settlement with the Nelson family after the tragedy in France. He says that the Nelsons are prepared to return the money they received, and he is positive that they will eventually be awarded the five or six millions left by Charley Fair. The settlement was made upon the assumption that Fair survived his wife, and that statement is contained in the papers drawn up at the time of the compromise. Budd asserts that the testimony taken at the inquest was to the effect that Mrs. Fair was alive twenty minutes after her husband's death. He also declares that there is an anatomical fact which cannot be obliterated, and which demonstrates that Mrs. Fair survived her husband. He declines to divulge what the fact is, but the probability is that to establish it it will be necessary to exhume the bodies. Those bodies are no doubt being carefully guarded these days.

McNab Perennial Candidate

When that perennial job-chaser, Franklin K. Lane, was beaten at the last election, it was hoped that the political quietus had been put upon him, and that he would cease from troubling for awhile. Not so, however. Mr. Franklin K. Lane is as chipper as ever, and he is seriously in training for the Democratic nomination for Mayor of this city. His sponsor is Gavin McNab. The impertinence of Mr. Lane is colossal. In the last campaign he solemnly repudiated Gavin McNab. McNab was an issue of the campaign. Lane felt that he could not be elected unless he convinced the labor unions that he did not owe allegiance to the kiltied boss, and on every occasion he proclaimed his independence and asserted that he was "no man's man." Everybody understood that the reference was to Gavin, but he didn't succeed in deluding everybody, for there were a few who knew that Lane and McNab were bosom friends, and that the repudiation was purely theatrical. There were others that doubted the sincerity of Lane, but they were reluctant to believe that McNab was so lacking in self-respect as to be willing to be repudiated fictitiously as though his was the cloven foot which honest men despised. However McNab discreetly remained in the background, and purposely refrained from active participation in the campaign in order to give verisimilitude to the attitude of the Democratic candidate.

Their Sores Not Yet Healed

No sooner was the election over than McNab emerged from his retreat and proceeded to groom his friend Lane for another contest. No longer do they attempt to veil the deceit of the late campaign. They have been hobnobbing at public banquets ever since the election and together they have been planning the next municipal campaign. McNab is no doubt willing to be repudiated again. He is as unblushing in his methods as ever was the unspeakable Buckley, who on many occasions instructed his candidates to go out and denounce him as a villain and a thief so that they might create the impression that they were nominated against his wishes. And meanwhile both McNab and Lane are complaining of those that did not support the Democratic candidate for Governor. Their complaining, however, is not half so bitter as that of the other candidates on the ticket, who received no support from the so-called standard-bearer. Mr. Lane made the most selfish campaign that was ever witnessed in this or any other State. It was a campaign for Lane and for no one else. He made no fight for the Democratic ticket. He completely ignored the Democratic candidates for Congress and the candidates for every other office. Mr. Lane foisted himself on the party once but he will find it somewhat difficult to repeat the performance.

Zelie and Jimmy

The tabbies are on the trail of Jimmy Phelan once more. Our bewhiskered bachelor millionaire with his income of a thousand a day is a shining mark for the tabbies. They have had him engaged to almost every available girl in society and one or two just beyond the fringe. But in each and every instance there was nothing doing, and in club circles, where a man's love affairs are public property, the tabbies have been laughed at. Jimmy's club acquaintances—he has no intimate friends—say that there never was a chance of his getting married and they hint vaguely at all sorts of mysterious things. However there are others who are equally confident that he is not immune to the matrimonial microbe, and they are responsible for the latest story concerning an affaire d'amour in which he is said to be involved. It was probably suggested by a hint in an item which I reprinted from an Eastern paper last week, referring to the attentions Zelie de Lussan was receiving from a San Francisco bachelor. It is true that Miss de Lussan has received many attentions from Mr. Phelan since her arrival, but the tabbies regard with more than ordinary significance the circumstance of his receiving her in his own residence. Heretofore it has been customary for Mr. Phelan to entertain visiting lions at one of his clubs, but Miss de Lussan was honored in the Phelan family domicile. They have also remarked that both Mr. Phelan and Miss de Lussan went to Southern California for a vacation, and they think that altogether enough has taken place to warrant the suspicion that an engagement will soon be announced. And yet those "wise guys" of the clubs, who know it all, wink the other eye and reiterate that millionaire Jimmy is as far from matrimony as ever.

The tabbies don't require much of a peg to hang an engagement on. They have viewed as significant the lingering of Lily Lawlor long after the announcement of her intended departure with the Gus Spreckels's, and they have remarked that she appears to have made the greatest kind of a hit with the other millionaire bachelor, Harry Tevis, who has been quite successful in repulsing Cupid notwithstanding the strategic moves of numerous matchmaking mammas. Miss Lawlor appears to prefer the company of Harry Tevis to the pleasure of a trip abroad.

Miss Clement's Defection

Laura McKinstry and Jennie Blair will soon find themselves the only ones left of that former coterie of brilliant bachelor girls in society. One by one they are forswearing their allegiance to spinsterhood. Kate Clement's engagement with Dixwell Hewitt, an ex-New Yorker now of our city, has been whispered for some time but until formally announced last Friday no one quite believed it more than a rumor. Miss Clement is one of the most independent girls in the Oakland and San Francisco swim, and because of her bright wit has always been a sought-for guest at dinners and luncheons. She is a wonderful conversationalist and raconteuse, and she numbers among her accomplishments flute-playing, being a clever musician, and hat-trimming, in which she is very skillful. She is a great friend of Mrs. "Joe" Tobin, and at one time imitated the latter's style of dressing. She exhibits French skill in making her own clothes and has even fabricated tailor suits on Mrs. Tobin's models. She has even successfully copied Mrs. Tobin's forty-dollar hats. So Kate Clement is decidedly more interesting than the ordinary society butterfly.

Dixwell Hewitt is an Oakland insurance man of middle age. He formerly lived in Redlands. He has been more devoted to clubs than to society, and he has been very busy making money. He is a brother of Mrs. E. H. Davenport and a cousin of Senator Hanna, the maker of Presidents.

Will Go Abroad

Miss Laura McKinstry, by the way, will be greatly missed for the next six months. Under Mrs. Henry T. Scott's protecting wing she will see Europe, and it is prophesied will meet abroad her fate. Miss McKinstry shares with Kate Clement the eclat of being the most brilliant wit among our society girls. She is also inclined to churchgoing and charity, and her proteges will miss her as much as society. She belongs to the Southern set but is a welcome guest in all circles. Frances, the younger girl, who came out this winter, rather quietly owing to recent deaths in the family, is not such a wit as her sister but is nevertheless a charming girl. The charm of manner they both possess is an inheritance from their mother who, as Annie Hedges, was a beauty and belle of the 'sixties.

An Interesting Courtship

The engagement of Helen Dean with Frank King which was rumored recently seems more probable than ever, and their friends are looking for an early announcement. Miss Dean never goes anywhere unless Frank King is among the invited and of course that looks serious. Though King has no money of his own, the supposition is that he will succeed his father as a banker. He is a clever, manly young fellow, and is now learning the banking business. Some time ago it was thought that Baldwin Wood, son of William Wood the well-known attorney, would win Helen Dean, but he is now at Harvard and during his absence King has taken the inside track. As Helen Dean is probably the wealthiest of all the debutantes her engagement will be regarded as an important one.

Club Women Doing Politics

The political pot is once more boiling in the California Club. Mrs. George Law Smith is a candidate for reelection to the office of president, and it was decided at first to have a second ticket in the field "for mere form's sake," but now it appears that there is a well organized opposition. Hence there is considerable agitation and anxiety among the members of the club. Mrs. Smith was reported to have said last year that she "didn't have to lift a finger" to secure her election, but now it appears that to win out she will have to raise both hands.

Mrs. Smith's Pet Project

It's marvelous to what serious dissensions minor differences lead in clubs dominated by the gentle sex. The harmony of the California Club has not been disturbed by the election alone. Murmurings of dissatisfaction have been swelling in volume ever since that social session held last Tuesday, when a business proposition of considerable importance was rushed through in a manner that has provoked severe criticism. The club, it appears, is seriously trying to raise money to build a club house. Under Mrs. Lovell White's regime the stock was generously subscribed and with alacrity, but the collection of the money is quite a different matter. Many who subscribed with the idea that Mrs. White would engineer the project to a successful finish are no longer enthusiastic, and therefore payments are slow. But at the social session the other day a proposition to give a concert for the benefit of the club with Pietro Mascagni as the premier drawing card was submitted, and it made a great hit. It was presented in glowing colors, and the ladies thought that it had the true ring of easy money. But there were several conservative women present who didn't enthuse. Mrs. George Law Smith was a most enthusiastic advocate of the proposition, but when she called for the question she was surprised to find that some of the members failed to vote.

Why Mascagni Wouldn't Play

Mrs. Smith wanted to know the reason of the apparent apathy, and responses were promptly made. One speaker said she objected to so small a minority of the club's members disposing of so important a financial proposition. She protested against action being taken until all the members received notice. Nevertheless the matter was rushed through, and it is said that Mrs. Smith omitted the parliamentary courtesy of calling for the negatives. During the course of her remarks Mrs. Smith stated that the Women's Council had failed in the attempt to give a Mascagni concert in the Pavilion because the maestro didn't like the acoustic properties of the place, and also for the reason that he had misunderstood the nature of the proposed affair. He at first believed that it was intended to give the school teachers and school children a chance to hear his concerts at popular prices. When he learned that it was a scheme to enable the wealthy club women of San Francisco to enjoy the concert at fifty cents a head he was disgusted and called it off. This account of the matter brought a member of the Woman's Council to her feet. She was bristling with indignation and she denied the whole story. She asserted that the project fell through because the Mascagni management wanted to hog the profits. She said that the management wanted one thousand dollars in advance and wouldn't allow the affair to be advertised until the very day before it was to take place.

Expecting a Fizzle

And now the members of the California Club who did not attend the meeting are muttering their disapproval of Mrs. Smith's conduct, in rushing through an important business matter at a social session. And they are talking about calling her to account for violating the law. They declare that she has involved the club in a financial tangle because a check for five hundred dollars must be deposited at once, to be followed in a week's time by a cash payment of five hundred before the sale of seats begins. Under the terms of the agreement the club shall not get any of the receipts until after seventeen hundred and fifty dollars shall have been taken in. This sum of course is inclusive of the cash and check deposit, which are to constitute a guarantee. The dissenters say that it is a beautiful scheme for Mascagni and that it is very likely to leave the club poorer in pocket though somewhat wiser.

It's Called Off

So widespread was the alarm occasioned by the members who disapproved of the action taken at the social session that on Thursday, after the foregoing paragraphs had been written, I learned that notices had been sent out to the effect that the concert had been called off. So fierce was the storm that had been raised that the ladies who had mothered the project became fearful of the possible consequences. It was evident to them that the members would not work in harmony for the success of the affair, and therefore they were reluctant to take any chances. There is urgent need for the restoration of the entente cordiale in the California Club.

The Timid Mascagni

Sauntering along the city's main thoroughfare early in the week, enjoying the inaudible music of spring and the winelike California weather, watching the while the unconscious comedy of the streets, I chanced upon the magnetic maestro, defenseless, without his body-guard, booting the bituminous rock, looking neither to the right hand nor to the left. Now the comedy of it was, that he had no intention of crossing the street. He was merely avoiding the sidewalk. The dangers of bicycle, delivery-wagon, cable-car and man-killing automobile were as nothing to those which beset the dewy-eyed Italian on the street-space reserved for pedestrians. Oh, girls, golden and gray, here as in Italy and in Eden, man is no match for you at close quarters; here as elsewhere, in love's warfare, discretion is undoubtedly the better part of valor.

Bohemian Club Anniversary

The thirty-first anniversary of the Bohemian Club will be commemorated this evening. Whenever the members of the Bohemian Club wish to express their good satisfaction with themselves or with anything that might serve as a pretext for hilarity, they sit down to a "sumptuous repast." That is what some thirty odd surviving founders of the historic club are going to do tonight, and Hugh Burke, the veteran newspaper man, is to preside over the affair. There are not many of the old guard left and though the survivors are all well advanced in years not one of them has lost interest in the anniversary dinner.

Don't Like the Chef

So devoted are the Bohemian Club men to the stomach that they rank their chef as the most important functionary of the institution. When he fails to make good there is trouble. The members are now in open revolt against the chef and doubtless there will soon be a change in the cuisine. The members say that the money saved on a cheap cook is more than lost to the club because the members desert the cafe and bestow their patronage on restaurants where the cooking is of a higher order.

The Breckenridge Tragedy

News of that grim and tragic honeymoon climax in Paris continues to percolate through to the friends of the young couple in this city notwithstanding the efforts of relatives to hush the sad tidings. It was stated in the despatches that Jack Breckenridge's fall from a hotel balcony was accidental and the result of vertigo. There is another version to the effect that he was so melancholy over the prospect of being overcome by the affliction that played such havoc with the lives of his brother and sister that he deliberately sought to end his own life. Moreover it is said that he was severely injured by the fall. Other details of the sad ending of Addie Murphy's honeymoon have reached this city but they are too distressing for publication.

The Crocker Clan

How pleasant it is to see the doors and windows of the old Crocker home in California street again opened to the light of day. The house was prepared a few weeks ago for the coming of some of the family on one of their rare visits to the coast, and on Monday last Mrs. C. B. Alexander arrived with the intention of making a visit of several months. Mrs. Alexander was accompanied by the Misses McCook, and as Mrs. George Crocker and her daughter, Miss Emma Rutherford, will soon be here, the probability is that there will soon be some entertaining in the old house. I understand that Mrs. Alexander will spend much of her time at Del Monte, to which place she has always been very partial.

Mrs. Samuel Sussman and Miss Marie Louise, her beautiful daughter, have returned from Paso Robles where they had spent a few weeks.

Miss Wilson, Philanthropist

Miss Martha Wilson, a wealthy Chicago girl, is expected in San Francisco next week and the Lenten maids who have been playing Lady Bountiful will have a chance to hear some good advice from Miss Wilson, who is a philanthropist with ideas of her own. She created a sensation in Chicago this winter by turning a frigid shoulder on society and going to work in the Bureau of Associated Charities. Miss Wilson reported for work at the hour when all her friends were enjoying beauty sleep and she was one of the last to leave. She refused the salary the other clerks received but she worked just as hard as though she were a poor girl earning her living. She was assigned the compilation of card catalogues containing the names of the poor families in need of relief. Finally the destitute, relieved and unrelieved were all tabulated and the heiress found that the close confinement had told on her health, so this trip to California is the antidote. She will adjust philanthropy to the "inside" ideas she picked up while working for the Associated Charities. The only wealthy San Francisco girl who takes philanthropy as seriously as that is Miss Hecht, the daughter of Isaac Hecht. Miss Hecht spent a couple of years at Berkeley studying sociology and kindred subjects. I believe she intends to devote her life to the intelligent redress of the needy.

"Your wife is a very shrewd woman."
"I thought so ever since she married me."

Mrs. Danforth Boardman has been kept very busy attending to sick relatives since the beginning of Lent. Both her mother and mother-in-law are afflicted. Mrs. Boardman Sr. has never quite recovered from her serious illness of last summer. She suffers from asthma and as a dry mountain air is essential to her comfort she will not take a house in San Rafael this year. Mrs. Salisbury has also been very ill but is now convalescing.

Gorman at the Helm

The Democratic minority has been badly in need of a head for a long time, and therefore Arthur Pue Gorman was welcomed back with open arms. With Gorman at the head of the minority the Democrats are not likely to be outclassed in the science of statesmanship and the game of practical politics. Senator Gorman is skilled in statecraft and politics, and he is one of the ablest leaders the Democracy ever had at the nation's capital. At times he has been regarded as an available man for the Presidency, but if he were not such a practical politician he would probably stand a better chance for the nomination. But the most serious objection to Gorman is his religion, and in this glorious country, of religious and other kinds of freedom, the brand of a man's theology is of great importance in politics. Mr. Gorman is a Catholic, and for that reason he would not accept the nomination, for he knows he wouldn't stand a chance of being elected. He knows that in this enlightened age bigotry is a factor in politics.

Schmitz and Casey

The supposition in political circles is that as soon as Governor Pardee signs the bill which augments the power of the city's Executive, Mayor Schmitz will retire Mr. Michael Casey to private life. I am of the opinion that he hasn't the courage to do so. Mayor Schmitz has no desire to incur the enmity of the people behind Michael Casey. The latter, by the way, is intent on building up a political machine of his own. He conjures up pleasant visions of himself running for sheriff on the same ticket with Franklin K. Lane, Gavin McNab's choice for Mayor. Strange are the bed-fellows made by politics. It was McNab that advised Mayor Phelan to put police officers on the trucks during the teamsters' strike, a circumstance out of which grew the Labor Party. And now McNab is booming Casey, leader of the Teamsters' Union, for sheriff.

Truxtun Beale left for Washington during the week. He will be married to Miss Oge in April.

Memories of Adah Menken

Every now and then something occurs to bring up the name of Adah Isaacs Menken. It is not likely that the brilliant, erratic creature will ever be forgotten. The other day in New York Henry Gilsey's collection of Menken souvenirs was put on exhibition for sale. When Gilsey bought those photographs, he said that not for love or money could he be induced to part with them. Gilsey's fad was the collection of Menken photographs and letters. As the actress posed over two hundred and fifty times before the camera and one Birmingham photographer possessed at least one hundred negatives of her beautiful face, the size of the collection may be easily understood. The Gilsey collection contains the photograph of the adorable Adah and Algernon Charles Swinburne, and another with her head resting on the shoulder of Dumas the elder. The career of Adah Isaacs Menken interests Californians particularly, because she was very popular here when she appeared in "Mazeppa" and "The French Spy." Here, too, she met R. H. Newell (Orpheus C. Kerr) whom she took for her third husband. She had previously been married to Alexander Isaacs Menken of Nashville, whom she deserted, and John C. Heenan, the prize fighter who deserted her. Later on she went to Europe with James Barkley, the gambler.

She Wrote "Infelicia"

In London Barkley paid the bills while the beautiful Adah dispensed hospitality to Dickens, Swinburne, Charles Reade, Fechter, the Dukes of Edinburg, Wellington and Hamilton and others as famous. Then later in Paris she had the elder Dumas, the Princes Jerome and Lucien, even the third Napoleon among her admirers. But in Paris she also found her finish. For three years her bones lay in Pere La Chaise with only a wooden board as headpiece. Her still devoted friends, Barkley and Ned James, finally had her coffin removed to Mont Parnasse and erected a granite monument over her. The verses "Infelicia," of which the Gilsey collection contains documents that seem to prove conclusively that they were Adah Isaacs Menken's, were edited by Dickens and translated into many languages. One goes:

I look along the columned years,
  And see life's riven fame
Just where it fell, amid the jeers
Of scornful lips, whose mocking sneers
Forever hiss within mine ears
  To break the sleep of pain.

I can but own my life is vain,
  A desert void of peace;
I missed the goal I sought to gain,
I missed the measures of the strain
That lulls fame's fever in the brain
  And bids earth's tumult cease.

Myself! alas for theme so poor!
  A theme but rich in fear;
I stand a wreck on error's shore,
A spectre not within the door.
A houseless shadow evermore—
  An exile lingering here.

Dickman Burlesques Mascagni

At the dinner given for Mascagni at the Bohemian Club, the stunt of Charley Dickman was the hit of the evening. During dinner a burlesque orchestra played burlesque music under the leadership of a burlesque Mascagni in the person of Mr. Dickman, whose make-up and mannerisms were true to life and greatly amused the guest of the evening. Dickman only recently recovered from the serious injuries he received in Monterey a few months ago, in a wrestling bout with Captain Savage of the Fifteenth Infantry. The latter is only half Dickman's size but by a clever trick succeeded in throwing his opponent. The fall broke Dickman's leg in three places. The artist expects to go to Paris in a few weeks for a long stay.

The Widow Tevis

Mrs. Hugh Tevis is up from Coronado where she left her parents. This most interesting of young widows continues to fool the tabbies, who have been trying to arrange matters for her. Mrs. Tevis is not a beauty, her carriage is not graceful nor her voice musical, but she has a fortune that would impart charms of powerful fascination to a woman of far less pleasing personality. Sometimes Mrs. Tevis wears black and sometimes she doesn't, but she always has a great many jewels on exhibition. Her widow's veil has been reduced to the little black chiffon veil that is now the mode, and she has been cutting quite a dash in a stunning black velvet suit.

A Star Business Manager

I don't know what inducements were offered by Belasco and Mayer to E. D. Price to come West and manage their concerns here, but I do know that when he was manager for F. F. Proctor in New York his salary was twelve thousand a year. That was when Proctor's Pleasure Palace had just been erected at a cost of a million dollars, in Fifty-eighth street near Third avenue. Before that Price had been Rice's manager for his Manhattan Beach attractions, and had directed the tours of "1492," "Little Christopher," Mrs. Leslie Carter for two seasons and Richard Mansfield for five. Few men in the theatrical profession have had such varied and interesting experiences as have marked the career of Mr. Price. He knows everybody of prominence on the stage in this country and in England, where he was for a time manager of the London Globe theatre. If he would only write down his reminiscences of early Californian theatricals they would make most entertaining reading. He it was who managed the old California in its starry days, and for four years he was associated with John McCullough. Mr. Price is a college man, having graduated from the University of Michigan thirty-three years ago. From college he went into journalism and thence into theatricals.

His Distinguished Relatives

Lieutenant "Bobbie" Knox, who is among the military favorites in San Francisco society, is a relative of Knox, the famous hatter. Just what virtue might be argued as possessed by "Bobbie" on account of his kinsmanship with the well-known maker of "toppers" is a mystery but nevertheless whenever he is presented to a woman, his sponsor almost invariably says sotto voce, "Related to the hatter, Knox." And such is the fetich of supposed wealth and note that even though the gay lieutenant neither claims nor expects to inherit any of his relative's pelf, yet his consanguinity to the New York hatter has thrown a glamour over his prospects and added to his manly personality and the admitted fascination of brass buttons. All have combined to make the soldier quite a figure in local society.

The Lieutenant and the Lawyer

Knox Maddox goes about with the same people that "Bobbie" Knox mingles with and not infrequently the two are seen together. A society matron who has earned quite a reputation by her unintentional quips and maladroit sayings, knows both the lieutenant and the lawyer slightly, and has now and then mixed them up, calling the son of Mars, Maddox, and the pleader, Knox. A few days ago she eclipsed all her previous efforts. It was at a swagger entertainment and Knox Maddox joined a group of which the matron was the centre. Someone was about to present Maddox to her, when she shook him cordially by the hand and said, "Oh, I know him well. I hope you're well, Mr. Dunlap."

An Army Officer's Downfall

From a Manila correspondent comes a tragic story involving a handsome surgeon-captain of the army, an American woman and a beautiful Spanish senora. Captain Fred Barney was the central figure of the drama. For a brief spell he played the role of lothario, but as a consequence of his philandering he has shed his shoulder-straps and gone into obscurity, and as a result of the gossip his conduct provoked, Miss Harriet Lowery is returning to her home in Cleveland, a mental and physical wreck, while a passionate daughter of Spain mourns a lover's loss, solaced, however, by the memory of a vengeance sated to the utmost. Now that the players of the drama have made their exit the tabbies of the army post are seeking a new shuttlecock for the favorite game of gossip. Manila is the hotbed of gossip, and on fair shoulders in the Pearl of the Orient rests the responsibility for the wrecking of a woman's life.

Perpetuating a Spanish Custom

Captain Barney's downfall was the direct result of a system started by the Spanish conquerors in the Philippines ages ago, but ably perpetuated by Uncle Sam's boys in khaki. This time-honored custom is the taking of a mistress and living in dishonor until marching orders compels a separation. There are not wanting high authorities to defend this ancient usage, some saying it conduces to regularity of habits and discipline in countries where the sun seems never to set, and others alleging that it is the only effective way for the soldiers to master the native language. Certain it is that most of the bachelors of the army learn the language well and promptly. Barney and Miss Lowery were old acquaintances. She had a very good position in the Bureau of the Auditor of the Philippines, and was a pretty and vivacious girl. Barney was a surgeon of merit, debonair and ambitious to rise in the Army. Barney made love to Miss Lowery and she yearned for his heart, but when she found out that Barney was a lothario who spoke his affections wide, she bade him go, and for many months did not see him. Meanwhile Barney had begun to pick up Spanish marvelously. His teacher was Senora Teresa, a widow from Madrid, whose eyes were as black as midnight, and who became fiercely enamored of the Yankee medico.

The Widow's Fierce Attack

One day Miss Lowery fell sick. She was dwelling alone in a tiny casa on the outskirts of Manila, shunning society and her heart's hunger unappeased. She sent for Captain Barney to cure her fever. He prescribed and called again. The case was obstinate and often the surgeon's victoria waited under the dusty cocoanut palms while he ministered to his fair patient. He began to make less progress in the soft speech of Spain, and the widow felt the first tremor of jealousy. She doubted and believed by turn; persuaded by Captain Barney's explanation that he was busy with professional duties, and tortured by suspicion. One day she followed him to Miss Lowery's house and forced her way in. Teresa was like a tigress. She sprang on the American girl and in her jealous rage would have inflicted great damage had not Barney interfered. She then turned on him and left the marks of her white teeth in his flesh. Finally she was carried off by the police. The story became public and Barney left for San Francisco.

A Tragic Climax

Meanwhile the story was being discussed all through the army post. Miss Lowery continued to fill her position until one day, a few weeks ago, without warning she drew a revolver and assaulted a clerk named Easthagen. She was arrested and then she complained of conspiracy to ruin her reputation. It was evident that her mind was unbalanced. The unfortunate woman begged to be punished for her effort at murder. She said that her soul had been stolen by scandal mongers. A board composed of Major Carter, Dr. J. Donelan and Dr. W. E. Murgrave were appointed to inquire into her condition and they found that she was not of sound mind. The prosecution was dropped and she left for San Francisco on the last steamer. Miss Lowery is an estimable young woman and she has many sympathizers in Manila.

An Immortal Lyric

The subject of the authorship of the "Punch in the Presence of the Passinjare" jingles is once more up for discussion in the East. Mark Twain was recently referred to in the New York Sun as the author of the jingles, whereupon Noah Brooks wrote to the paper and stated that Mark Twain never wrote or suggested a word or a line of the immortal classic. The fact is that they originated in the brain of Isaac H. Bromley, the brother of our "Uncle George" Bromley. A generous but misguided public has long credited Mark Twain with the honor of having written the so-called horsecar poetry and he has always observed a discreet silence on the subject. In the seventies Bromley wrote the true story of the inception and birth of the poem for Scribner's Monthly. It appears that one evening while riding to the Tribune office in a horse-car with his friend Brooks he suddenly exclaimed: "It's poetry, by George! Brooks, it's poetry." He pointed to the instructions to conductors posted over one of the windows of the car.

"What's poetry?" asked Brooks.

"Why, don't you see?" said Bromley; "the lines are all the same length and all begin with a capital letter. Doesn't that make poetry?"

How It Caught On

There was no resisting the argument and they proceeded to polish the lyric on the spot. It ran:

> The conductor, when he receives a fare
> Will punch in the presence of the passinjare,
> A blue trip slip for an eight-cent fare,
> A buff trip slip for a six-cent fare,
> A pink trip slip for a three-cent fare,
> All in the presence of the passinjare.

The chorus, "Punch, boys, punch! punch with care," etc., was added by W. C. Wyckoff, the scientific editor of the Tribune, assisted by the late Mayor W. P. Handy. Next it was craftily hidden away one night in the "solid matter" of one of the inside pages of the Tribune without any signature or other indication of the associated authorship. The press of the country lighted on the work with its usual avidity. First it was copied as a bit of literary flotsam and jetsam, then it was parodied, imitated, set to music and hailed as the foundation of a rare and beautiful department of lyric verse. As Brooks says, "It took possession of the popular fancy like a nightmare, or we might say like an epidemic. As one of the historians of the period said, 'It was the one touch of horse-car poetry that made the whole world kin.'"

Lehr in Ladies' Hose

Since his marriage Harry Lehr has not sustained his record as a creator of sensations for the delectation of New York's smart set, and as a consequence his prestige has been on the decline. But the other day he produced a slight ripple of interest at Newport by making his appearance in public in girls' patent leather Oxford ties, with the regulation high French heel, and bow on instep. His hose were ladies' open-work drop-stitch silk embroidered in red flowers. The probability is that he also wore lingerie and that on his person were other exhibits that are usually regarded as symptoms of degeneracy.

The Burdick Tragedy

The mystery surrounding the death of Edwin L. Burdick of Buffalo was farther from solution than ever after the tragedy that ended the lives of Arthur Pennell and his wife. The violent death of Pennell at a time when suspicion was pointing in his direction was reminiscent of a murder mystery that created a big sensation in this city some years ago, in which a State Senator was involved. A woman had been mysteriously murdered, and shortly after the Senator was thrown out of his buggy and fatally injured. Thereupon the police ceased to look for the murderer of the woman. The work of the Buffalo police is very amusing. One of the theories is that the man was killed with a cocktail bottle and the police decided to search the sewers for it, as though they expected to find the murderer's name blown in the fragments. The bland innocence of the Buffalo police is similar to that of our own city. Most criminals are caught nowadays by stumbling into jail.

Circumstances of the Crime

The victim of the Buffalo tragedy was a wealthy man who had sued his wife for divorce. On the night of the murder the only persons supposed to be in the Burdick residence were the man's mother-in-law, Mrs. Hull, an aged woman, two servants and the children, the oldest of whom is a girl of fifteen. Mrs. Burdick was at Atlantic City. On the morning after the murder, Burdick, who was to have gone to his business early, did not appear at the breakfast table. Oppressed by fear that something dreadful had occurred, Mrs. Hull sent for the family physician, who found the body lying under a quilt on a sofa and covered with pillows as if to conceal it. On the head were three wounds and the skull was fractured. Neither Mrs. Hull nor the servants had heard a sound during the night, nor had they seen any one enter the house. A drawer in a bureau was found open and the papers in it were scattered about. This gave rise to a theory that the murderer had taken compromising letters away. Robbery was not the motive, for no valuables were missed. It was evidently a crime of jealousy, vengeance or desperation. The probabality is that it was committed by a man because it is not likely that a woman would beat a man's brains out. Whoever committed the deed took away the weapon with which it was done.

The police are of the opinion that a woman committed the crime, but the people of Buffalo suspected Pennell from the beginning owing to the fact that he was involved in the divorce suit. Hence they were convinced that his death was suicidal. The mystery is as dense at this time as it was when the crime was first reported.

Bitter Quarrel Among Churchmen

That's a pretty mess that has been stirred up in the Episcopal church by the Rev. William Bollard of Vallejo, who wants the Right Reverend William H. Moreland, Missionary Bishop of Sacramento, removed for violating canon law. It's too bad that churchmen cannot keep their troubles out of the newspapers. A row such as the one precipitated by the Vallejo minister is most discreditable to all concerned. It savors of a political rumpus and betrays a lack of Christian forbearance that is positively shocking. The Rev. Bollard's spirits were wounded because the Bishop alienated about forty members of his flock and consequently reduced his revenues. A nice thing for clergymen to quarrel over! And so bitter is the quarrel between the clergymen that an effort is being made to besmirch the character of Bishop Moreland. One should think that respect for the church should restrain Senior Warden Thayer from charging the Bishop with being a liar, but it didn't. He asserts that to magnify the work done in St. Luke's Dr. Moreland reported that there were nearly one thousand communicants, whereas there were not over seven hundred and fifty. Merely a bit of exaggeration on the part of the reverend gentleman, but now he is called upon to defend himself against the charge of having practiced vulgar deception.

His Residence Provoked Criticism

Bishop Moreland, by the way, has had trouble before. Some time ago he had a fine residence built in Sacramento, and at once he found himself the subject of adverse criticism. There were "knockers" in church circles in Sacramento who asserted that a Missionary Bishop should give good example by devoting his surplus coin to the aid of the Episcopal missions. Bishop Moreland, however, has other views on the subject. He thinks that a Bishop of the church should have a residence in keeping with the dignity of his office. And why not?

Mrs. Andrew B. McCreery, who has been passing a month in Paris, has gone to Italy to be present at the Easter service. Mrs. McCreery is the mother of Richard McCreery, who married Miss Edith Kip of New York. I hear that friends have brought the young McCreerys together and that the husband arrived in New York in time for his mother-in-law's funeral.

The All Important Corset

The dressmakers are sitting in solemn convention once more, discussing some of the most sacred, interesting, fascinating and important of mysteries. And the ears of the feminine world are close to the ground, while profane man holds aloof and wonders. It appears there are to be no startling innovations in the near future. The line of beauty has undergone many modifications from the time of the "Grecian bend" of the seventies down to the "Kangaroo bend" of today, but the woman of fashion is not to be required to adjust her shape divine to any new wrinkles. There is something that she should acquire, however, and that is the knack of putting her corset on properly. The consensus of opinion at the convention is that this knack is possessed by not more than woman in fifty. It appears that everything in the matter of style depends on the adjustment of the corset. There is a way of getting into it, and distributing the flesh, that sets off a woman's figure to the greatest advantage. If she doesn't know the way no dressmaker on earth can make her look stylish. Miss White, the president of the convention, declared at the session some months ago, that she never goes out without meeting women that she would like to drag into a doorway and adjust their corsets for them.

Woman Shocks Club Men

These are troublous times at the Cosmos Club, and a baby's first tooth is not more of an innovation than that now agitating the members. Ever since the club's foundation it has been the unwritten rule that womankind, lovely, and other brands, should be rigorously excluded from the sacred portals of the building dedicated to commerce and the army. About six weeks ago a prominent member of the club was taken seriously ill in the building, and, without asking leave of the governing body his physician installed a bewitching trained nurse from the Waldeck in his patient's apartments. Under her ministrations the invalid speedily recovered, but just as the fair handmaid of hygeia was preparing to vacate, another member was taken ill, so she stayed. He recovered just in time to yield his place to a third invalid. Miss Hygeia is still on deck at the club. The old-timers, headed by John O. D. Greene, do not approve of the club being transformed into a sanitarium, and the committee is now grappling with this momentous problem.

Our Boulevard System

For many years the military authorities at the post and Department Headquarters have made efforts to secure an appropriation for beautifying the Presidio reservation, their desire being to secure more picturesque effects in the reservation limits by establishing a more artistic system of landscape gardening. A small appropriation is now available and will be expended in furtherance of the plans of the authorities. Delightful as the drives in the reservation now are, in a few years there will be great improvement and the Presidio reservation will rank with the finest parks in the country. By that time San Francisco will have a system of boulevards extending from the Golden Gate on the north to Lake Merced on the South, including the drives of Golden Gate Park, the Presidio and the Ocean Highway, which will surpass any other in the country. And by the way it is to be hoped that the suggestion made some years ago that the Lake Merced tract be purchased by the city and converted into a public park has not been forgotten. The purchase of that property and the gift of it to the city would be a masterly achievement for one of our millionaires anxious to perpetuate his name.

The Rev. Hillis's Book

So we are to be vouchsafed a session with that aristocratic divine, Newell Dwight Hillis, who is known to fame as the successor to Henry Ward Beecher. A short while ago the Rev. Hillis was deploring the state of the book market and regretting that the price of books was falling. He was greatly in fear that books would soon be sold for fifteen cents apiece, "and then," he exclaimed, "God help us." The distinguished divine has a book on the market now, and fifteen cents would be a stiff price to pay for it, though it is catalogued at one dollar and a half. He calls it "The Quest for Happiness." Dr. Hillis is a success at delivering flowery sermons in which the embroidery covers the fabric, and his audiences sit in rapt attention to his words without concerning themselves about his ideas or lack of them. It is another matter to put his addresses into cold type, and have them analyzed in the process of careful reading. He blandly states, among other things, that all the great minds, from Homer and St. Paul down to Shakespeare and Browning, were children of exultant joy. How about Dante, Milton, Goethe and Carlyle? Incidentally he betrays a woful ignorance of the flora and fauna of South Africa, draws his simile of the resurrection of the body from seed rotting in the ground after it is planted, informs us that Handel composed symphonies, and that in the library of the Vatican there is a copy of the works of Dante written out in long-hand by Plutarch. The reverend doctor should refrain from rushing into print.

Versatile Willie

Emperor William is undoubtedly desirous of cultivating the friendship of this country. Not satisfied with presenting the statue of an ancestor to the country, sending over his brother as a token of esteem and having a German yacht built by an American firm, he has named a yacht the "Alice Roosevelt" by way of compliment to the President's daughter. The German potentate is surely a most adroit diplomat. Indeed he is a brilliant personage who, if he had been less versatile and more reposeful, might have been written down a genius. As it is public opinion is inclined to ascribe artificiality to a monarch who writes dramas, preaches on the Divine authorship of the Bible, paints, shoots, fences, photographs, sails his own yachts, plays ping-pong, composes operatic scores, plans a navy, dominates an army and designs his wife's frocks. Of late his versatility is exhibiting itself in a somewhat grotesque manner. Only the other day in discussing the Bible, he asserted with considerable aplomb that his grandfather was the mouthpiece of the Almighty, and he was prepared to prove it, no doubt having in view the canonization of William I. There may be a method in the Emperor's theology. Perhaps he hopes to induce the inference that he himself enjoys the benefit of Divine inspiration.

Connie's Olive Branch

The Countess of Orkney who, after eleven years of marriage, has presented her husband with their first child, is an excellent exemplification of the revised saw that reformed flirts make the best wives. There was a terrible to-do in London society when the young Earl of Orkney married Connie Gilchrist, who for years had been the intimate friend of the old Duke of Beaufort. A standing conundrum in the London clubs for years was, "What does K. G. mean after the Duke of Beaufort's name?" The answer was, "Konnie Gilchrist." Connie was for years one of the prettiest girls of the Gaiety. The Duke of Beaufort established her in a smart Hampstead house and later in a mansion in Manchester street. Then she met young Orkney, the scion of a noble Scotch family, who succeeded his uncle to the earldom in 1889. The wedding attracted all London, the ceremony being performed at All Souls' and the aged protector of the bride giving her away. The happy pair enjoyed a bridal tour of the continent. Of late years they have lived almost entirely in the country, the Countess being a daring equestrienne. She is a very amiable woman and though about forty now is said to be still very attractive.

The Murphys of London

According to the despatches from London, Madame Vincente de Dominguez is now holding the centre of the social stage in the British metropolis. And they state that she was "formerly Miss Helene Murphy of New York." The correspondents are no doubt unaware of the fact that she was originally from this city, where her father made his money in trade, being one of the founders of the dry-goods house of Murphy, Grant & Co. He was also a Marquis, the title having been bestowed by Pope Pius IX in recognition of his generosity to the Catholic church. Several of the Murphy children shook the dust of San Francisco from their feet years ago, and expatriated themselves. The eldest girl married the scion of a noble British house, a bona fide baronet. Samuel Murphy levanted to London to avoid a breach-of-promise damage suit threatened by a certain May Deering. He joined the British army and became a most ardent subject of the Crown. Some years ago he fought a duel with a Frenchman who had made disparaging remarks about Queen Victoria. Through this incident he achieved great notoriety, and he was again before the public when his ex-wife, who married Captain Jenner, son of the Court Physician, sued him for alimony. He swore that he didn't have a cent and that he gave the bulk of his two hundred thousand dollar inheritance to his brother Dan. Some years ago when the Murphy estate was involved in litigation the letters of the Murphy girls enlivened the prosaic court proceedings. Helene's letters established for her a reputation as a wit. Her satirical criticisms of San Francisco society afforded people a deal of amusement.

Rise of the Prices

Theodore Price, the New York broker who made five millions in cotton the other day, is the clever operator with whom the Crockers were associated at the time of the crash that wrecked the firm of Price, McCormick & Co. a few years ago. He is a brother of Walter Price, who worked as a reporter on local papers several years ago. The latter is now manager for Laidlaw & Co., the Wall street bankers, and he is also one of the most popular club men in New York.

One More Link

The marriage of Mr. Reginald Bonner of New York with Miss Effie Caesar, which took place last week, is another link in the chain connecting the Vanderbilts with San Francisco, for the groom is a cousin of Charles Bonner, Stella Locan and Geraldine Bonner, the novelist. His father made millions in Wall street, and the Bonners are among the Four Hundred of Staten Island where the Caesars always lived. Miss Caesar is the granddaughter of Captain Jacob Vanderbilt, the brother of the Commodore. The Jacob Vanderbilts were the first of the clan to break into society and for a time they looked down on the very rich Commodore and his family. The Bonners and Vanderbilts have been friends for three generations. The George Vanderbilts and Mrs. Schiefflin were at the wedding and gave magnificent presents.

Off to the Orient

Among the passengers on the Siberia that started for the Orient on Thursday were Dr. Woolsey of Oakland and New Clough, the well known newspaper man. They purpose making a tour of the Orient together, Woolsey as a Government medical inspector and Clough as a newspaper correspondent. Both are well supplied with passports and letters calculated to establish cordial relationship with officials in the Philippines and dignitaries in China and Japan. Clough is one of the most brilliant newspaper men in this country, and there is not a more facile or powerful writer on the press. He expects to spend a year in travel, and during that period he will do considerable important work for the Hearst newspapers, and some special correspondence for Town Talk. Incidentally he will gather material for a book to be published on his return.

Passing of a Pioneer Teacher

There were many of Mrs. Etta M. Baumgardner's former pupils at her funeral on Wednesday, but not so many considering that before her retirement from the school department she had taught consecutively for over thirty years at the Denman school. She had an immense collection of photographs of her ex-pupils, many of whom after leaving school became prominent in the arts or professions or in society. Among them were Belle Brooks, the beautiful blonde who married Jack Reis; Charlotte Thompson, the playwright; Mabel Love, now Eleanor Kent of the comic opera stage; Irene Crowell, who married Alpheus Bull; Bessie Hooker, now Mrs. George Lent, and her sister Jennie; Lilian Harris, who married Robert McElroy; Ethel Corlette, the daughter of "Silver Pen," the pioneer of women paragraphers here, and who went abroad and into grand opera; Ailene Ivers, now Mrs. Edward Moore Robinson, one of the recognized beauties of the New York swim; Cora Thomas, who married Wakefield Baker; Cora Smedburg and the Hooper girls. Mrs. Baumgardner came to California in early days, on the same steamer that brought Cornelius Cole, later U. S. Senator from California. She had a fund of good stories that she used to tell her pupils, and she had a very nimble wit. A few months before her death she met at a reception one of her former pupils. The latter told her that she was now a space writer, being paid by the story and sometimes by the line:

"Oh, in the latter case," said Mrs. Baumgardner, "why not try and get in long words—tintinnabulation, for instance, should not be overlooked."

For Sweet Charity

There is one Lenten penance that a coterie of young society people delight in. That is making a dainty little sacque for every tot in the Children's Hospital to put on Easter morning. Laura Bates pioneered the idea several years ago and the custom seems to have a longer lease of life than most fads. The Hopkins girls, Caro Crockett, Mary Scott, Carrie Taylor and several other girls of that set were the original "Dorcases" who pricked their fingers on the little jackets. Most of the girls are married now and have bairns of their own but they still do this pretty bit of Lenten sewing for the sake of sweet charity.

A Sensational Episode in Church

On a fashionable avenue of our city stands a smart-set church, presided over by a young minister of parts. Thither of a Sunday flock fair saints and sinners, seeking grace in goodly gowns, worshipful as is the way of women. Lately, this magnetic man of God has lost considerable interest in adoring and adorable eyes by taking unto himself a wife. Last Sabbath, however, he had preached himself back again into his old place in the hearts of his hearers; a moving hymn had just been sung; and the congregation, awed and inspired, was awaiting the benediction. Suddenly, in the hush, a young man, impelled by religious excitement beyond the bounds of propriety, cried aloud: "Glory be to God—I have found him!" Such a breach of good breeding must not go unrebuked; a fellow guilty of such a gaucherie as that must be summarily punished! Accordingly, the modern interpreter of Love turned upon the primitive Christian and said, in accents appropriate to the words: "Put that man out." There was a stifling silence, in which Religion fled the place, shuddering. The atmosphere became that of a bar-room. But no man moved. "Mr. S——," bellowed the bully in the pulpit, addressing by name one of the church officials, "the service (divine?) cannot proceed. Show that man the door!" Silence again for insufferable seconds. Heedless of the ministerial mandate, Mr. S—— kept his place. So did every other man. "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost!" What a blessing! The congregation dispersing gathered about the door. The young man whom God had moved to forget his manners walked quietly down the aisle to the altar rails and knelt there. The boor in office turned his back upon him.

What Would Christ Have Done?

From the foregoing it appears that the story on the Episcopal church told here by Booker Washington was not without foundation in fact. Of a truth, so long as the present incumbent keeps the pulpit and the peace, the "divine" drawing-room in Van Ness avenue is no place in which to find the gentle Jesus. I may be wrong, but it seems to me that a clergyman, in proving the rarity of Christian charity under the sun, is not about his proper business. Without asking, What would the rare Gentleman of Nazareth have done under the circumstances? would it not have been less vulgar, more tactful, better manners as well as better morals, to have raised hushing hands, pronounced the benediction sweetly and solemnly, and thus brought the young man to his senses (if that were so very necessary) and the service to a divine close? I do not wish to put myself into the same pulpit with the minister of parts, and I have already made use of two words which, though well on the soft side of the facts, may yet, coming from one condemning harshness, themselves sound somewhat harsh; but I must say this, that to me there is more religious inspiration in a meadow-lark's spring song than in the sermons of such Christian clergymen, and I think they made a bad bargain who last Sunday exchanged the sweet sunshine of God's gracious out-of-doors for the very dim religious light of that fashionable church on that smart-set avenue. If the young man really found Christ there (and for my part I believe that he did), it was for this very good reason, that Christ had come in with him.

Stevens Interviews Gillette

An interview between Ashton Stevens, dramatic critic, and William Gillette, actor and playwright, was to have been one of the star features of tomorrow's Examiner. Mr. Stevens's interviews with player folks are always highly entertaining, and I believe that he would have eclipsed his previous performances in his account of his chat with Mr. Gillette if it hadn't been for one thing. The interview took place in the thespian's dressing-room while the hawkshaw was waiting between acts for the plot to thicken, and Stevens secured material for one of the best newspaper stories that was ever written about a theatrical star. He was very much gratified over his success in eliciting such a breezy story from the communicative actor, but as they were parting Mr. Gillette remarked:

"Of course, nothing that I have said is for publication."

The dramatic critic opened his eyes in surprise.

"We were just having a little friendly chat," said the actor, "and of course I would not consent to the publication of anything that I have said. I have never been interviewed for publication."

That was all. Ashton Stevens has the story, but the Examiner readers are not to be regaled with it.

Sweet, seductive perfume welled.

Careless, winged a butterfly,

Back he flies, now unresisting—
Back to woo; to love; to cling.

To Trouville by Balloon

Paul La Morlaye was most unhappy: Madame La Morlaye—the beautiful Helen, as she was called at Honfleur—had again refused him permission to go to Trouville, the pretext for the refusal being that he would ogle the women, and waste the family revenues in his ungovernable passion for gambling.

The situation was indeed trying. There on the quay was a superb boat, getting up steam, and almost ready to start. La Morlaye's handsome face clouded as he watched it: "Ah! if Helen would only be reasonable," he sighed, "in twenty minutes, after a most delightful voyage, I should land on that blessed shore of Trouville—in that beloved Casino." Then he sighed again, and looked longingly across the water.

Indeed when the weather was clear and bright he could see the gaily decked terrace of the Casino, and the gleaming streamers of its oriflambs; at night when the illuminations sparkled out against the dark blue sky, he fancied that he caught, notwithstanding the distance, whiffs of light music, in the ocean breeze, like the refrains of a gay quadrille. It was the torture of Tantalus.

Helen, however, had said no, and when Helen said no with a capital N there was nothing to do but submit—to remain at Honfleur, with no other distraction than the coming and going of fishing-boats, the principal industry of this sequestered little canton, varied at times by the arrival of bathers, who came to eat the traditional breakfast at Havre de Grace.

Poor La Morlaye had exhausted every possible argument to induce Helen to allow him to go to Trouville, and Lieutenant Rouflard, a dashing custom-house officer, the devoted admirer of Helen, had interceded many times with her to allow Paul to go to Trouville as often as he desired. He even added that these absences would afford him a truly personal pleasure.

Helen listened to Rouflard's arguments with flushed cheeks and downcast eyes. One evening when he had been unusually eloquent, she drew herself up, and said to him with a certain hauteur: "Your society, Monsieur Rouflard, is most agreeable, and you are the handsomest man at Honfleur, where officers are rare, but you must remember that I have pledged my faith to Paul; as long as he lives, you understand, I shall be a faithful wife, and I shall take measures to have him remain a faithful husband."

Rouflard bowed submissively. He secretly hoped, however, that the day would come when he would be in a position to exact duty from—the imperious Helen.

Meanwhile La Morlaye, sullenly promenading the quay, bit his lips, and tried to restrain his rage. His thwarted desire to go to Trouville had passed into a state of obsession. Suddenly he perceived a flaring poster which read:

"For the benefit of the Saint-Gervais victims, Monsieur Mazagran, the celebrated aeronaut, will make this afternoon an ascension from the public square at Honfleur. In the course of this ascension he will experiment with the aerial Salvor (his own invention), a certain parachute, which permitting him to open the valve, renders the balloon attractable, so that he can land wherever he wishes, with absolute safety."

La Morlaye read and re-read the poster. Evidently here was an unlooked-for exit from Honfleur. The sea, however, was inconveniently near, and the last balloon catastrophe was still fresh in the minds of many. Upon this occasion there was also a husband, who was unable to join his wife for many days. . . . Still, he did not meet death. There was consolation in that consideration.

At breakfast La Morlaye appeared distracted and preoccupied. Suddenly he asked Helen if she would accompany him to the Mazagran ascension.

"Willingly, dearest. It gratifies me to see that you are interested in scientific pleasures—so vastly preferable to those unwholesome ones at the Casino. Besides, Lieutenant Rouflard has offered me his arm. He assures me that the affair will be most interesting."

"Yes, it will be deucedly interesting," snapped Paul, "for the atmosphere has cooled and there is a spanking breeze from the sea."

At five o'clock all the inhabitants of Honfleur had assembled in the public square. Seated on chairs, in the first row, directly behind the enclosure reserved for the aeronaut, and marked off by a rope, were Monsieur and Madame La Morlaye, accompanied by Lieutenant Rouflard.

The Himalaya, held by ten sailors, swayed majestically in the air, while Monsieur Mazagran in an admiral's cap, his redingote brilliant with a constellation of unknown decorations, moved excitedly about, calling for his travelling companion, Monsieur Anquetil, who had begged to share his voyage.

Suddenly the crowd fell back, and a tall soldierly gendarme appeared.

"Captain Mazagran," said he, raising his hand, in military fashion, to his bicorned hat, "your expected companion, Monsieur Anquetil, requests me to tell you that owing to the violence of the wind, he prefers not to embark."

In a second, the crowd was in an uproar. Amid the general hubbub and confusion, which followed, hisses came from all sides for the delinquent Anquetil: "The coward! the wretch! the cheat! the sissy!" yelled the disappointed spectators.

Mazagran, standing erect, his constellation of unknown decorations blazing in the sunlight, surveyed the crowd, with the coolness of a melodramatic hero. Finally he said: "Ladies and gentlemen, the situation is indeed vexatious. I had ballasted for two passengers. However, during the course of my professional career, I have never yet disappointed an audience, and shall not do so today." (Applause from the crowd.) Mazagran bowed profoundly.

After a short pause he asked, "Does anyone here present wish to accompany me? No? Very well, then I shall depart alone." He jumped lightly into the basket. With his left hand, he seized the small tri-colored flag, with which he intended giving the signal for departure. Just then he saw La Marlaye, who had leaped to his side. Pale and half breathless, like a man who had suddenly taken a grave resolution, he said excitedly: "Monsieur Mazagran, I shall accompany you."

"Paul!" screamed Helen, frantically waving her white parasol, "Are you crazy? Get out of that balloon instantly."

"Bravo!" shouted Lieutenant Rouflard by way of encouragement to Paul," it is a most brave act." "Let her loose," cried Mazagran. The sailors dropped the ropes. The Himalaya arose majestically in the air amid the applause of the crowd, while Mazagran waved his tri-colored flag, while Rouflard saluted Paul with his Repi, while the beautiful Helen swooned away at her husband's unexpected rebellion.

"I think," said Mazagran, to his new-found companion, as they shot skyward, "that we are going to have a fine voyage. Indeed, I should not be surprised if we slept tonight at Folkestone."

"Great God! Captain," said La Morlaye, turning deathly pale,

"I do not wish to be exacting, I read your poster in which you declared that you would anchor wherever you wished. Anquetil was right. The wind is really violent, and appears to come from the land, which is probably propitious for a journey to Folkestone, but nevertheless, it is unquieting to me. I do not desire to experience the fate of the men in the Jupiter. I wish simply to alight at the Roches-Noires to go to Trouville."

"To Trouville!" excitedly exclaimed Mazagran. "Why it wasn't worth while for you to embark. Besides the Himalaya will be very much unballasted."

"I implore you to allow me to land," pleaded La Morlaye. "Ah! if you only knew the grave interests at stake. I shall lose thousands of francs, if I fail to keep my appointment."

The aeronaut turned, and closely scrutinized his companion's face. Its genuinely woe-begone expression conquered him.

"You did well to recall the catastrophe of the Jupiter," he said. "With this temperature, the ascension today is not without a certain danger. I have no right to exact from you an act of heroism. I shall permit you to descend."

They were just passing over Villerville.

Captain Mazagran opened the valve, and the Himalaya descended on an eminence, about two hundred metres from the Maison-Persane, the Princess de Segan's villa.

He cast the anchor near a tall apple-tree. La Morlaye slid down and took gaily the road which led to the promised land, while the unballasted balloon, with vertiginous celerity, shot vertically into the air and soon disappeared in the direction of the northwest.

Two days later, Lieutenant Rouflard called on Helen. He found her in tears.

"My dear Helen," he said tenderly, "I have distressing news. However, anything is better than the suspense in which you live. The papers have just announced that the Himalaya has been found without passengers, stranded on the coast of Dover. The basket contains only a few shells."

Helen sank back on the divan. "I am a widow," she sobbed. "Ah, my dear, dear darling Paul, who will ever replace you in my affections?"

"Will you not allow me, darling, to console you for the almost irreparable loss?" pleaded the handsome Rouflard, putting his arm around her waist. "Remember your promise, to intrust your happiness to me should anything ever happen to Paul."

"You unfeeling monster," cried Helen, withdrawing herself from Rouflard's embrace, her dark eyes flashing fire. "You encouraged him to go to his death."

"I?" exclaimed the astonished lieutenant.

"Yes, you. Didn't you scream 'Bravo'?"

"To be sure I did. But only to quiet your fears and to induce you to think that the voyage was without danger."

"Then I have wronged you," sobbed Helen.

Rouflard took her in his arms like a tender mother quieting her child to sleep. When he bade good-bye, it was as her lover and the guardian of her future happiness.

Ten minutes later, Helen opened the following telegram:

"Himalaya wrecked at sea. Picked up by the sloop Mary Ann, and taken to Trouville. Will arrive at Honfleur at three.

"Paul."

Promptly at the hour named, the gay La Morlaye, after a two days' variegated honeymoon at Trouville, entered Honfleur triumphantly on the arm of the brave Mazagran, amidst the lusty cheers of two rows of enthusiastic citizens.

That evening at dinner as Monsieur and Madame La Morlaye sat vis-a-vis, they scrutinized each other stealthily from out of the corners of their eyes: Paul persuaded that he had played an excellent joke on Helen, and Helen instinctively seeking to divine the cause of the changed expression on Paul's face.

STAGE

Gillette's Masterly Melodrama

"Sherlock Holmes" is polite and repressed melodrama. It is melodrama without the noise and the other accessories. The plot is as far from real life as a fairy tale, but it is one of the most plausible of improbable and impossible plays. All through it you are hoping for the thing to be done which would be the most natural under the circumstances, and when it isn't done it suddenly occurs to you that if it had been done, the development of the plot might have been retarded. And when you stop to consider that the play is the dramatization of one man, and an impossible man at that, you marvel at the achievement. William Gillette has blown the breath of life into Conan Doyle's wonderful detective, and he has succeeded in making him as interesting in action on the stage as he is in the book. And when on the stage he keeps the play comparatively sane even in its wildest and most impossible moments. Indeed the play has few lucid intervals, and yet it holds you. No matter how blase you may be, or how inclined you are to guy the villain or the hero in the ordinary blood-and-thunder melodrama, you cannot restrain yourself from seriously sitting up and taking notice as the plot unfolds itself. You follow the fortunes of the detective and the efforts to outwit him as you did the blood-curdling incidents of "Old Sleuth" in the days when Beadle's yellow-backed dime novels were your favorite literature. The success of the play is largely due to the skill of the company. William Gillette does not fit Sherlock Holmes any more snugly than does each of the other players the role he or she impersonates. Herbert Percy is Conan Doyle's "Doctor Watson" to the life, and Ralph Delmore is so peculiarly adapted for the James Larrabee of the play that one wonders whether the part was written for him. Ida Conquest has not much to do but she is sufficiently reposeful for the role of Alice Faulkner. Alida Cortelyou, as the wife of the beetle-browed blackmailer, gives a spirited performance, and has all the dash and grace that a woman should have to co-operate successfully with a rascal of the Larrabee order.

Hastings in an Old Role

When Henry Miller disguised his youthful beauty—that was a good many years ago—under the gray wig and wrinkles of Mr. Brabazon the matinee girls scarcely recognized him. It would have been the same thing with Ernest Hastings, had not the matinee brood seen him before under an old man make-up. Hastings does well with the part of Brabazon, which is the star role in "Sowing the Wind.' There's a deal of opportunity in the part to show one's command of expression, and the scene where he finds that the fair Rosamond is his own daughter is finely done. Miss Hunt is sweet and girlishly charming as Rosamond and Mr. Morrison is a bright and lovable Ned. The other parts are in good hands.

Oza and Her Hubbies

The third divorce of Oza Waldrop, the ingenious ingenue of the Alcazar, passed off as quietly as a shot-gun election in a Southern district. If any animosities were developed they have been decorously and discreetly draped with the veil of secrecy. The gentleman from whom Miss Waldrop was twice divorced previous to her trial trip on the troubled matrimonial seas certainly cherishes no resentment. He bought a big block of seats for last Monday night when she appeared as the frivolous Maude Fretwell in Sidney Grundy's sex problem play, "Sowing the Wind." His flowers were the fairest and most fragrant of those received by Miss Oza over the footlights, and he was the most demonstrative man in the audience. Her latest divorced husband was not present or represented by floral tributes, but his absence was not significant, for his predecessor knew her longer and it may be presumed has a finer appreciation of her sterling qualities as wife and artist. At all events he is somewhat imbued with the calm philosophy of the complaisant No. 1 in "The Husband of Leontine," which curiously enough goes next. In a thoughtful discussion of the divorce he amiably remarks:

"Divorce breaks the marriage but when one has been married and has loved a woman and lived with her, even if you have suffered it is all very well to be free again, but nevertheless you cannot help feeling a sort of sympathy for her, just as you would for a pet canary even if it had pecked you severely, and if one is kind-hearted it is not easy to refuse a lump of sugar."

Connoisseurs of perfect goods appreciate "Jesse Moore" Whiskey for its purity and delightful flavor. It is without a peer.

Corianton

"Corianton" at the California is an ambitious play founded on a story taken from the "Book of Mormon." The theme is well handled for dramatic effect and the situations, though not unfamiliar, are sufficiently thrilling and plausible to hold one's interest. The story in itself is a dramatic one, and it contains sufficient material to stimulate action. It affords opportunity for picturesque scenery of a novel character and the play is very well mounted. Orestes Bean, the playwright, has talent for the construction of climaxes, and he has told the story in crisp and

Eugenie Thais Lawton, the beautiful and gifted leading lady of the Central dignified dialogue. Alphonz Ethier, in the leading role, makes a very favorable impression as an heroic actor. He has the temperament and a most convincing style.

Miss Odell's Second Week

Maude Odell's second performance is not receiving the attention it deserves. There is a pleasant plot of the old romantic order in "Countess Valeska" and those who enjoy a patriotic love-drama should be having just what they like at the Grand this week. The play is a strong one and interesting throughout. Although there are two plots the author has succeeded in working out both to a pleasing and unexpected end. The major action is military and is taken from the Napoleonic wars. Interwoven with this is a love affair in which Miss Odell and Herschel May-all are the principals. During the four acts there are only two scenic changes, both in Valeska's castle. But the management seems to have spared nothing in making them beautiful and realistic. A Prussian Captain becomes separated from his regiment and seeks refuge with Valeska, his former love. There the courtship is renewed and the Captain (Mayall), disguised as the overseer of the place, plots against Napoleon who is resting there. He is discovered and sentenced to be shot, but escapes at the crucial moment while Valeska holds the sentry off. Maude Odell makes a handsome and interesting Countess and she has some excellent scenes in which to show her dramatic ability. The company does well with its several parts, Mayall being especially good as the Prussian Captain.

A Dainty Comedienne

Lillian Burkhart has received mash notes by bushels, has had charming poems written to and about her, and every year increases her popularity. Hubert Henry Davies wrote a playlet for her, with a heroine that could be impersonated by no one else but this particular vaudeville star. Miss Burkhart produced the playlet during her last season here and she still has it in her repertory. It is "Fifty Years Ago," and like its heroine, it still charms. It is a pretty playlet with a streak of pathos running through its comedy and Miss Burkhart interprets the heroine to the letter of the spirit. She received a warm welcome from the Orpheum audiences every night this week and the welcome will hold good through her engagement.

Hasn't Left the Stage

Since Katherine Bloodgood's marriage with Lieutenant Howard Hapgood Kipp of the U. S. Marine Corps, rumor has had it that she was going to Samar in the Philippine Islands to reside during the time Lieutenant Kipp was in charge of the naval station there. But Mrs. Kipp has not retired from the stage and Mr. Kipp has not even been ordered to the Philippine Islands, but is stationed in San Francisco in charge of the Marine Corps at that port. Mrs. Katherine Hapgood Kipp, as she prefers to be known since her marriage, has left the vaudeville stage but will hereafter appear in concert and oratorio work. Arrangements are now being made for a tour of the Pacific Coast States in a concert company now being organized for her. The only other member of the company selected thus far is Miss Blanche Rogers of Los Angeles, who will be pianist and accompanist, though it is likely that Miss Olive Mead, the celebrated New York violinist, will be selected from among the hosts of applications received. All the business affairs of this company are in the hands of Blanchard and Venter.

Triumph of a Californian

People that keep in touch with Eastern theatrical affairs have been reading a great deal of late about the success of William Norris, the comedian of "A Country Girl," the latest London musical comedy success. He is one of the coming stars of the theatrical firmament and will soon be heading a company of his own. How few local theatregoers that have been reading of his triumphs, know that he is a native of this city and that he went through the local Boys' High School not many years ago. His right name is William Norris Block and he is a nephew of James N. Block, ex-Tax Collector. After leaving school he was in business with his father who was proprietor of the Carmen Island Salt Works. He soon wearied of commerce and took to the stage, at first playing a small part in one of Frohman's companies. Like Edwin Stevens, who, by the way is now dividing the honors with Marie Cahill, Norris is remarkable for his versatility. He played Bepe with Otis Skinner in "Francesca da Rimini" and he created the hilarious roles of the Burgomaster and King Dodo in the musical comedies bearing those names. He made such a hit as Malchisedek Pinchas that Zangwill would have liked to star him in "The King of the Schnorrers," and now he is the hit of "A Country Girl," in a rollicking comedy role. Such has been the success of Norris that a musical comedy is now being written for him.

Frank's "Resurrection"

Alexander Frank's dramatization of Tolstoi's "Resurrection" did not meet with enthusiastic approval at the Republic. It is not altogether Mr. Frank's fault. Greater dramatists than Mr. Frank have endeavored to evolve a strong play out of the material in Tolstoi's novel and have failed. Henry Bataille, the well-known Parisian dramatist and financial backer of the Theatre de l'Oeuvre, dramatized the novel and though the play registered a long run, it was never highly praised. Michael Morton was the English adaptor for the London and New York stage and the critics have declared that the play is not from Tolstoi's novel. Their judgment is that the French dramatist took some old theatrical lay figures, dressed them up, gave them Russian names and settings and imparted to the plot a little of the atmosphere of the novel. However, the story is not one that theatregoers are likely to enjoy. Mr. Frank has utterly failed to make it enjoyable. Its heroics are of the maudlin variety and there is too much pulpit talk in every act. The story presents difficult barriers to the dramatist, for it is chiefly concerned with the study of a sinner's nature, the slow repentance of a nobleman who has seduced a good-looking girl of the people and the gradual uplifting of a fallen woman's crumbling morals. The play is not artistic and the company at the Republic is incapable of investing it with interest.

Olive Vail, the pretty girl who has come to swell the Fischer beauty force, is a Southern California girl. She is not an entire stranger to San Francisco, having been in the Tivoli chorus and with the Southwell comic opera company at the Grand for a season. Later she went East and had some experience in Anna Held's company. She is very young, and has the charm of all youthful beauties.

A Big Theatrical Fight in Prospect

The opposition to the big theatrical syndicate is growing stronger every day. Kirke La Shelle is the latest recruit of the Independent Booking Agency. He has several successful companies on the road, and he abandoned the syndicate because they forced his "Earl of Pawtucket" out of the Madison Square where it was doing an immense business. Weber & Fields with their new West End theatre have joined hands with the Independents and Stair & Hamlin, who lately secured a foothold in this city and who have a long chain of theatres, are throwing their doors open to the free lance theatres. The forces are massing themselves for one of the biggest theatrical fights that ever occurred.

Looking for Color

"The Earl of Pawtucket" must be very amusing, and a good fit for Lawrence d'Orsay's peculiar talent. There's one point in the play where the Earl, traveling in cog, and crazed almost by his efforts to catch on to the point of American humor, says "Even Charles Dickens couldn't understand them!" There are some catch phrases in the play that are already being quoted. One is "I've a telegram from Sarah—Sarah's better," which the Earl drawls deliciously. D'Orsay by the way, is in real life, as those who met him when he was here with the Henry Miller company can vouch for, as terribly British as his part, the Earl, calls for. An amusing story is told of him when he was working up the "atmosphere" of his role. The scenes of the play, be it known, are all laid in the Waldorf-Astoria. One day the actor thought he'd go to the hotel and secure familiarity with his stage environments. But, as he strolled over the hotel, observing everything minutely, the house detective came up to him and asked him for his card. It so happened that the actor had not one with him, or any other means of identity.

"Will you join me?" "Well, yes, in a drink of Chapin & Gore."

"I am a player, sir, and I don't wish to be disturbed by you," said D'Orsay to the detective.

"I am here to disturb people when they act like you're doing now," said the detective.

"Look here, fellow, I will have you discharged. I shall see if you have a right to bring one to public disgrace. See the people all staring at me. It's an outrage, sir."

D'Orsay gesticulated in true British style as his indignation reached fever heat. But the house officer insisted on Mr. D'Orsay seeing the manager. Of course it ended with Kirk La Shelle being rung up, and apologies set the whole affair right.

His Blood is Warm

After the opening performance of "The Bonnie Brier Bush" in Brooklyn last week, the veteran actor, J. H. Stoddart, was shouldering his way through the raging blizzard toward the ferry to return to his New York flat, when the manager of the company encountered him, and noting the snow-clad figure, said:

"Mr. Stoddart, you ought not to be out in such a storm as this."

The seventy-eight-year-old actor laughed sturdily.

"Why, my boy," said he, "I like it. Makes me feel like I was a boy again in the Highlands of Scotland. I never miss a chance to get out in a real good bit of weather. It warms the blood."

Denman Thompson and Geo. W. Ryer have written a new pastoral play, that has been well received in Philadelphia and other cities. It is called "Our New Minister," and contains the usual stock characters of pastoral dramas.

Blanche Bates, so rumor says, will be at the Columbia in "The Darling of the Gods" some time this year.

Features of Next Week's Bills

Of course the event will be the first presentation on any stage of Wallace Irwin's burlesques, "Chop Suey" and "Padlock Holmes," with the great minstrel first part in which will appear Richard Jose, William McDonald, former basso of the Bostonians, Sidney Harris, phenomenal baritone, and Harry Sylvester, tenor. In the burlesque the stars will be Joe Kane and Marie Lamp Adelman. It is expected, and there is no reason to doubt that the expectation will fulfill itself, that the new venture at the Republic will be a repetition of the old Standard success of Reed and Emerson. Those were the days when society women flocked to the Standard and munched peanuts in the gallery when they could not obtain seats downstairs. Prices at the Republic are to be fifty and twenty-five cents and the theatre will without a doubt be packed at its opening tomorrow night, and all nights thereafter.

The weberfieldian burlesque, which in a way paved the way for the Irwin travesties, is not losing in favor at Fischer's. The fourth week of "Hoity Toity" has seen packed houses every night, Olive Vail, the newcomer, receiving a warm welcome. "Hoity Toity," the best yet since "Fiddle dee dee," goes until the public will permit it to say good-bye. Then will come "Helter Skelter."

Charles B. Hanford's production of "The Taming of the Shrew" at the California will be interesting. Florence Roberts produced the play during one of her Alcazar seasons but it was not the elaborate production that John Drew and Ada Rehan gave under Daly's direction. Mr. Hanford has gorgeous scenery and all the incidentals that go to make Shakespeare pleasing to the eye as well as the ear.

Two stars, Emmett Corrigan and Maude Odell, will jointly reign on the stage at the Grand during the production of the powerful Russian drama, "The Sixth Commandment." The play is new to San Francisco, although in the East it is a popular success. Mr. Corrigan, though a stranger here, has a reputation for high class artistic work.

"The Cipher Code," the Alcazar's new bill, has never been seen in San Francisco, but it made John E. Kellerd a star and won praise in New York, Boston and Chicago. Charles Klein, its author, collaborated in Warfield's "The Auctioneer," and De Wolf Hopper's "Mr. Pickwick," two of the best money-makers of the period. He is credited with a virile, vital play of Washington life, thoroughly American in atmosphere, and with all the romantic and picturesque interest which attaches to the adventures of a "gentleman criminal" of the type so fascinating in "Jim the Penman," "Raffles" and "Sherlock Holmes." Ernest Hastings will play this role. Juliet Crosby, always a favorite, reappears after two months' retirement, as a vivacious woman journalist. The pivot upon which the story turns is the theft of State papers for stock jobbing purposes and the unjust incrimination of tried public officials. For the week of March twenty-third there will be one of the mercurial French farces, so popular at the Madison Square, "The Husbands of Leontine."

There will be a special Mascagni matinee at the Tivoli today, and tomorrow night will be the last Mascagni performance. Next week will come "Pinafore," probably the most popular English comic opera ever written. Bertha Davis will be Josephine, Caro Roma will sing Buttercup, Arthur Hahn, Dick Deadeye, Cunningham the Captain, Hartman Sir Joseph, and the rest of the cast in proportion.

Gillette will continue in "Sherlock Holmes" this week's success. Especial attention is drawn to the fact that the curtain rises at eight o'clock precisely and late comers cannot be seated until the end of the first act. Effie Ellsler in "When Knighthood Was in Flower" comes next to the Columbia.

Admirers of physical perfection will have a feast at the Orpheum, when the six Glinserettis make their appearance. They are acrobats of Continental fame. The favorites Foy and Clark will appear in Will Cressy's charming sketch, "The Spring of Youth." Pepita Aragon, a beautiful danseuse from Barcelona, will be new, also Julius Tannen, who imitates Goodwin, Mansfield, Hopper and other actors to the life. Miss Burkhart will have a new skit, "a comedy of sentiment and slang" by Anna S. Richardson.

Murphy and Mack, Irish comedians, Gladys Van Antwerp, singing comedienne, the aerial Edwards's, May June ("Rag Time Liz"), the Paloma Ladies' Quartette in new and delightful selections, Farmer Jones and his porkers, Dalton and Lewis, will be Chutes attractions. —The Playgoer.

Kocian to Give One Farewell Concert

Manager Greenbaum has arranged to postpone the Denver concert of Kocian, the brilliant Bohemian violinist. He will give a farewell concert at the Alhambra next Monday evening. Kocian will play the Vieuxtemps E major concerto, one of the most difficult works ever written for the violin, and which has not been played here for many years, and the Bach Chaconne, the test of all great violinists, besides a number of brilliant smaller numbers. Miss Geyer, the pianiste, will play Chopin's Etude in F major and Brahm's Rhapsodie in G minor. Seats now on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co's; prices seventy-five cents, one dollar and one dollar and fifty cents.

There were 783 visitors to the Grand Canyon of Arizona for the week ending March seventh. It is developing as a fashionable thing to make a run to the "Eighth Wonder of the World."

Sherlock Holmes in Society

The Story of Mrs. Smartem's Jeweled Pin.

"I've come out here for a complete rest," said the great detective, "so I beg you will not bother me, Watson, with any of your conundrums."

He lighted his pipe and curled his legs under him, Turk fashion, squatting uncomfortably enough, I thought, on the rug before the gas grate.

"Very well," I answered. "I was just going to tell you about a queer case that came under my observation."

"Oh, go ahead, if you like," observed Sherlock, knocking the ash off his pipe-bowl, "I can't prevent your talking."

Unoffended, because I really wanted to know his opinion, I told him my tale of woe.

"It seems that Mrs. Swelter Smartem, one of the youngest and prettiest matrons in our society, was at a dinner shortly before Lent. She lost her jeweled pin there. It was a most elegant and costly thing, the gift of her husband, and she feels dreadfully about it. When the dinner began, it was pinned in the bosom of her gown, and attracted numerous envious glances. After the second dance that followed the dinner, it was gone. She would not have noticed its absence but everybody else did, and her husband insisted on a general search, and close questioning of all the servants."

Sherlock puffed away at his pipe for a moment.

"How many guests?" he asked finally, uncurling one of his legs and rubbing his foot.

"Twelve, men and women."

"Any man particularly devoted to Mrs. S.?"

"I don't know—why, yes, there's young Tom Pennilesse. He was engaged to her for two years before her marriage with Smartem, I'm told."

"Who danced the second dance with her?"

"As I heard the story, she didn't dance it—was in the conservatory."

"Alone?"

"No, with Pennilesse."

"Anybody see them there?"

"No—wait, I believe one of the guests did say she saw them —them were both looking down at the water. You know there's a miniature lily-pond there."

"Lost something, eh?"

"Mrs. Smartem said not."

"Who raised the hue and cry?"

"Smartem. Mrs. S. said she hadn't noticed her pin was gone."

"Pennilesse pretty poor?"

"Rather."

"Search the pawn shops."

With this oracular utterance the great detective closed his eyes, uncurled both his feet, and lay back in a meditation I could not disturb, so I left him.

I went away and worked on the case, or rather told a policeman to go at it. No results. Then I called on Sherlock again. He was playing marbles with the bell-boy and said my interruption was an impertinence. But he laughed, and sent the boy away.

"Wait, Watson," he said, without giving me a chance to say a thing, "I know you've failed. I, however, have been more successful. The pin is found."

I gasped with astonishment.

"Yes. This is how it was. When Mrs. Smartem and her ex-lover were in the conservatory leaning over and looking at the lilies and, no doubt, talking over old golf-games, her garter became unfastened. She wears the old kind—round clasp, jeweled buckle."

"How do you know?" I whispered.

"Oh, I know many things—psycho-telepathy and all that. Well, it dropped to the floor and fell into the water—food for the gold-fishes. Mrs. S. was horrified. What could she do? They tried to reach the thing with a stick they found in a flower pot, but impossible. Finally, they saw it was no use. 'What shall I do?' groaned Mrs. S. 'Pin it up,' suggested Tom. But neither had an available pin. 'Oh, take this,' cried Mrs. S., as they heard voices coming, 'I'll pin it up," and she grabbed her jewel from her bosom. While Tom stood as a screen in front of her, she hastily fastened up her stocking."

"But why didn't she explain?"

"Oh—well, a woman's reason, I suppose. Isn't Smartem a bit jealous?"

"Ah-h," I observed, understanding him, "and Pennilesse an old lover."

"Honi soit qui mal y pense," added the great detective, "but maybe Smartem isn't that kind of a thinker."

"You're a great reasoner," I said, and ordered up two hot Scotches on the strength of the discovery. — The Parodist.

MUSIC

The Coronation Choir

The British music-lovers who like "Old Country" color in theirs got the worth of their money from the Coronation Choir. There was a certain Piccadilly-and-Strand air about the whole concert that must have been very pleasing to the provincially minded. The boys wore Eton suits, their cheeks had the proper pink, and their accent was all that one could desire; but their voices failed somehow to produce that "choir invisible" effect which causes us to shut our eyes and dream that we have done with death. The music the male quartet made was of the truly cosmopolitan kind, well blent, almost beautiful. "God save the King" had a strange and somewhat sad sound. The Coronation Choir sang it with the greatest good-will. The management of the Alhambra should see to it that musicians have not to make good against the hideous hissing and sputtering of electric lights.

Music for Shakespeare

The incidental music for Charles B. Hanford's production of "The Taming of the Shrew" was arranged or composed by Emil Mori, a Russian composer of prominence, who some years ago decided to cast his lot in America. The original portions of the music show, I am told by those who have heard them, great resourcefulness in catching the atmosphere of the dramas and in some cases old English airs, such as were used in Shakespeare's own time have been employed. This is the case with the banquet song in "The Taming of the Shrew," when the wedding guests are assembled. The melody is that of an old London street song whose words would probably offend modern ears polite. There is a legend to the effect that Queen Elizabeth ordered that it be sung and played, as a mark of derision and contempt at the execution of Mary Queen of Scots. So great, however, was the sympathy for Mary, and so exquisite the pathos which which the band interpreted the music, that it became a requiem. Mr. Hanford has of course preserved the song in its merrier aspect. The words which his company uses were written by Philander Johnson whose poems in the Washington Star have come to be recognized as among the quotable features of current journalism. They show a very consistent effort to catch the Sixteenth century quality. The lines are:

Dull Care is a monster who bids us repine,
So, beware, lady, lady—'ware lady, lady—'ware, lady, lady mine.
We will catch him tonight and we'll drown him in wine,
So beware, lady, lady—'ware, lady, lady—'ware, lady, lady mine.
Your cheeks may be fair as the roses are fine,
But the rose when it fades leaves but thorns on the vine;
So beware, lady, lady—'ware, lady, lady—'ware, lady, lady mine.
Then kiss the cup;
We'll drink it up
And vow that the kiss is the best of the sup.
Youth's content with kisses, there's no doubt,
But old age prefers his wine without,
So, beware, lady, lady—'ware, lady, lady—'ware, lady, lady, mine.

Some Compositions of Californians

The Hillside Club of Berkeley was very pleasantly entertained last Saturday with a program of good music, arranged by Mr. H. B. Pasmore, the compositions rendered being all by Californians. In its entirety the program was: Petite suite for piano, violin and cello, H. B. Pasmore, composed for and played by his daughters, Mary, Dorothy and Susan; song, Come Away Death, Oscar Weil, Mrs. J. Bardilini; songs to words by Julius Goebel, Am Abend, Erster Kuss, Im Hochsommer, Arthur Fickenscher, sung by Mrs. Fickenscher; songs, Love Unloved, June Song, W. J. McCoy, dedicated to and sung by Mrs. Edith Scott Basford; trio in G major for piano, violin and cello, John Harraden Pratt, Fred Maurer, Mary and Dorothy Pasmore; songs to words by Charles Keeler, The Mountains, Where the Cowslips Grow, H. B. Pasmore, composed for and sung by Mrs. Florence Wyman Gardner; song, Silent Tears, J. H. Pratt, Mr. A. E. Nowlan; songs, Because the rose must fade, The Only Voice, W. J. McCoy, Mrs. Bardilini; songs, Deutung, Mondnacht, Fickenscher, Mrs. Fickenscher; songs, The Message, with violin and cello obligato, O that we two were maying, with viola obligato, Pasmore; part songs, Sleep Dearest Sleep, The Lover's Song (words by Edward Rowland Sill), J. H. Pratt, Mrs. Gardner, Mrs. Basford, Mr. Nowlan and Mr. Pasmore. The audience showed true appreciation of the music and its interpretation. It was really a noteworthy occasion.

Some delightful music was the feature of the Browning Society's program last Tuesday afternoon in Century hall. The occasion was the birthday of Elizabeth Barrett Browning and also the first anniversary of the Browning Society. Arthur Weiss was there with his speaking cello, Miss Millie Flynn sang, a quartet composed of Miss Flynn, Miss McCloskey, Mrs. Briggs and Miss Wheeler rendered Schubert's serenade; there were readings and recitations and an address by the President, Mrs. Oulton. Miss Helen Sutherland was the piano accompanist for the singers.

From Dresden comes the news by letter of the appearance of Miss Maude Fay, of this city, at the salon of Mme. Orgenie, on the occasion of a concert in which many distinguished vocalists participated. She rendered the exquisite aria from Lucretia Borgia, and was well received. The rich quality of the young American's voice, and her magnetism, were subjects of comment.

That tall drum-major of the Kilties was a farmer's boy before he joined the Gordon Highlanders. He makes an easier living with the Kilties than he managed to exact from his Canadian field labor.

Mascagni's Farewell Concerts

Pietro Mascagni and the monster orchestra which assisted at his previous concerts will give two farewell symphony concerts at the Alhambra next week, on Tuesday and Friday afternoons. As many have expressed a desire to hear this great Italian's interpretation of a Beethoven classic, Manager Greenbaum has selected the Fifth Symphony, and it will be very interesting to hear Mascagni's rendition of this, considered by many the greatest work of Beethoven. In addition the program will include Verdi's overture to "Nabucco," the Prelude, Dream and Intermezzo from Mascagni's "William Ratcliffe," and Wotan's Farewell and the Fire Music from "Die Walkure." Friday afternoon will be a testimonial to Mascagni, tendered by Will Greenbaum and the management of the Tivoli Opera House. The program will include Tschaikowsky's Pathetique symphony, with which Mascagni scored his first hit amongst us; Verdi's overture to "Sicilian Vespers," and the Vorspiel to "Lohengrin," and "Ride of the Valkyries" by Wagner, also a superb production of Tschaikowsky's Symphonic Overture "1812," descriptive of the invasion of Russia by the French. This work will be given for the first time in this city in its entirety, with additional corps of trumpets, trombones and other martial instruments, and battle effects by a squad of artillerymen from the Presidio. Even in the large cities like Boston and Chicago, when this work is produced, the effect of the military band is usually done on large organs. The prices for seats will be two dollars, one dollar and a half, and one dollar, and the management will use every effort to keep speculators from capturing seats. —The Music Critic.

A SOLID AND HELPFUL INSTITUTION.

The desire among Californians, and particularly among San Francisco business men, to own homes of their own, is constantly on the increase. This is proved by a look at the work accomplished by the Continental Building and Loan Association. This institution is still growing and doing the past year has helped over six hundred families to own their own homes.

Mrs. Older's Book

A book that is bound to be widely read is Mrs. Fremont Older's "The Socialist and the Prince," for it is a novel that is sure to provoke discussion. It is in the nature of an historical novel, dealing as it does with a stormy period in the history of California, and weaving into fiction many facts incident to the Kearney agitation and the riots provoked by that clever charletan. Mrs. Older shows a remarkable familiarity with conditions previous to the rise of Kearney, and they are well described. The story is an interesting one, and some of the characters are well drawn. The strongest character is that of Stryne, a much idealized Kearney, and a picturesque one is that of Theodosia Peyton, somewhat reminiscent of Mrs. McLean-Martin. The character however is not a prepossessing one, and though probably intended for a picture of winsome girlhood is rather that of an hysterical wanton. Yet hers was a remarkable individuality that is occasionally met with in real life. Its uniqueness fits it for fiction. When fool women crowd the jails to bestow flowers and fruit on the most degraded murderers there is nothing incongruous in this one carrying all her private fortune to offer as bail for Stryne. When she gets her flirtation well under way and learns from Stryne that he is a waif without name or family, she shows her inborn snobbishness by losing her interest. A woman of lineage and position, secure of her pedestal, would have ignored incidentals for the sake of the man. Theodosia is one of those wonders of bookland who carries on six successful flirtations at the same time, chiefly for the purpose of improving her accent. The Prince Ruspoli, left-handed cousin to the King of Italy, is a suitor for her hand. After the way he holds on in spite of dismissals and insults, one has reason to suspect that some denouement is in reserve and that his eye is on the Peyton fortune. It is possible that the intention is to contrast the man of birth and breeding with the nondescript nobody, but in that case Stryne has the better of it in every particular except not being able to boast of his ancestry. The book has plenty of action, and in spots it is brilliant and epigrammatic. It contains many anachronisms but on the whole, for a first effort, it is a notable achievement.

Literary Ghouls

One of the vultures of literature has applied to an English court to have an injunction granted, restraining another of the flock from publishing an unauthorized biography of George Douglas Brown, the author of "The House with the Green Shutters," whose death cut short his literary career at its very commencement. Mr. Brown, or as he preferred to be known in literature, George Douglas, had written but one book, but that one displayed such strength and originality that there was every reason to believe a new star had appeared in the literary firmament. Whether he would have sustained the reputation which he gained by his first effort will never be known, since he left nothing by which even an approximate judgment could be formed. He was not well enough known to the general public, nor even to his brothers of the pen, to make any sort of a biography a necessity. No sooner had the breath left his body when those few who had more than a nodding acquaintance with him turned the points of their pens into stilettos with which to puncture his reputation. Nothing was too insignificant, too intimate or too personal to be withheld. Neither Stevenson nor the Carlyles were so badly abused by their sordid acquaintances. When one of the ghouls, in the course of his remarks, mentioned that "Douglas was a man who made few friends," small wonder that a commentator added, "Happy Douglas!" There is nothing on which to base an assumption that even a hundred copies of a biography of George Douglas would find sale, but the chance to pry into private lives and papers is one not likely to be overlooked by a certain class who prowl about the outskirts of the profession of letters.

The Essays of Norris

Doubleday, Page & Co. will shortly issue a volume of Frank Norris's literary essays. This will be welcome news both to the admirers of Mr. Norris, and to those who enjoy good, strong, outspoken work. Frank Norris was one of the very few who had something to say, and could say it with force enough to appeal to minds in advance of high school pupils and women's clubs. It is one of the laments of the day that people do not read essays any more. The deluge of fiction is blamed for the decline in the popularity of the essay, but the essay itself declined before its popularity waned. The poor, weak, thin, slipshod mediocrity and echo which has been dished out has been even lower in grade than the bulk of fiction. There has been nothing to fix one's teeth in. To try to read the average volume of essays of recent publication has been akin to the effort wasted in chewing gruel. Outside of school text books, one can name on the fingers of one hand all the essays that have been published in the last three years which are worth serious consideration.

The colored illustrations which accompany W. D. Orcutt's fairy tales, "The Princess Kallisto," are due to his eight-year-old son. It was intended to have the pictures in black and white, but the child got hold of the first series of sketches and improved them to his liking. This brings up the question, who it is that settles the matter of the style of pictures which are put into books for the little people. The freak drawings which grown-ups find amusing or interesting do not appeal to children at all, and the effort to do something supremely funny is wasted. Books which are otherwise all that can be desired are ruined by the pictures, which are often beyond the comprehension of those they are meant to amuse. In this respect too much cannot be said in praise of the illustrations which accompany Mrs. Martin's "Emmy Lou." Place that and one of Oliver Hereford's in the hands of children of tender years, and they will speedily make their selection and give a timely hint to their elders as to which they prefer, as well as why.

Miss Virna Woods of Sacramento passed away just when everything looked brightest for her. Her play, "Strathmore," while not a great one and rather too verbose as plays go these days, had received good words from many critics, and she had a better play, "Charles IX," ready for production next season. One of the best things Miss Woods ever wrote was her little Californian novel, "An Elusive Lover." It had a most original plot and at the time it was published created a deal of comment all over the country. It is a novel as unique in plan as T. B. Aldrich's charming short story, "Marjorie Daw."

A Poet Becomes an Editor

The Literary World, an unimportant monthly of Boston,, which has survived for nearly half a century chiefly because it cost nothing to issue it, has been taken over by the L. C. Page publishing company, who have secured Bliss Carman as editor. Practically it will be like launching a new enterprise, for the Literary World has neither circulation nor reputation. Mr. Page says he does not intend to make any radical changes at first, but in the course of time we may expect to see the Literary World take rank amongst the literary monthlies. It is worth noting that the literary magazines are increasing in number of late. Besides the well-established Bookman, Book-Buyer, Critic, and Current Literature, there have been half a dozen started within the past six months, with every appearance of becoming rivals of those already in the field. One of the newest calls itself "The Booklovers' Magazine," which is trenching on the ground of that best of all literary periodicals, The Book-Lover.

The Literary Faker

Elinor Glyn is another of the writers who takes shelter under her umbrella and declares that she had no idea or intention of writing books. They just went and did it themselves when she wasn't looking. She declines to be classed as a "literary person," has no plans, no methods, no nothing. Vulgar coin has no attractions for her, nor has "fame." She is not ambitious, and she may never write another book. She doesn't know anything about it and what is more, she doesn't care. All of which sounds very much as if Elinor Glyn had another book ready to make its appearance. The advertising schemes of writers are as bald as the stolen diamonds of the soubrette. The first one to assume the shrinking violet pose was heralded far and wide as a genius who didn't know it himself, and the sheets which he scribbled for his own amusement, in the intervals of a busy day in his law office, discovered by the disinterested friend and all that, made a good "filler" when there was no more important information to be given out, but by this time the idea is frayed and shop-worn. Not long since, a prominent publishing house made a list of their clients who had strayed into the by-path of literature, as though they imagined it were a great thing for them to do. Well, there is the old allegory of the bear dancing on his hind legs. As a side-show, and for a ten-cent admission, one may not object to an occasional dancing bear exhibition, but when it comes to advertising an Otero or a Carmencita, and charging full prices at a big theatre, the public has a right to object to being swindled. These writers who affect the amateur pose should be content with amateur prices for their wares. It is not that one objects to lawyers or doctors or actors writing books, if they can do so acceptably, but let them cease to pretend to look down upon the professional writers. —The Bookworm

A prime factor in the enjoyment of a journey is good company. A journey should have an objective. The objective of Detrick's Tours is the Grand Canyon of Arizona. The Nippon-California Tour Company (operating Detrick's Tours) has arranged with the Santa Fe Railroad for four tours to the "Eighth Wonder of the World." Good company and the Grand Canyon of Arizona make a combination not to be despised. It is the ideal short vacation for the wearied business man.

United States Steel Corporation

My New York correspondent sends me the following facts relative to the United States Steel Corporation, which will doubtless be of interest to local financiers: "Since the conversion plan of the United States Steel Corporation was officially announced ther has been considerable figuring as to the value of the rights." The following analysis is by one of the recognized experts on the subject: "United States Steel preferred subscription rights are said to be worth 2 per cent, although the specialists themselves cannot figure accurately how this conclusion is reached. That part of the rights which enables the holder to subscribe at par and cash for 10 per cent bonds is, of course, valueless, as the bonds are now quoted at $94.12 1-2. A holder, however, may surrender 40 per cent of his holdings, worth at present about 87 1-4 and receive therefor an equal amount of bonds worth 94 12. This is a gain of 7 1-4 per cent on 40 per cent of one's holdings. This is apparently a profit of 2 9-10 on the whole. The loss on subscriptions for cash is approximately 5 1-2 per cent on one-tenth of one's holdings, or, say, a little over 1-2 per cent on the whole. It is not generally known that the United States Steel Corporation second mortgage is so drawn up that it cannot be foreclosed until after two years of default. Many prominent mortgages contain similar provisions, notably the West Shore Railroad, first mortgage, which cannot be foreclosed until after three years of default." The manner in which the stockholders of the United States Steel Corporation have increased in number is a little short of wonderful. Eight years ago the different properties of the corporation were divided into a large number of small companies. It was estimated that less than 2,000 people controlled these companies. A year before the organization of the United States Steel Corporation there were about 22,000 stockholders in the different companies which it absorbed. The United States Steel Corporation now has 55,000 stockholders on its books, or 23,000 more than it had eighteen months ago. Officers of the company believe that within three years the number of stockholders will exceed 100,000.

'Change Trading Active

There has been a good volume of trade in local industrial securities during the past week and unlike the preceding week transactions have been more generally divided among the leading stocks. The flurry in San Francisco Gas & Electric which attracted so much attention a week ago appears to have subsided and the speculative element has settled down to a waiting attitude to permit the operations of the Eastern capitalists or syndicate manipulating the deal to develop their intentions a little more fully. At the same time, however, the price of San Francisco Gas & Electric shares has been remarkably well sustained, considering all the circumstances. As is well known the stock dragged along at from $42 to $43 for months and there were few purchasers who wanted it at that price. Possibly one reason for the present showing of strength is the recent circular letter of the board of directors, addressed to shareholders asking for a pooling of stock, whereby the board can have control of a great majority of the shares for a period of one year, with the additional authority to sell such accumulation of stock at a price not to be less than $90 per share. It is evident from this, that whatever the controlling power securing option on other lighting plants may be, it is not the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company, and this circular letter of the latter corporation is really an indication that the board of directors of the San Francisco Gas and Electric realize the urgent necessity of their being in a position to do something to protect their corporate interests and the value of their stock. The placing of these shares in escrow under the conditions stipulated give the board absolute power to reorganize, to sell, to consolidate with other capital or other interests at any time within the year and under any terms whereby the accumulated stock can be turned at $90 a share. Furthermore it may not be necessary that the $90 per share shall be paid in coin, for under the terms of the power of attorney, which each shareholder must sign when he turns over his stock, the board can accept a certain amount of money, stock in a new or reorganized company, or bonds, or both stock and bonds to make up the aggregate of $90 per share. As there are 130,000 shares of San Francisco Gas & Electric stock issued, the total at $90 per share would represent $11,700,000 as the selling price for the entire plant and capital stock of the company. Other lighting shares have shown some improvement in a sympathetic way, but the transactions have not been very extensive. Equitable Gas is offered at $4.50 but the best bid is $4.25. Pacific Gas Improvement is offered at $39, with no bidders. Within the week a new collateral has been listed on the Stock and Bond Exchange. It is entieled Trustees' Certificates, is issued by the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company and the quotation is $54.12 1-2 bid, $54.75 asked. This, however, is a certificate issued temporarily to take the place of a stock certificate in a sale between buyers and sellers. Sugar stocks are quite firmly held and during the last few days there has been an upward movement in prices almost all along the line. Hawaiian Commercial is strong at $48.25 and Hutchison is selling at $16.75. Paauhau is changing hands at from $19 to 19.25 but there are few willing to sell for less than $19.50, while others assert they would not accept $20. This strength in Paauhau is due to the recent favorable reports from the Islands setting forth the excellent conditions of the plantation and the intimation at the annual meeting a few days ago that the company will resume the payment of monthly dividends beginning with July next. Makaweli is in demand at $27.50. Honokaa is steady at $15. Oceanic Steamship stock is very dull and in the absence of actual transactions the quotations must be said to be nominal, at $10 bid, $15 asked. The bonds of the corporation are about as dull as the stock, $65 being the best bid, but with no holders willing to sell at less than $75. Water stocks have remained about steady, the fluctuations having been rather unimportant and transactions comparatively small. Spring Valley remained steady at $84.75. Contra Costa water is quite firm and the difference between the bidding and the asking price has been reduced to very narrow limits. Alaska Packers stock is represented in a moderate way in the daily transactions, the price being firmly maintained at $155.50. The prices of Bank stocks, which usually remain almost stationary with scarcely any fluctuations, are gradually showing a stronger tone.

Stories New and Old

Not Intelligible

We no longer live in the period when every man who expressed a determination to do a specified action added reverently, D. V.—Deo volente, or God willing. The story is told that at the opening of navigation on the Hudson a gentleman telegraphed to a friend in Albany that he would "be there on Thursday next, D. V." The merchant did not understand the letters; had never seen them before in such a position, and could make nothing of it. He consulted all his neighbors in vain. At last one of them had a bright thought, and he cried out, "I've got it. D. stands for Drew and V. for Vibbard. He means he'll get here on Thursday by the steamer Drew or by the Chauncey Vibbard." The merchant went home ashamed of his stupidity.

He Was the Whole Business

A camp-meeting convert, rather a rough specimen of humanity, delivered himself of the following speech:

"Brethren and sisters! I have been a very bad man; have led a bad life; indeed, I have been the chief among sinners, and the one altogether lovely!"

His confession was received with some grains of saline.

A Realistic Echo

A Southern Colonel claims that he had an echo on his place, a few miles from Savannah, which beat anything he had ever heard or read about, one, in fact, which would clearly repeat whole sentences. The party was interested, but incredulous, and arranged to accompany the Colonel the next afternoon to test the wonderful echo. The Colonel found, on getting home, that in the heat of discussion he had claimed more than the facts justified. Determined not to be beaten he called his Irish laborer.

"Pat," says he, "some gentlemen are coming home with me tomorrow afternoon to hear the echo. Now, I want you to go across the river before time for me to arrive, so you can answer back whatever we may call out."

"You mane for me to play ikker, sorr?" asked Pat, grinning.

"That's it exactly," said the Colonel. "Now, do you thoroughly understand that you are to answer back exactly what we say?"

"Oh, yis, sorr; ye can depind on me entoirely."

Next afternoon the Colonel took his friends to the river bank, and all were ready for the experiment.

Making a speaking trumpet of his hands, the Colonel roared:
